1380 follow him in Person with greater Forces. Mean while, the Truce with Scotland was about to expire (1), the Council, by his direction, resolved to propose to the King of Scotland the Prolongation thereof; otherwise the sending of the Troops into Portugal might be obstructed.

That this Negotiation might not fail of Success, he undertook it himself, and without Delay repaired to the Frontiers of the two Kingdoms, where the Scotch Ambassadors were likewise to be. But whilst he was treating with them, there happened in England Affairs of much more Consequence than the Truce with Scotland, or the War with Castile (2).

The Poll-Tax imposed by the Parliament was levied with great Gentleness, inasmuch that the Collectors executed many Persons. But as there are but too many who make it their Business to enrich themselves at the Expence of the Publick, there were some that perfwaded the King and Council, if the Tax was levied with more Strictness, it would bring in much greater Sums, and even offered Money to have the Management of it. Very probably, they were Flemings that farmed the Tax, and obliged themselves to give the King a certain Sum for the Produce thereof. The new Collectors appointed by these Farmers, levied the Tax with extreme Rigour. One who collected in Kent, demanding of a Tyler at Depford, named Walter, twelve-pence for one of his Daughters, the Father affirmed she was under the Age set down in the Act of Parliament. Whereupon the insolent Collector, as these sort of People generally are, endeavouring to know the Truth by an indecent Action, the Father with his Hammer knocked out his Brains. All the Spectators applauded the Action, and promised the Murderer, commonly called Wat Tyler (3), to protect him.

At the same time, the Spirit of Rebellion seized not the Inhabitants of Depford alone, but likewise all the meaner sort of the County of Kent, who were soon followed by those of Essex. The Poll-Tax, which was their sole Grievance. The People of those Parts had long been in a Ferment, which being inflamed by this Accident, broke out into open Rebellion. They complained of the little Care to hinder the frequent Descents of the French, who had committed great Ravages in these two Counties. To this was added a general Discontent against the Judges, and all the Agents of the Law, who ruined Families by their Extortions. The Nobles and Gentry were no less hated by the Peasants, on account of the Right of Villainage, which was extremely abused. The Populace were moreover extremely incensed against the Duke of Lancaster, who was charged with his Negligence, all the Calamities, the two Counties had endured. All these Complaints being spread in those Parts, and countenanced by the Seditious, or as some affirm, by the Monks, who thought themselves injured by the Poll-Tax, to which they were liable, produced a wonderful Effect. In a short time, Wat Tyler, chosen by the Seditious, Chief and Protector of the poor People, saw himself at the head of above a hundred thousand Men, breathing revenge on the Nobility, and Professors of the Law. Thus attended, he marched directly to London, freeing in his rout, all the Prisoners detained in the publick Goals. Amongst these was a Priest of Maidston, named John Ball (4), who by his seditious Sermons, raised the People's Fury to the utmost height. He persuaded them, that all Men being Sons of Adam, there ought to be no Distinction, and consequently it was their Duty to reduce the World to a perfect Equality. Pursuant to this Maxim, they resolved to dispatch all the Nobility, and those that were distinguished by their Posts. So, without further Consideration, they cut off the Heads of all the Lords, Gentlemen, Judges, Counsellors, and Lawyers, that fell into their Hands. After this, they bound themselves by Oath, never to acknowledge for King, any Man whose Name should be John. This Resolution sprung from their hatred to the Duke of Lancaster, who bore that Name, and was suspected of aspiring to the Crown.

Richard hearing the Seditious were come as far as Blackheath, where Wat Tyler reviewed his Army, sent to know what they wanted. They replied, they had Affairs of great moment to communicate to the King, and desired him to come and talk with them in Person. This insolent Request being debated in Council, some were of Opinion, the King should comply with the Rebels, alleging that as he was not in condition to oppose Force to Force, gentleness was the only way to gain them. But Simon Sudbury Archbishop of Canterbury, and [Robert de] Hales Prior of St. John's, and High-Treasurer of England, strenuously opposed it, maintaining it was not safe for the King to trust his Person with this Rabble. Accordingly, the Rebels Request was rejected with Threats, little agreeable to the present Situation of the Court. Upon this News, the Seditious fell into such a Fury, that immediately they marched towards London, and possessed themselves of Southwark, parted from the City by the Thames. The Plunder of the Suburbs having given them no great Interruption, they endeavoured to enter the City. London Bridge had then Gates, which being shut at their Approach, might have stopped for some time their Impetuosity, if the Mob, who presently filled with them, had not opened them (5) in spite of the Magistrates. Nothing more opposing their March, they entered the City (6), where they committed all the Ravages that could be expected from so numerous a Body, guided solely by their Fury. The Duke of Lancaster's Palace (7) was reduced to Ashes, and the Houses of such as they deemed their Enemies, were given up to be plundered. However, their Leaders pretending not to be swayed by Avarice, hindered their People from appropriating to themselves any Part of the Booty. They even threw into the Fire, which consumed all the plundered Richee, a Man that would have retained a Piece of Plate. In this universal Confusion, wherein London was like a Town taken by Storm, the Archbishop's Palace, and the Temple with all the Writings kept there, were devoured by the Flames (8). The Houses of the Judges, Lords and principal Citizens shared the same Fate. This unruly Mob took care to accomplish their Oath, to extirpate all Appearances of Grandeur or Distinction. The Flemings, against whom they were extremely incensed, were above all others exposed to their Fury. They dragged them from the Churches where they had taken Sanctuary, and upon their not being able to pronounce certain Words, very difficult for Foreigners, they were immediately massacred.

After the Rebels had thus given these first Marks of their Fury, they approached the Tower, which might have been easily defended (9), if the Terror spread in the Garrison had not caused them to open the Gates. There they found the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Treasurer, who thought themselves safe in that Place, and without any Process, cut off their Heads. This done, they divided themselves into three Bodies. Wat Tyler remained about the Tower with thirty thousand Men, Jack Straw [another of their Captains] advanced into the City with the Rebels of Essex, to the Number of sixty Thousand. The Rest under the Conduct of another Leader, lodged themselves upon Mile-end-Green.

Mean time, the King and Council were in the utmost Perplexity. After long Debates how to stop these furious Proceedings, no better way was found than to offer the Rebels an Authentick Charter, confirming the Privileges of the People (10), and a general Pardon for all Crimes committed since the Insurrection. The Essex Men readily accepted these Offers, though they were now in the

But Wat Tyler was not so tractable, though he pretended his sole Aim was to obtain equitable Terms. However as he appeared willing to enter into Negotiation with the King himself, Richard with a few Attendants came to Smith-Field, from whence he sent a Knight (1), to desire him to come and confer with him. Wat insolently replied, he would come when he thought proper. Nevertheless he moved forward immediately, at the Head of his Troops, but so slowly that the King, beginning to be out of Patience, and willing to press him to make more haste, sent the same Knight to him, which had like to have cost him his Life. Wat Tyler was just entered Smith-Field, when the Knight delivered the King's Message, without alighting, not imagining he would stand upon that Ceremony. But the proud Leader was so offended at this want of Respect, that he was going to kill him, if the King who was himself advancing, had not cried out to the Knight to dismount.

In Wat Tyler's Conference with the King, being both on Horseback, he made such extravagant Proposals, that Richard knew not what to say to him. He demanded in short, that all the ancient Laws should be abolished, and the Government modelled according to certain fantastical Notions framed by himself (2). Whilst he made these Demands, he now and then lifted up his Sword, as it were to threaten the King (3), in case he granted not immediately what the Rebels would have. This brutish Insolence so raised the Indignation of [William] Wallerworth, Mayor of London, who attended the King, that without considering to what Danger he exposed his Master, he discharged such a Blow on the Rebel's Head with his Sword, as laid him dead at his Feet (4).

This Action, no less imprudent than bold, should naturally have occasioned the Ruin of the King and all his Attendants, but by an unexpected happiness, produced a contrary Effect. It is true, when the Rebels saw their Leader on the ground, they encouraged one another to revenge his Death. Nay, their Bows were now bent to shoot at the King and his Retinue. But Richard prevented the Danger, by a bolder and more prudent Action than could be expected from a young Prince of fifteen Years. Instead of flying, he turned to the Rebels, and cried with a resolute and courageous Voice: What my Lions! will you then kill your King? Be not concerned for the Loss of your Leader, I my self will now be your General; follow me into the Field, and you shall have whatever you desire. Upon saying these Words, he gently turned his Horse, and putting himself at their Head, rode towards St. George's Fields. The young King's Resolution made such an Impression on the Minds of the Rebels, that imagining he really declared for them, they altered their first Purpose, and followed him without Delay. They were no longer come into the Fields, but they saw marching towards them a Troop of a thousand armed Citizens, ruled by the Mayor, under the Conduct of Sir Robert Kneller, an Officer of great Reputation. This Sight struck them with such Terror, that falsely imagining the whole City was in Arms to attack them, the foremost Ranks threw down their Arms and begged Quarter. This Proceeding terrifying the rest who knew not the Cause, every one pressed to follow their Example. Thus in a few Moments the whole Multitude was dispersed without the Effusion of any Blood but the Leader's.

One cannot without Wonder, consider an Event so singular and full of extraordinary Circumstances. An Insurrection indeed is not so very strange, but to see it headed by such a Person as Wat Tyler is not usual, though the like Instances may possibly be found in other Histories. But it is doubtless beyond the common Course of Events, for a single Man, as the Mayor of London, to dare to kill this Leader, attended by thirty thousand Men. It is still more surprising, that a young Prince, but fifteen Years old, should have the Preference of Mind and Resolution, shown by Richard on this Occasion, and that his Boldness should produce so good an Effect. In fine, that so numerous a Multitude, just glutted with Blood and Slaughter, should disperse on a sudden by a Panick Fear, at the Sight of a few armed Citizens, is what cannot be considered without Astonishment, and without ascribing the Cause to him, who holds the Hearts of the People in his Hand. And indeed, we shall see presently, that no less than a sort of Miracle could prevent the utter Destruction of England, considering the pernicious Designs the Rebels had formed.

It was not only in the Counties of Kent and Essex, that the Spirit of Rebellion possessed the People. Whilst Wat Tyler and Jack Straw were marching to London, John Ball and John Wraw (5), two seditious Priests, stirred up the Populace of Suffolk, where they quickly assembled fifty thousand Men. They committed in those Parts numberless Barbarities, as if they were afraid of being out-done in Cruelty, by those who exercised their Fury in London. Sir John Covenant, Chief Justice, fell a Sacrifice to their Rage. After that, they burnt all the ancient Charters in the Abbey of St. Edmund's Bury, and in the University of Ca bridge.

On the other hand, Littliger, an Ale-House-Keeper (6) at Norwich, headed another Body of Rebels in the County of Norfolk, and cruelly put to death all the Judges and Lawyers that fell into his Hands. As for the Lords and Gentlemen, he had the Insolence to oblige them to serve him on the Knee, and if any one scrupled to submit to that Indignity, immediately ordered his Head to be cut off. In this manner he treated the Earl of Suffolk (7), who would not feign to approve of their Rebellion. As it was impossible for the King's Council to take measures speedy enough to remedy these Disorders, it was necessary that private Persons should of themselves use their Endeavours, without staying for Orders from Court, to free themselves from the impending Danger. Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, a Prelate of great Courage, though educated in an unwelcome Profession, thought it his duty to do something more than barely offer up Prayers, on so pressing an Occasion, which equally threatened Clergy and Laity. He headed a few loyal Subjects, and attacking the Rebels made a terrible Slaughter (8). The two Leaders Wraw and Littliger being taken in the Fight, the first was beheaded upon the spot, and the other sent to London, to receive the just Reward of his Crimes.

These Troubles being appeased sooner, and more happily, than could be expected, the King, by Advice of his Council, resolved to chastize the Guilty. To that end, the Lords had Orders to raise in every County, Troops of known Loyalty, and lead them to London. In a short time was drawn together an Army of forty thousand Men, which being divided into two Bodies, one marched into the County of Kent. At the Head of the other the King went himself to punish the People of Essex, who began to stir again, upon the Revocation of the Charter and general Pardon, with which they had been allured (9). As these People had not had time to take just measures, and found themselves prevented by the King's Diligence, they were easily defeated. Great Numbers were slain, and many others referred for public Examples. Among the last, was Jack Straw, Companion of Wat Tyler, and Head of the Essex Rebels. He confessed, if they had succeeded in their Projects, as they had reason to expect, their Design was to murder the King, root out the Nobility and Clergy, excepting the Mendicant Friars, part England into several Kingdoms, make Wat Tyler King of Kent, abolish all the ancient, and make new Laws. Probably these Projects were framed only in general, and it may be, over their Bowls, whilst they were on the March to London. Be that as it will, such a Design, managed by Heads little capable of executing it, could hardly fail of ending in the Ruin of the Authors. It is affirmed, that besides those that fell with their Arms in their Hands, above fifteen hundred died by the Hangman (10). Judge Tressilian was com-

As the Number was very great, he had an Opportunity to gratify his cruel and barbarous Temper, in punishing the unfortunate Wretches, to whom he showed his Favour. The Cruelties he exercised during his Commission, may well be compared to those practised of late Years by a Judge of the same Character (1), in the Reign of James II.

There are Historians who would father this Rebellion upon the Wickliffites, (who were commonly called Lollards;) but without any Foundation. It is certain, Religion had no share in these Commotions, since the Duke of Lancaster, open Protector of Wickliff, was the principal Object of the Rebels Malice. Besides, Wickliff, who then resided on his Living of Lutterworth [in Leicestershire,] was never questioned on that account. All that can be alleged to give the least Colour to this Accusation, is, that John Ball, a Franciscan Fryar, one of the Ring-leaders of the Rebels, was a little before thrown into Prison, by Order of the Archbishop of Canterbury, for preaching the new Doctrine. But it cannot be inferred from thence, that Wickliff's Followers excited the Insurrection. Moreover, Insurrections caused by a Religious Zeal, are seldom interrupted in so short a Time as this, which lasted but a Month, from the beginning to the end.

The Duke of Lancaster was on the Northern Borders, when the Rebellion broke out in Kent, which lies at the other end of the Kingdom. Upon the first News, he speedily concluded a three years Truce (2), with the Scots, for fear these Commotions should render them more difficult. Mean while, as he was apprehensive of exposing himself to the Rage of his Enemies, if he returned to Court, and also of giving the Northern Counties a Pretence to imitate the Southern, if he staid in the Kingdom, he chose to retire into Scotland, where he remained till the Sedition was appeased. The King of Scotland offered him twenty thousand Men, to suppress the Rebels, but he refused them, lest by introducing Foreigners, he should cause a general Revolt in the Kingdom. Notwithstanding these Precautions, he could not prevent his Enemies from spreading a Report, that he designed to march to London, at the Head of a Scotch Army, and seize the Crown. But he easily cleared himself from this groundless Accusation.

Whilst, by this unexpected Insurrection, Richard saw himself in Danger of losing his Crown and Life, his Ambassadors were negotiating his Marriage in Germany. From the Year 1379, he had been detested of espousing the Daughter of Barnabas Duke of Milan. This Project not succeeding, he demanded in 1380, a Princess of Bavaria, Daughter of the late Emperor Leuwis. But this Negotiation had no better Success than the former. At last on May 2, 1381, his Marriage with Ann of Luxemburg, Sister of the Emperor Wenceslaus was concluded at Nuremberg. This Princess arriving in England (3) a little after the Troubles were appeased, was received with great Pomp, agreeably to the King's Humour, who was very fond of these sorts of Solemnities.

Ed and Earl of March, Grandson of Roger Mortimer beheld in the beginning of the Reign of Edward III, died in February 1382, in his Government of Ireland. He had married Philippa only Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, and by her had a Son called Roger, who succeeded him in his Honour of Earl of March.

The Parliament which met about the end of the Year 1381 (4), and was prorogued on account of the Queen's Arrival, sat again in May the next Year (5). Some Historians affirm, in this Parliament an Act was passed empowering the Bishops to imprison Heretics, without the King's Licence (6). But others, upon better Grounds, maintain, the Commons refused to pass the Bill, and that the Bishops obtained that Power of the King alone. This last Opinion is confirmed by the Complaints made afterwards by the Commons to the King, of a Breach of Privilege. Be that as it will, it is certain, before that Time, the Bishops had no such Power, without the King's express Consent, for every particular Case. Of this there are Proofs in the Collection of the Public Acts, where we find the like Permissions granted by Edward III, to the Bishop of London and others. It is evident, these Permissions would have been needless, had the Bishops enjoyed this Privilege without the King's Consent. Besides, in a Commission of the same Nature directed by Richard II, to the University of Oxford, extant also in the Collection, there is no mention of any Statute upon that Subject, though it was a constant Custom when the King acted by virtue of an Act of Parliament, to mention it in his Letters Patent or Orders. Of this we may be easily satisfied in the same Collection.

Richard being now in his seventeenth Year, began more plainly to discover his Inclinations, which hitherto had been restrained by the Authority of his Governors. He had a high Conceit of his own Merit, and thought himself as well qualified to govern the State as Edward III, was at his Age. But there was a great Difference between these two Princes. Edward, when very young, with a great Penetration, had none but noble and generous Inclinations, tending to his own Glory, and his People's Happiness. Richard on the contrary, minded only Trifles, and thought of nothing but his Pleasures. He loved Pomp and Magnificence more than any of his Predecessors, and thereby ran into superfluous Expences, which idly consumed his Revenues. Flatterers had a great Sway over him. He expressed as great Affection for those that applauded his Passions, as Aversion for such as advised him to lead a Life worthy a great Prince. Not being of a warlike Disposition, he was observed in Council, to be always inclined to Negotiation, rather than to vigorous Resolutions. As soon as he was out of his Childhood, he was seen to chuse Favorites, whose Inclinations suited with his own, or at least who artfully seemed to approve of whatever he did. Among these was, Alexander Nevill II, Archbishop of York, Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, a young Man full of Vivacity, whose youthful Salies were very pleasing to his Master, Michael de la Pole, a Merchant's Son of London (7), and Judge Trefilian, who never wanted Reasons to countenance whatever was agreeable to the King. These Favorites, who missed no Opportunity to flatter him, were amply rewarded for the least petty Services, whilst those who managed the publick Affairs, and took all the Pains, were very little regarded. This Behaviour began to be displeasing to the People, when an Accident, towards the end of this Year, quite put them out of Conceit with their Sovereign. One of the forementioned Courtiers, obtaining of the King, a considerable Grant, Richard Scrope the Chancellor, refused to annex the Great Seal to the Patent. He even plainly told the Person that solicited him, that the Duty of his Office would not suffer him to set the Seal, committed to his keeping by the Parliament, to all the King's indiscreet Grants, till he had acquired a little more Experience. Richard provoked at this Refusal, sent for the Great Seal, but he refused to deliver it, as holding it not of the King, but the Parliament. This Refusal still farther incensing the young Prince, he went himself to the Chancellor's to require his Obedience. Whereupon the Chancellor, delivered him the Seal, declaring he would serve him no more in any publick Post, but content himself with keeping in all other things the Allegiance due from a Subject to his Sovereign. Richard kept the Great Seal some Days in his Hands, and for fear another Chancellor should obstruct in like manner his inconsiderate Grants, he put the Seal himself to several Patents; and then delivered it to Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, who probably was not so scrupulous as his Predecessor. This Action, extolled by the Favorites with great Commendations of the King's Steadiness, displeased the rest of the Nation. The King began from thenceforward to be

It is ordained and assented in this present Parliament, That the King's Commandments be made, and directed to the Sheriffs and other Ministers of our Sovereign Lord the King, or other sufficient Persons desired and approved by the Certificates of the Prelates thereof, to be made in the Chancery from time to time, to arrest all such Preachers, and all their Followers, Followers and Associates, and to hold them in Arrest, and strong Prison, till they will, of their own Accord, to the King and his Council, and to the Church. For that Purpose, in the next meeting of the Parliament (1), the House of Commons resolved to remedy this Inconvenience, arising from the too great Authority, the King began to assume. The Power given to the Bishops to imprison Hereticks, was considered as very destructive to Liberty, since the Clergy thereby became in a manner absolute Masters of the Honour and Fortune of private Persons. The Complaints from all Parts, obliged the Commons to present a Petition to the King, to revoke a Concession to which they had not given their Consent (2). Richard who wanted Money, durst not reject the Parliament's Request. But some pretend, that by the Artifices of the Clergy, this Revocation was razed out of the Parliament Rolls, where it is not to be found.

The Schism still continued in the Church, to the great Scandal of the Christians, who were in doubt which of the two Popes was to be regarded as Chriff's Vicar. Urban, whose Party was strongest, perceiving Spiritual Weapons were insufficient, thought it more advantageous to use Temporal Arms. To that end, he published against Clement and his Adherents a Crusade, of which Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich was declared General. The Pope by this Bull granted the same Indulgences (3), to all that were willing to engage in this Undertaking, as to those who bore Arms against the Infidels. The Effect produced in England, by the publication of the Crusade, answered the Pope's Wishes. The Nobles, Gentry, People, and Clergy, engaged in it with the same Ardour as if they had been to wage War with the Enemies of the Christian Name. Whilst they waited for the Parliament's Approbation, which was not at all questioned, every one was diligently preparing to obtain the promised Indulgences, either by serving in Person in the War, or by contributing Money for promoting the same.

Whilst the Croisies were making their preparations, the Earl of Cambridge returned from Portugal, where he had met with the same Treatment the Earl of Buckingham his Brother had done in Bretagne. That is, the King of Portugal used the English Succours, to make an advantageous Peace with the King of Castile, to whom he even gave Beatrice his only Daughter, promised to the Earl of Cambridge's eldest Son. So the English Prince returned extremely dissatisfied, after losing all hopes of procuring his Son the Crown of Portugal, and helping to place the Duke of Lancaster his Brother on the Throne of Castile (4).

the Crusade.
Id. c. 110.*

The Parliament, which met in the beginning of the Year 1383 (5), not only approved of the Crusade published by Urban, but also granted a considerable Subsidy upon that account. When every Thing was ready, the Bishop of Norwich embarked the Croisies, consisting of fifty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. Upon his Arrival at Calais (6) he held a Council of War, to consider which way he should turn the Arms of the Croisies. Most were for entering France, since the Bull imported, that the Crusade was designed against Clement and his Adherents. Probably, for this reason, the Court of England had engaged so heartily in the Affair. But the General, for private Reasons not discovered in History, caused it to be resolved, that the War should be carried into Flanders. To colour this Resolution, it was alleged, that Flanders was a Fief of the Crown of France, though the Earl of Flanders had acknowledged Pope Urban. So, contrary to the Intention of the Court, and no doubt of the Pope himself, the Croisies invaded Flanders, and took Graveling, Bourbourg, Mardike, and Dunkirk. The Earl of Flanders, surprized at this unexpected Attack, levying some Troops with all possible Diligence, was fo raff, as with twelve thousand Men, to offer the Croisies Battle, who had received a strong Reinforcement from the Gantois. This daringness cost him dear, since he had the Misfortune to see his Army, his only Refuge, entirely routed. Reduced to this sad Extremity, and beholding his Country on the Point of being utterly destroyed, he saw no other way to free himself from this danger, but to apply to the Court of France. He represented to the young King's Council, how much it concerned France to save Flanders, and the more, because in all appearance, the design of the Croisies was not to rest satisfied with that single Conquest. The Court of France, roused by these Remonstrances, or rather by their own Interest, which would not suffer them to see Flanders fall into the Hands of the English, resolved to assist the Earl. Charles VI heading a powerful Army, marched against the Croisies, who were besieging Ypres. Upon his Approach they raised the Siege (7), and retired to Bourbourg, where they were invested. The Bishop-General, wanting Provisions for the Subsistence of his Army, would have been at a loss to free himself out of this freight, had not the Duke of Bretagne used his Interest in his favour. By the Mediation of this Prince, the Croisies obtained leave to retire, upon restoring the Places they had taken. Thus ended the Crusade, undertaken for the sole Interest of Urban, without the Pope or England receiving the least Benefit. When the Bishop was returned, the King ordered the Temporalities of his See to be seized (8), and several of his principal Officers imprisoned, for not following their Instructions.

Whilst the Croisies were employed in ravaging Flanders, England was a great Sufferer in her turn, by the frequent Descents of the French, and Incursions of the Scots. As there was no Army on foot to repulse these Enemies, the King was forced to call a Parliament (9), who granted him a Subsidy to continue the War with Scotland, the Conduct whereof was committed to the Duke of Lancaster. The King of Scotland being informed of the Preparations against him, sued for Peace, but it was absolutely refused.

Mean while, the Duke of Bretagne used his Endeavours to reconcile the two Crowns of France and England. With much solliciting, he at length prevailed with the two Kings, to send their Plenipotentiaries between Calais and Boulogne. But this Negotiation ended only in a Truce for ten Months (10), in which the Kings of Scotland and Castile, if they desired it, were to be included. The Duke of Burgundy, Uncle of the King of France, undertook to answer within such a time for the King of Scotland. But the Earl of Flanders his Father-in-law dying in this Interval, his care to take Possession of his Dominions, made him forget, or neglect, this Engagement. Mean while, whether the English thought the Scots would not be included in the Treaty, or were willing to reap some Advantage from the Expence they had been at, the Duke of Lancaster went (11) and ravaged Scotland, to the very Gates of Edinburgh. This Incursion obliged the King of Scotland to desire to be included in the Truce, which was granted, by the Mediation of the Duke of Burgundy.

Shortly after the Duke of Lancaster's Return, a certain Irish Monk came to Court, then at Salisbury (12), and discovered to the King a Secret of great Moment, namely, that the Duke of Lancaster his Uncle had conspired to murder the King, and seize the Crown. This Accusation was attended with so many Circumstances, that Richard could not help believing it. But the Duke, without the least Emotion, vindicated himself upon each Article, in such a manner that the King seemed satisfied. He ordered however the Accuser to be taken into Custody, either to punish him, or examine him more strictly.

1384: But when he was to be brought before the Council, he was found to be hanged over-night in the Prison, without any possibility of discovering the Author of this Outrage. This Accident did the Duke of Lancaster great Injury, because People were prejudiced against him, though it was as probable, that the Monk was murdered by the Authors of the Accusation, as by the Orders of the Party accused.

Walling. Another Accident, shortly after, confirmed the People in the Suspicion raised by the Monk's Report against the Duke of Lancaster. An Alderman of London, a great Favorite of the Duke, being charged with conspiring against the King, was found guilty, after a strict Examination. Though the Duke was then absent, his close Friendship with the Criminal, and the Endeavours of his Friends to prevent the Sentence, and afterwards to procure the King's Pardon, occasioned Reflections not at all to the Duke's Advantage. He was then upon an Embassy at Paris, where he spent fifty thousand Marks, in obtaining only the Prolongation of the Truce for some Months.

The Duke's Favorable. Ad. Pub. VII. p. 450. 451. P. 452. of the Duke's Life of Lancaster. Walling. If the Duke of Lancaster was not beloved by the People, he was no less hated by the Favorites, who could not hope to dispose of all things at their Pleasure, as long as he was in credit with the King. It is well known, the way of most Favorites is, not to suffer about their Master, any but their Creatures. These looking upon the Duke of Lancaster as a troublesome Inspector, and incapable of condescending to court them, believed they ought before all Things to be rid of that Prince. For that purpose, they all acted in Concert, to create in the King Suspensions, which should cause him to confide in this Uncle, as a very dangerous Enemy. Richard, who neither did, nor would, see any thing but with their Eyes, suffered himself to be so prejudiced, that he consented to a Resolution of accusing the Duke of High-Treason. Judge Trevelyan, a Man of a cruel and daring Temper, took upon him to draw up the Articles of Accusation, and manage the Evidences. He even offered to try him as a private Person, though by the Laws of the Land he could be judged only by his Peers. As this Plot could not be so secretly contrived, that the Duke should have no notice thereof, he thought it imprudent to deliver himself into the Hands of his Enemies, who were bent upon his Ruin. So, without troubling himself about his Vindication, he withdrew to his Castle of Pontefract, where he assembled some Troops, and made other Preparations in order to defend himself, in case of attack.

Though he had not many Friends, yet being persecuted by the Ministers, who were still less beloved than himself, he easily found People enough to take his Part. A Civil War was just going to be kindled in the Kingdom, when the Princess of Wales, the King's Mother, interposed to make Peace, before Hostilities were commenced. She succeeded at length, after many Journeys and Fatigues, and Richard, fatigued of the fatigues of the suspensions, suggested to him against the Duke his Uncle, received him again into favour (1).

1385. During these Broils, no Preparations were made for the War, though the late Truce with France and Scotland was about to expire. It was imagined, it might be renewed, but the King of France had other Designs. As he saw the Court of England in a perfect Security, he resolved to improve it, by making a powerful Effort, from which he promised himself great Advantages. To that end he sent a numerous Army into Guienne, hoping to finish the Conquest of that Dukedom, before the English should be able to oppose it. At the same time he sent the King of Scotland an Aid of a thousand Men at Arms (2), under the Command of John de Viennes, who was to make a powerful Diversion in the North (3), in order to favour the Descent of the French in the southern Parts of the Island. The Alarm taken by the English lay a great at all these Preparations, turned to their Safety. The Duke gave such pressing Orders to levy Troops, and the Orders were executed with such ardour and diligence, that, if the Historians are to be credited, Richard quickly saw himself at the Head of three hundred thousand Men. He detached sixty thousand, under the Command of the Duke of Lancaster, to march into Scotland (4), whilst with the rest, he himself expected the French on the southern Coast. Upon the Duke of Lancaster's Approach, the Scots, who were now ravaging the Borders of England, retired to the Center of their Kingdom, leaving the English General free to revenge his Countrymen, by his ravages in Scotland, where he had followed them. The French desired the great Army assembled by Richard, destroying the King of France's hopes of succeeding in his Project, he deferred the Execution to a more convenient Season. By that means Richard was at Liberty to march towards Scotland (5), with the Choice of his Army. In all likelihood, he would have entirely subdued that Kingdom; had he known how to improve his Advantages, since the King of Scotland was unable to withstand him. But the Favorites Jealousy of the Duke of Lancaster, who commanded under him, was the reason, so fair an opportunity was irrecoverably lost. The Scots perceiving the King of England, instead of pushing them vigorously, was amusing himself with ravaging the Country about Edinburgh, began to recover from their Fright, caused by his formidable Forces. As they were not able to attack him, they judged the best way to oblige him to quit Scotland, was to make a Diversion in his own Country. Pursuant to this Resolution, they removed at a greater Distance from the English Army, to make the King believe it was to avoid a Battle. But on a sudden, by speedy Marches they came into Cumberland, where they made terrible Ravages (6). Whilst they were marching thither, Richard never troubled himself to inquire after them. So, imagining they were fled, and satisfied with the Advantages already gained, he resolved, as not being fond of War, to return into England. He had Intelligence by the way, of the Scots entering Cumberland, and might easily have cut off their Retreat. But notwithstanding all the Duke of Lancaster's Endeavours to persuade him to a vigorous Resolution, he chose rather to follow the Earl of Oxford's Advice. This Favorite, who had a great Influence over him, persuaded him, that the Duke of Lancaster only fought to expose him to danger. This Advice corresponding with his Suspensions and Inclinations, he continued his march, without going in quest of the Enemy. All, but the Favorites, were so amazed at his unconcern for the Calamities of his Subjects of Cumberland, that they could not help loudly murmuring, and considering the King himself, as a Prince regardless of the good of the Publick.

Whilst the King was on his Journey to London, the Lord Holland (7), his half Brother, quarrelling with the Earl of Stafford's eldest Son (8), killed him, and took Sanctuary in Beverly Abbey. The Action was so heinous, that notwithstanding the Ties of Blood, Richard resolved to abandon the Murderer to the rigour of the Law. In vain did the Princess of Wales, their common Mother, intercede for her Son, she could never obtain his Pardon. This refusal sat so heavy upon her Mind, that she died with Grief a few days after (9). Nevertheless, whether the King was sorry for being so cruel to his Mother, or the Murderer found a more powerful Intercessor, the Princess was hardly in her Grave, when he granted the Pardon she had fled for in vain.

The fear of the French Invasion being vanished, the Duke of Lancaster brought his own Affairs upon the Board, and demanded Assistance of the King to prosecute his Right to the Crown of Castile. There could never be a more seasonable Juncture to obtain his desire. Ferdinand King of Portugal being dead, without leaving any legitimate Children but Beatrice Queen of Castile, the King her Husband pretended, the Crown of Portugal was devolved to his Queen, by the Death of the King her Father. But the Portuguese, not bearing the thoughts of living under the Dominion of the Castilians, had placed on the Throne John, natural Son of the late King. As this Quarrel could scarce possibly be decided but by Arms, the King of Castile entered Portugal, and advancing as far as Lisbon, laid Siege to the City. But meeting with a braver Defence than he expected, he was forced to retire. In the next Campaign he lost a Frontier Battle, which obliged him to quit Portugal, still hoping to compass his Ends, by the Assistance of France. The 1185, new King of Portugal finding, his Enemy was about to receive Aid from the King of France, sent Ambassadors to England, to make an Alliance with Richard, offering to acknowledge the Duke of Lancaster for King of Castile, and support his Right with all his Forces. Affairs in England were then in a Posture, very proper to render the Negotiation of the Portuguese Ambassadors successful. Richard, prejudiced against the Duke his Uncle, heartily wished his removal; his Favorites representing him as a dangerous Relation, and a very troublesome Governor. They told him moreover, it was his Interest to dethrone the King of Castile, sworn Enemy of the English, which was the more practicable, as the King of Portugal offered to make a powerful Diversion. The Duke of Lancaster hastened, with all possible Ardour, the Conclusion of this Affair, imagining, with the Forces of England, and Assistance of Portugal, it would not be impossible to succeed in his Design. All these Considerations induced the King's Council to give a favorable hearing to the King of Portugal's Proposals, and to promise the Duke of Lancaster an Aid proportionable to the Importance of the Undertaking. Pursuant to this Resolution, the King called a Parliament (1) to demand a Subsidy to enable him to accomplish this Project. The Commons readily granted it, and expressed great earnestness for the Expedition, not so much out of love to the Duke, as to remove him out of the Kingdom, where it was continually feared he would at last occasion Troubles fatal to the State. For that reason, they had this Affair so much at Heart, that the Clergy refusing to pay their part of the Subsidy (2), they petitioned the King to seize their Temporalities. Richard, who loved not his Uncle enough to quarrel with the Clergy for his sake, refused to comply with the Commons Request. His Moderation procured him from the Clergy, what Force would hardly ever have extorted from them. Thus the Duke of Lancaster, secure of the Parliament's Assistance, made, as King of Castile, a League offensive and defensive with the King of Portugal, and prepared for the War with all possible diligence.

In this same Parliament Roger Mortimer Earl of March was declared presumptive Heir of the Crown, in case Richard died without Issue. He was Son of Philippa, only Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, and Grandson of Roger Mortimer Earl of March, executed as a Traitor in the late Reign. But the Sentence passed upon him was afterwards repealed, because the Formalities prescribed by the Laws and Customs of the Realm were not observed at his Trial (3).

Before the Parliament broke up, the King conferred on the Earl of Cambridge (4), his Uncle, the Title of Duke of York; on the Earl of Buckingham (5), his other Uncle, that of Duke of Gloucester. He could not help raising these two Princes to higher Degrees of Honour, unless he would leave them below the Earl of Oxford (6), whom he created at the same time Marquis of Dublin, and quickly after, Duke of Ireland. This Favorite was the first that bore the Title of Marquis in England, where it was hitherto unknown. Michael de la Pole, another of the King's Favorites, was made Earl of Suffolk, and Lord Chancellor (7).

In the beginning of the Year 1386, Leo King of Armenia, expelled out of his Dominions by the Turks, came to England to confer with Richard. His Design was to procure a firm and lasting Peace between France and England, in expectation, that afterwards the two Crowns would join all their Forces to restore him to his Kingdom. But if he succeeded not in his Project, at least he obtained from Richard a considerable Pardon, and a yearly Pension of a thousand Pounds (8).

As soon as the Duke of Lancaster had finished his Preparations for his Spanish Expedition, he embarked at Portsmouth (9), with an Army of twenty thousand Men, among whom were two thousand Men at Arms (10). He sailed with him Constance of Castile, his Wife, and his two Daughters Philippa and Catherine, the first of whom he had by Blanch of Lancaster, and the other by Constance. The King and Queen accompanied them to Portsmouth, and wishing them good Success, presented them with two Gold Crowns. The Duke setting Sail, Richard made some stay at Brest, and obliged the Duke of Bretagne to raise the Siege of that Town, which all his solicitations had not yet been able to get out of the Hands of the English. Then pursuing his Voyage, he arrived August the 9th at Corunna, where he landed his Troops. Upon his Arrival, he made himself Master of several Places in Galicia, and at last of Compostella, where he passed the Winter. Whilst the Season prevented him from continuing his Progress, he concluded a Marriage between Philippa his eldest Daughter and the King of Portugal, and spent the rest of the Time in projecting the next Campaign.

The Duke of Lancaster's Departure, which had long before made a great Noise, prompted the Court of France to improve so favorable a Conjunction. As England, deprived of her best Troops, would be probably defenceless, Charles resolved to make a fresh Effort to conquer that Kingdom. To that end, he made such prodigious Preparations, that all Europe expected with Astonishment the success of this Undertaking. He had prepared nine hundred Transport Ships (11), and caused a wooden Fort to be made, (which could be taken in Pieces), for the Defence of his Army after landing. If the Duke of Berry his Uncle, who wanted to render the Project abortive, because, says a Historian, he was not the Author, had not too long delayed his coming, the French would have found England unprovided with Troops for her Defence. But the Duke not repairing to Shute till the 14th of September (12), Richard had time to prepare, as to have no reason to fear the mighty Efforts of his Enemies. Very likely, the great diligence of the English, rather than the Season, which was not too far advanced for so short a Passage, obliged the King of France to send his Troops into Winter Quarters.

As soon as the grand Designs of France were known in Richard England, Troops were levied with that speed and success, that an Army of two hundred thousand Men were drawn together (13). Part of these Forces were put into the Places most exposed, whilst the rest stood ready to hinder the Enemies landing. But as this Army was to be maintained, as well as raised, which could not be done without a very great Expence, a Parliament was called to consider of Ways and Means (14). The King demanding a Subsidy, proportionable to his Wants (15), the Parliament was very willing to grant it, but could not think of leaving the Money in the Power of the King and his Favorites, among whom the Marquis of Dublin, and the Earl of Suffolk, held the first Rank. These Lords were so universally and excessively odious, that in order to ruin them, the Parliament scrupled not to hazard the loss of the whole Kingdom. They presented an Address to the King, desiring that the Treasurer (16), and the Earl of Suffolk the Chancellor, might be removed from their Places. Moreover that all those might be called to an Account, through whose Hands the publick Money had passed, affirming, the King would find in the Con-

1156. fication of the Mismanagers Estates, wherewithal to answer the occasions of the State. Richard, who expected quite another thing, in the present Juncture of Affairs, received the Address with an Indignation, which it was not possible for him to conceal. He answered very sharply, that the Parliament ought to mind the Business for which they were called, and not meddle with what belonged not to them. He rashly added, that, To please the Parliament, he would not turn out the meanest Scullion in his Kitchen. At the same time he withdrew to Eltham, not staying for a Reply.

The King could not doubt, but so offensive an Answer would extremely incense the Commons, he sent, a few Days after, the Chancellor himself to order them, in an imperious manner, to grant the desired Subsidy. This Order, hitherto unusual in Affairs of this Nature, was received with so great a Concern, that the two Houses uniting upon this Occasion, as having one and the same Interest, sent the King word that they would proceed to no Business till he returned to his Parliament, and his Ministers were punished according to their Deserts. This Reply provoking the King to the highest degree, he commanded the two Houses to send him forty of their Members, to give an account of their Proceedings. But the Parliament was so far from complying, that they would have come to an open Rupture, if the most prudent had not prevailed with them, though with great difficulty, to send to the King the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, and the Bishop of Ely (1). These two Lords being come to Eltham, told the King in the Name of the two Houses, that as the Sovereign had Power to assemble them, they had likewise a Right to require his Presence in his Parliament. They added, it was enacted by an old Statute, That in case the King absented himself forty Days from his Parliament, without lawful Cause, the Members might return to their Homes; which they were resolved to do, if the King persisted to deprive them of the Honour of his Presence. To this vigorous Declaration Richard replied in a great Passion, and with no less Imprudence, That he plainly saw his Subjects were resolved to rebel against him, and therefore he had nothing more to do, than to desire the Assistance of the King of France, to reduce them to their Duty. The Lords made Answer, the King of France was the most mortal Enemy of the English Nation, as appeared in his present Endeavours to destroy them; therefore the King's desperate Resolution could not but proceed from the pernicious Advice of his evil Counsellors, who sought only to set him at Variance with his faithful Subjects. Upon these Words they withdrew, saying, their Orders were only to treat him to return to his Parliament, whose sole View was his and the Kingdom's Welfare.

The Deputies being retired, Richard came to more moderate Resolutions. Probably, the Ministers and Favorites were afraid of the Consequences which might attend a Rupture with the Parliament. In this Disposition, he repaired to the Parliament, and with a good Grace granted whatever they had required. The Chancellor was not only removed from his Office (2), but summoned to appear and give an account of his Administration, wherein he was notoriously guilty of many Misdemeanors (3). As for the Marquiss of Dublin, lately made Duke of Ireland, he was sent thither with a Pension of three thousand Marks (4), his whole Estate being confiscated by order of Parliament. This done, the two Houses appointed fourteen (5) Commissioners, to take care of the Publick Affairs jointly with the King. The Duke of Gloucester and the Earl of Arundel were authorized to examine the Publick Accounts, and how the King's Revenues had been disposed of. A few days after, the Chancellor being found guilty of Mismanagement, was compelled to restore all the Grants he had received of the King (6). These Grants were so excessive, that Richard himself, who had never computed them, could not help being surprized, and upbraiding his Favorite for abusing his Good-will.

Towards the end of this Session came the agreeable News of the French Army being separated, and their Fleet so damaged by a Storm (7) that it could not be fit to put to Sea again a good while. Of the great Number of Ships prepared by the French, the most Part foundered at Sea, or were lost on the English Coasts. Among the last were found some laden with Plank for building the Fort above-mentioned.

The Parliament breaking up as soon as the fear of the Invasion was passed (8), the King quickly gave Proof of his Levity, by recalling to Court the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and the Archbishop of York. He even affected to care for them more than before their Disgrace, and load them with fresh Favors. The Favorites returned their former Post with Hearts full of Revenge, especially against the two Commissioners of the publick Accounts, who by a strict Examination of their Conduct, had occasioned their Condemnation. It was not difficult to persuade the young King, they had suffered for his sake, and that the designs of their Enemies aimed not so much at the Ministers, as at the King himself. They represented to him, "That accusing the Councilors is a clear Evidence that the Sovereign is thought incapable of governing, and that the readiest way to discredit a Prince, is to perade his Subjects, he makes use of ill Ministers." These Insinuations frequently repeated, made so strong an Impression on the King's Mind, that he resolved to free himself from the Subjection of the Parliament. But the Favorites intimated to him, it would be a very difficult thing to execute, as long as the Duke of Gloucester was at the Head of the Factious. By this means they led him to consent to all their Plots for his Uncle's Destruction. When they were sure of the King's Approbation, they concerted the means to compass their Ends. They found no better way than to poison (9) the Duke, and some other of their principal Enemies, at a Feast to which they were invited by the City of London. But as they durst not execute this Plot, without securing the Mayor (10), he gave the Duke of Gloucester notice of it, who came not to the Feast.

Had it been as easy for the Favorites to destroy their private Enemies, as it was to draw upon them the King's Hatred, there would scarce have been left in the Kingdom a Lord capable of giving them any Umbrage. But even in a Government like that of England, particularly during a Minority, it is no easy thing for the King and his Ministry to do whatever they please. The Favorites then, in their continual Fears of being themselves prevented, were obliged to recur to secret ways to ruin their Enemies. Mean while, they continued to prejudice the King against his best Subjects, till being of Age, he might act with a more absolute Authority. The Earls of Arundel (11) and Nottingham (12), Admirals of England, putting to Sea in the beginning of the Spring (13), took a Fleet of French, Spanish and Flemish Merchant Men, and brought some of them to England (14), laden with Wine. After that they failed to Bretagne and relieved Brest, besieged by the Duke. This Service which deserved some Return from the King, only made them incur his Indignation. When they came from their Expedition, he would not vouchsafe even to speak to them, so much was he prejudiced against them by his Ministers. It was intimated to him, that the taking of these Ships would not fail of bringing Troubles upon him, which would very 1387. much embarrass him. The two Earls, highly offended at this uncivil Reception, resigned their Commission, which was given to the Earl of Northumberland.

Thus did the Favorites stir up their Master against the principal Lords, in hopes of reaping the Fruit of their Artifices, when the King should be of Age, of which he wanted but little. But an Accident which happened soon after, made them hasten the Execution of their Projects.

The Duke of Ireland presuming upon his Influence over the King, had the Insolence to divorce his Wife (1), Daughter of the Lord Cokay; and Grand-Daughter of Edward III, in order to marry Lancerena, Maid of Honour to the Queen, a Bohemian of mean Birth (2). Though this Divorce was very injurious to the Royal Family, Richard shewed not the least Concern. But it was not the same with the Duke of Gloucester, who highly resented the Affront, and declared he would revenge it the first opportunity. This Threat made the Duke of Ireland resolve to prevent him. To that end, after concerting the Means with the King, he feigned to go into Ireland, and took the Road to Wales, where the King was pleased to accompany him. But this pretended Voyage was only to consult more privately how to execute their Project of assuming an arbitrary Power, of which the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, Nottingham (3), were to feel the Effects. The Result of this Consultation was, that the King should raise an Army to terrify these Lords, and then call a Parliament, the Election whereof should be so managed, that the Members should be all at his Devotion; and that he should cause to be passed all such Acts as were necessary to secure him an unlimited Power.

As soon as the Plot was contrived, they went to Nottingham, where the King sent for all the Sheriffs, some of the principal Citizens of London, and all the Judges. When they were met, he communicated to them his Design of raising an Army to chastise such Lords, as he named to them; among whom was the Duke of Gloucester, and demanded of the Sheriffs what Number of Troops each could furnish him with. Then he told them, he intended to call a Parliament, and ordered them to let no Representative be chosen but what was in the List he should give them himself (4). The Sheriffs made answer, it was not in their Power to execute his Orders. That the People were so well inclined to the Lords he had mentioned, that there was no Prospect of levying an Army against them: That it was still more difficult to deprive the People of their Right of freely electing their Representatives in Parliament. But the Judges (5) were not so scrupulous in what related to them. The King asked them, Whether he had not power to turn out the fourteen Commissioners appointed by Parliament, and annul such Acts as were prejudicial to him? They replied, The King was above the Laws (6). Nevertheless, when they were required to subscribe their Opinion, some endeavoured to be excused, but were compelled to it by the Menaces of the Favorites. It is affirmed, one of the Judges (7) said aloud after signing, That never did Motion better deserve hanging than that he had just done. The Opinion of the Judges being thus extorted, Richard thought he had surmounted all Difficulties. He immediately issued out Commissions to levy an Army; but found so few willing to serve him, that he was forced to desist from his Project. Enraged at this Disappointment, he returned to London, after a fruitless Declaration of his Designs, which rendered him more odious to the Publick.

A Plot of this Nature, so openly contrived, and not executed, seldom fails of proving fatal to the Authors. The Duke of Gloucester, and the other Lords of his Party, perceived their Destruction was resolved; and if the King and his Favorites had not already sacrificed them to their Animosity, it was not for want of Will, but of Power. The only Remedy left in their opinion was, a recourse to Arms. But as prudent People use not that Method till all others prove ineffectual, the Duke of Gloucester thought he should try once more to remove the King's Prejudices. For that purpose, he sent the Bishop of London with respectful Assurances of his Allegiance, and an Offer to clear himself by Oath of the Crimes falsely laid to his Charge.

Richard seemed at first inclinable to admit of this Justification; but the Earl of Suffolk soon made him alter his Mind, by telling him, even before the Bishop, he would never be safe on the Throne as long as the Duke of Gloucester was alive. The Bishop of London was so offended at these Words, that he could not forbear saying to the Favorite, that being condemned by the Parliament, and holding his Life purely by the King's Grace, it became him less than any Man, to accuse Loyal Subjects. This Boldness was so displeasing to the King, that he commanded the Prelate to depart from his Presence. Affairs being come to this Point, and the proscribed Lords believing that a vigorous Defence was the only way left to screen them from the Designs of the Court, resolved at length to take Arms. As they were in great Credit with the People, who considered them as their Protectors, they had soon drawn together an Army of forty thousand Men, with which they marched directly to London.

The Diligence of the Lords broke all the Measures of the King and his Ministers. Richard was resolved to go to France, and restore to King Charles, Calais, and Cherbourg, in order to obtain a powerful Aid, which might enable him to reduce his rebellious Subjects, as he termed them. But the sudden Approach of the Lords not suffering him to execute this Design, there was a necessity of having recourse to other means, to free himself from the present Difficulties. The best way, as he thought; was to amuse the Malecontents, whilst the Duke of Ireland raised an Army in Wales, where he had many Friends. Pursuant to this Project, he sent word to the Male-content Lords, that he was ready to grant them all their reasonable Desires, and should be on the Morrow in Westminster-Hall, where they might come and present their Petition. The Lords gladly embraced the Offer, and taking care not to be surprized (8), repaired to the place appointed. They found the King seated on a Throne, in his Royal Robes, expecting their coming. As they approached the Throne, they fell on their Knees, in a suppliant Posture, though in effect it was not so much to ask Pardon, as to obtain of him the Punishment of his Ministers. The Bishop of Ely, who was Chancellor (9), asking the reason of their taking Arms, they replied, it was solely with Intention to procure the good of the King and Kingdom. Adding, the King's Person should be always inviolable to them, and that their Design was only to bring the Traitors about him to condign Punishment. Then they named in particular, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, the Archbishop of York, Judge Trevelyan, and one Brambar, an Alderman of London, who was of the same Cabal. The King gravely answered, that in the next Parliament (10) Justice should be done to all. Then he upbraided them for their Presumption, intimating, it was in his Power to crush them, but out of pure Condescension he was pleased to give them a favorable hearing.

After that he took the Duke of Gloucester by the Hand, and bidding them all rise, said, their Complaints should be considered. As he intended only to amuse them, he ordered a Proclamation to be published, to justify their appearing in Arms, in hopes they would be induced to dismiss their Troops. But they were too well acquainted with the Character of the King and his Ministers, to rely on their bare Word. Apprehensive of being suddenly oppressed, when they should be no longer feared, they resolved to continue in Arms till the Parliament was assembled. They quickly saw how necessary this Precaution was. The Duke of Ireland having levied an Army in Wales with great Expedition (11), marched with all speed to the King's Assistance. Had he been able to ap-

1387. proach London, it was not certain that the Citizens would join the Confederates. To prevent this Danger, the Earl of Derby (1), eldest Son of the Duke of Lancaster, went with part of the Army to meet the Duke of Ireland, and finding him in Oxfordshire (2) gave him Battle, and gained an easy Victory over a General who was nothing less than a Warrior. In the beginning of the Fight, the Duke, who was afraid of falling into the Hands of his Enemies, took to flight, without troubling himself about what became of his Army. All his Baggage being taken, in a Casket was found a Letter from the King, commanding him to march to London with all possible speed, and promising him to live and dye with him. This Defeat breaking all the King's Measures, the Duke fled into Holland, and, after some stay at Utrecht, went and lived at Lucan, where he died three Years after. The Earl of Suffolk would have retired to Calais, but the Governor (3) not daring, at such a Juncture, either to arrest or protect him, chose to send him back to the King. Mean while, Richard, uncertain how the victorious Lords would deal with him, took refuge in the Tower. He had the more reason to fear, as a Frenchman was seized at that time, bringing him a Safe-Conduct to come to Boulogne, where King Charles expected him. It was farther discovered by a Letter found upon the same Person, that Charles expected to be put in possession of Calais and Cherbourg, and had even advanced part of the Sum, he was to give for these two Places.

1388. The Confederate Lords being now fully satisfied of the pernicious Designs of the King, and his Ministers, marched their whole Army into London; and then demanded a Conference with the King. Richard would have been excused, but, as he saw no remedy, and was apprehensive of starving in the Tower, durst not refuse it. At this Interview, they bitterly upbraided him with the Nottingham Plot to destroy them; with his design to make himself Absolute, by means of an Army; with his attempting to have a Parliament at his Devotion; with his Orders to the Duke of Ireland to march to London, whilst he was amusing them with vain Promises; Lastly, with his Treaty with the King of France, to deliver up Calais and Cherbourg. Richard answered these Reproaches, with a Shower of Tears, which moved the Lords. They imagined, the King's ill Conduct proceeded only from his little Experience, and the bad Counsels of his Favorites, and as they were removed, he would be reclaimed. This belief rendering them more tractable, it was agreed, the King should on the Morrow be at Westminster, to settle with them the Affairs of the Government. Hardly were they out of the Tower, before he altered his Mind, and sent them word, he would not confer with them. This Fickleness incensed them, that they immediately let him know, in case he came not to Westminster next day, according to his Promise, they would go themselves, and proceed to the Election of a new King. So precise a Declaration threw him into such a Fright, that he not only came to the Place of Conference, but consented also to the Banishment of his two principal Favorites, with the Archbishop of York (4), the Bishops of Durham and Chichester (5), and several other Lords (6) and Ladies (7), who had favoured the Designs of the Court. As for the Judges, since it was designed to treat them with the utmost Rigour, they were taken off the Benches in Westminster-Hall, and sent to the Tower.

The Parliament being assembled in February (8) 1389, several Persons were accused of High-Treason, and sentenced to divers Punishments. Tresilian, Brembar (9), and some other Knights and Gentlemen were hanged at Tyburn. The rest of the Judges, with the Bishop of Chi- chester, received the same Sentence; but had their Lives granted them, and were banished to Ireland (10). As for the two Favorites, and the Archbishop of York, they were condemned to exile, and their Estates confiscated to the King's Use (11).

After the Parliament had thus paid what was thought due to Justice, two Acts were passed, the first of which forbade the ascribing to the King the late Commotions, and the other, granted a general Pardon to both Parties. Matters being thus settled, the King renewed his Coronation-Oath, as if he begun a new Reign, and all the Lords did him Homage, and repeated their Oaths of Allegiance (12). This Parliament, called the Merciless, did not break up till June the 4th.

During the Troubles in England, the Scots willing to take Advantage of the Juncture, were advanced as far as Newcastle, under the Conduct of Sir William Douglas (13), and committed great Ravages on the Borders. As soon as these Commotions were appeased, Henry Percy, first named Hotspur, Son of the Earl of Northumberland, marched against the Scots, and giving them Battle, slew Douglas with his own hand. But the Earl of Dunbar coming upon him during the Battle, with a Body of fresh Troops, so changed the Scene, that the English Army was at length defeated, and Hotspur taken Prisoner.

About the same time, the Earl of Arundel, whom the Parliament had made High-Admiral, went to the Assistance of the Duke of Bretagne, attacked by the King of France. This Aid obliging Charles to grant the Duke Peace, the English were sent Home. In his return, the Earl of Arundel, took from the French, eighty freighted Ships, and plundered the Isles of Ree and Oleron: after which he failed with his Fleet to England. Shortly after, the two Crowns agreed upon a three Years Truce, wherein the Scots were included.

Since the last Parliament, England remained in Tranquillity. The new Ministers being guided by different Maxims from those of the old, took care not to engage the King in such Proceedings that had like to prove his Ruin. But though the King's Council was successfully changed, it was not so easy to change his Temper. Full of his own Merit, he was extremely concerned to be under the direction of others, when he was of Age to hold the Reins of the Government himself. Upon his entering into his Two and twentieth Year, he called his Council, ordering all the Members to be present. When they were met, he demanded of them how old he was, to which answer was made, he was full Twenty Years of Age. Since it is so, added he, I will govern my Kingdom my self; the Condition of a King ought not to be worse than that of his Subjects, who are at Liberty at that Age to manage their own Affairs. Having thus made known his Intentions, he commanded the Chancellor (14) to deliver him the Great-Seal, which he gave to the Bishop of Winchester (15). At the same time he turned out the Bishop of Hereford from being Treasurer, and removing from the Council-Board the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, the Earl of Warwick, and some others whom he did not like, put such in their room as he believed more pliant to his Will. This Proceeding was not in itself strange, since it was in his Power to make these Alterations. However, it was remarked, he had never given less Signs of Prudence, which those who began to be of Age are supposed to have, than in the Choice of his new Ministers, who were by no means qualified for their Posts. Accordingly it was not long before Disorder and Confusion were visible in the Publick Affairs. The Favorites first care was, to insinuate to the King, that the Duke of Gloucester had ill Designs upon his Person. But 1389. the Duke to fully vindicated his Innocence, that the King was ashamed of giving Ear to so groundless a Charge. He would not however suffer the Duke to prosecute his Accusers, though they were confuted in his Presence.

1390. Whilst Richard was apprehensive of the Attempts of this Uncle, who was represented to him as a very dangerous Enemy, he saw another arrive, who was no less formidable. This was the Duke of Lancaster, who was returned from his Spanish Expedition (1). The Progress he had made in that Country, had at length obliged the King of Castile to make a Treaty with him, promising to pay down six hundred thousand Livres, with a yearly Pension of forty thousand (2), during the Lives of him and his Dutcheis. This Treaty was followed by a Marriage of the Princess Catherine, the Duke's Daughter by Constance, with Henry, eldest Son of the King of Castile, on account of which the Duke and Dutcheis resigned their Pretensions to that Crown.

Though Richard was not very well pleased with the Duke of Lancaster's Arrival, he received him however with such Careless, as gave room to hope for a happy Union in the Royal Family for the future. This hope was confirmed, by the Reconciliation procured by the Duke of Lancaster (3), between the King and the Duke of Gloucester; a Reconciliation seemingly so sincere on the King's Side, that all the World was deceived. Notwithstanding these fair Appearances, the Duke of Lancaster's Preference was very grievous to Richard. This may be judged by the Price wherewith he was willing to purchase his Absence. To attain his Ends, he made him the richest Present that a King of England could then make a Subject, by investing him with the Dutchy of Guienne, with the same Privileges as were granted to the late Prince of Wales, the King's Father. As he had never any Affection for him, his making him so noble a Present, could be only with a View to remove him from England (4).

Shortly after the Earl of Derby, eldest Son of the Duke of Lancaster went (5) and bore Arms in Prussia, where he signalized himself by many gallant Actions. Whilst this Prince was endeavouring to gain a Reputation by his warlike Exploits, Richard passed his time in Sham-Fights. He spent immense Sums in Tournaments, which gave occasion to compare him, very much to his Disadvantage, with his Cousin the Earl of Derby, who was in great Esteem (6).

Whilst the King was employed in these Diversions, the Parliament revived a Statute, enacted in the Reign of Edward III, and confirmed in this. By this Act it was made High-Treason to bring into the Kingdom Provisions from the Court of Rome, without the King's License. A Nuncio, sent to England upon this Account (7), made a great Noise, and even threatened that the Pope would proceed to Extremities. But his Menaces were incapable of obliging the Parliament to annul the Act. All he could obtain was a Reprieve for this new sort of Offenders, till the ensuing Parliament (8).

Though a terrible Plague, and a Famine no less intolerable, then afflicted England, the King, who was excessively fond of Pageantry and Pomp, retrenched none of his Diversions or Expences, which ran out to prodigious Sums. He is said to entertain daily six thousand Persons. He valued himself upon surpassing in Magnificence all the Sovereigns of Europe, as if he had been possessed of an inexhaustible Fund of Treasure. In his Kitchen alone, three hundred Domesticks were employed, and the Queen had the like Number of Women in her Service. The Courtiers so readily obtained whatever they asked, that the King's Favours were the less valued. In short, he affected in every thing a Profuseness, which could not but be very chargeable to his Subjects, and by a necessary Consequence draw on him their Aversion.

As his Revenues were not sufficient for so many Expences, he had a mind to try to obtain some Assistance from the Londoners. But, not to frighten them, he was contented first to see how they stood affected, by borrowing only a thousand afterwards to such a Trifle. How inconceivable a very mortifying Manner, even to the cutting in pieces by the Populace an Italian Merchant, who offered to lend the Money himself. Richard highly resented this Affront, which he soon after found an Opportunity to revenge. Under colour of punishing a Tumult of his little Consequence, raised by a Baker's Apprentice, he stripped the City of all her Privileges (9), took away her Charter, and removed the Courts of Justice to York. It is true, he afterwards restored the whole, but the Londoners were obliged to redeem their Charter with a Present of ten thousand Pounds, and two Gold Crowns. But though they paid dearly for refusing to lend the King a thousand Pounds, it was nothing in comparison of the Prejudice the King himself received by it. By this Proceeding he entirely forfeited the Affection of the Citizens, who made him sensible afterwards, how dangerous it is for a King of England to have London for his Enemy (10).

In the beginning of the Year 1393, arrived at London Deputies from the English settled in Ireland, imploring Assistance against the Natives (11). For some time there had been frequent Insurrections in the Island, which showed, the Irish wanted to shake off the Yoke of the English. These Disorders should have had a speedy Remedy, but Richard, too much addicted to his Pleasures, had neglected the Affairs of Ireland, as if he had been wholly unconcerned. At last, the Mischief was so increased, that he could not, without hazarding the Loss of the Island, any longer delay applying a suitable Remedy. The Duke of Gloucester offered to go and suppress the Rebels (12); but the King not thinking proper to trust him with the Command of an Army, resolved to go himself. In this Resolution he called a Parliament (13), which granted him a large Sum as well for the Duke of Lancaster and Gloucester, who were to negotiate a final Peace with France. But this Affair came to nothing by an Accident, which prevented the meeting of the Plenipotentiaries between Arden and Guisnes, according to Agreement. King Charles, who was from time to time seized with a Dilemper, which deprived him of his Understanding, being come to Abbeville on purpose to let the English see he was in his Senses, fell into one of his usual Fits. This Relapse occasioned the deferring of the Negotiation to a more convenient Season.

The King's Preparations for his Voyage to Ireland, were somewhat interrupted in the beginning of the Year 1394, by the Funerals of his Queen (14), and of the Duchesses of Lancaster (15), and York (16), who died about the same time. It is said the Queen was a great Favourer of Wickliff's Doctrine, and had she lived any lont394. ger, would have saved the Lollards (1)³ (so Wickliff's Followers were called,) many of the Calamities they afterwards endured. The Departure of the Duke of Lancaster, their chief Patron, who was gone to take possession of the Principality of Guienne, not a little contributed to hasten the Designs of their Enemies, who improved these favorable Junctures to persecute them.

How great soever Richard's Grief was for the Death of the Queen, he set out however for Ireland, according to his Project (2). He arrived there in September (3), and at first made some Progress against the Rebels. But as the Season would not permit him to proceed, he went to Dublin, where he held a Parliament, whilst the Duke of York assembled another in England (4), which granted a Subsidy for prosecuting the Irish War.

1195. Richd was preparing to take the Field again, when the Archbishop of York, and Bishop of London, arrived from England, to intreat him in the Name of the Clergy, to hasten his return. They even intimated, that the least Delay might bring an irreparable Damage to Religion. The Foundation of this great Alarm was, that in the late Parliament, the Lollards had made Infiances to set on foot a Reformation of the Church (5). As they had many Friends in the Kingdom, and in the Parliament itself, the Clergy were afraid they would proceed to this Reformation. For which reason, the two deputed Prelates so magnified the Danger, Religion was in, that Richard immediately departed for England (6), leaving to the Earl of March the Management of the War. Upon his Arrival at London, he took certain Measures with the Clergy to suppress the Sect of the Lollards, and compelled Sir Richard Story publicly to abjure their Doctrine, threatening to punish him with Death if ever he relapsed to that Sect.

Shortly after, was brought into England, by the King's Order, the Corpse of the Duke of Ireland, who died at Lewinstun. This Object reviving the King's Affection, he caused the Coffin to be opened, that he might once more have the Pleasure to see the Man whom he had so tenderly loved. Then he ordered him a magnificent Funeral, and was pleased to honour it with his Presence, as Edward II. had formerly done with regard to Gaveston.
 But the Nobility would not show that Respect to a Favorite, of whom they had so much Cause to complain. So that, like Edward II. Richard was attended at the funeral Pomp, with only some of the Clergy (7).

Kingdom.

When the King was employed in his Irish Expedition, the Duke of Lancaster, who was gone to Bourdeaux to cause his Sovereignty to be acknowledged, had met with unexpected Obstacles. The Galcoms, pretending, their Country was inseparably united to the Crown of England, maintained, it was not in the King's Power to alienate it. This pretension was strengthened with a motive of Interest, which confirmed them in their Obstinance. They said, if they were once separated from England, they ran the risk of being deprived of the only Protection, capable of preventing their falling under the Dominion of France. For this reason, they asserted the Alienation in question was equally prejudicial to themselves and the Crown of England. Some objected, that they have never made the same Squall with regard to the Prince of Wales, the King's Father. But they replied, there was a wide Difference between that Alienation and this. That the first being made in favour of the next Heir to the Crown, was to be only for a time, whereas this might easily happen to be for ever. After several Contentions on this Subject, which lasted some time, the King refused at length to revoke the Grant, to which the Duke of Lancaster, since he could not help it, readily submitted. To comfort him in some measure for this loss, the King gave him leave to marry Catherine Rowet, Widow of Sir Thomas Swinford (8). The Duke had long kept her as his mistress, and had by her several Children, who were legitimated by the King and Parliament, by the Name of Beaufort. Some time after, the King created the eldest, Earl of Somerset (9).

Before the De of Lancaster's Arrival the King had sent Ambassadors to France (10), to demand in marriage Isabella, Daughter of Charles VI. The Court of France had at first rejected this Proposal, because the Princess was but seven Years old, and besides was promised to the Duke of Bretagne. However, notwithstanding these Difficulties, the Marriage was concluded, in a second Negotiation, and withal, a twenty eight years Truce between the two Crowns. Shortly after both the Kings met between Ardes and Calais, under Tents pitched on purpose, where the two Courts displayed all their Magnificence, and where the Treaty was signed and the Nuptials solemnized (11). Richard is said to expend on this Occasion three hundred thousand Marks, a Sum far exceeding that of two hundred thousand, which he received in deduction of what was promised him with his Queen. The Duke of Glocester, who liked neither the Marriage nor the Truce, could not forbear showing his Discontent. He frankly told the King, it would have been more advisable to attempt, by a vigorous War, to recover what England had lost in France, than to enter into an Alliance with a Crown, that had all along gained more advantages by Treaties with the English, than by the Success of its Arms.

The King's usual Expence, with the Charges of his late Marriage, having entirely drained his Exchequer, and even obliged him to borrow large Sums, there was a necessity of recurring to extraordinary Ways to fill his Coffers. Though the Parliament which met in the beginning of the Year 1397 (12), granted him a very considerable Sum, it was not sufficient to enable him to pay his Debts. Besides, he took occasion to increase the Expence of his Household, from a Report that the Electoral Princes had cast their Eyes upon him, to raise him to the Imperial Dignity, and thereby reduced himself to still greater Streights. As he was ashamed to demand a fresh Supply from the Parliament, he had recourse again to Borrowings, or rather to extorted Grants, which he exacted from the Rich. There was not a Lord, Bishop, Gentleman, or rich Burgeis, but what was obliged to lend him Money, though it was well known he never designed to repay it. But though this Method of raising Money upon the People, had ever been considered by the English, as one of the greatest Breaches of their Privileges, it occasioned no Commotion. Every one was intimidated, and though this Injustice was highly reſented, it was taken patiently, in hopes it would be the last.

warre*, and of Bressl to the Duke of Bretagne, was not looked upon with the same Tranquillity. Though these two Places belonged not originally to England, the English had been at so great an Expence in aiding the Princes, to whom they appertained, that they might have been justly kept till the whole was repaid. This occasioned a general Dissatisfaction, and the more, because it brought the King but an inconsiderable Sum, which was also lavished away in needless Expences. It is true he pretended, his Engagement to restore these Places after a Peace, or a long Truce with France, made this Restitution necesary; but it was well known also that the King of Navarre, and the Duke of Bretagne had failed him first. Be this as it will, the Duke of Gloucester thought this Fault prejudicial to England, that he could not help upbraiding the King in very sharp Terms; to which Richard made such a Reply as plainly showed how much he was offended at his Remonstrance. This Accident revived the King's former hatred of the Duke of Gloucester, which being rather stifled than extinguished, showed itself from time to time; how careful soever he might be to conceal it.

1. 4. c. 32.

He complained to the Dukes of Lancaster and York, that the Duke of Gloucester took upon him to controule his Actions, and amongst his Complaints, he dropped some Expressions, which made them think he suspected all three of having ill Designs upon him. The two Princes protested they had an unshaken Loyalty for him, and did not question but the Duke their Brother had the same, though his hasty Temper caused him sometimes to speak with too much Warmth. The King appeared satisfied with their Justification. However, his Easiness to be appeased, after showing so great Anger, bred in them Suspicion, which induced them to quit the Court, and retire to their Estates. Their withdrawing was probably the occasion of the Duke of Gloucester's Ruin, as it gave his Enemies an opportunity to inflame the King's Displeasure against him, and to determine him at length to be rid of so troublesome an Inspector. But as nothing could be found in his Conduct which might expose him to the Rigour of the Law, and besides it would be dangerous to destroy him that way, Richard resolved to make use of a speedier and more certain Method. To execute this Design, he came one Morning to his Uncle's Country House, and finding him in Bed, desired him to rise immediately, and go with him to London. He pretended, he wanted him in a very important Affair, which he would impart to him on the Road. The Duke presently mounting his Horse, rode by the King, who talked to him about the pretended Affair, without showing he had any other Design. Whilst they were discoursing together, they came to a hollow Way, where the Duke was suddenly surrounded with some Horse-Men, and carried on board a Ship, which lay ready in the Thames to convey him to Calais (1).

He served the Lord Cobham in the same manner with some others (3), whom he designed to get rid of. Mean time, the Intelligence he received of the People's beginning to stir, obliged him to issue out a Proclamation, declaring, these Lords were taken into Custody for new Misdemeanours, and promising they should be proceeded against according to Law.

VIII. p. 6.

This Proclamation having somewhat appeased the People, the King summoned all the Peers of the Realm to Nottingham (4). This was done with design to found them, rather than ask their Advice concerning the manner of proceeding against the Prisoners, since he was already determined. However he made use of this Pretence to convene them. After the Affair was debated in Council, the Lords (5) fearing to incur either the King's Indignation, or the Hatred of the Publick, if they came to any Resolution, declared it to be of such a Nature that it could only be decided by the Authority of the Parliament. This was precisely what the King wanted. He had already taken all necessary Measures to have a Parliament at his Devotion. Some time since, he had changed all the Sheriffs of the Kingdom, and suffered none, but what had promised to be subservient to his Designs. He had taken the same Precautions, with respect to all Officers that had Credit and Power in the Burroughs and Counties. So by means of the Magistrates, and Persons in publick Posts, he had caused such Representatives to be chosen as he had secured beforehand. If any were elected not agreeable to him, the Sheriffs were ordered not to return them, but to cause others to be chosen in their room. Besides, as the House of Commons were the sole Judges in the Affair of Elections, he was well assured that such a Parliament, would confirm or reject whom he pleased. It must not be thought very difficult for a King of England to execute such a Project. Experience has since confirmed, on numberless Occasions, that by the like ways, it is very possible, to cause Representatives to be chosen devoted to the Court. However, Historians remark, that it was in this Parliament, that such Practices were first used. But it must likewise be added, that it was one of the principal Causes of Richard's Destruction, as will be seen hereafter. And indeed it is impossible that a Nation can see their Liberties in the Hands of Men, whom they have not themselves freely chosen, without desiring to be delivered from such an Oppression.

For this new sort of Offence, the Archbishop was condemned to Banishment, and his Estate confiscated to the King's use. Then the Earls of Arundel (8) and Warwick (9), were accused (10) of the same Crimes, for which nine Years before the King had granted a Pardon, and sentenced to die by this truly merciful Parliament. Freyffart says, the King would be present at Arundel's Execution. Another Historian adds, that the Spectacle remained so deeply imprinted in his Memory, that his Sleep was often interrupted by Dreams, representing to him the Earl covered with Blood, and upbraiding him with his Injustice. To this contributed, perhaps, the Rumour that several Miracles were wrought at the Tomb of the deceased (11), and that his Head was miraculously re-joined to his Body. Though to prevent the ill Consequences of this false Notion, the King had ordered the Corpse to be taken up and exposed to publick View, ten Days together, in a Church, it was not possible to cure the People of their Prepossession. As for the Earl of Warwick who willingly confessed himself guilty, without taking Advantage of the Pardon, he was treated with less Rigour, his Punishment being changed into perpetual Banishment in the Isle of Man. As to the Duke of Gloucester, in all Appearance, the King was apprehensive it would be very dangerous to put him to death publicly, or that the Parliament would not be so compliant as to sacrifice so considerable a Person. Be this as it will, he had taken care

(1) The Account given of this Transaction, by Freyffart, is as follows: "The King, under pretence of a Hunting-Match, came to a Seat of his near Ramford in Essex, called Howering Bower; from whence he set out one Summer's Afternoon, and came about five a-Clock (only with a few Attendants, having left the rest at Waltham) to the Duke's Castle at Plym in the same County, as if it were to give him a Visit." "He was received by the Duke and his Daughters with all due Honour and Respect; and Supper was got ready for his Majesty. But before he sat down, he desired the Duke to order five or six of his Hories to be saddled, to accompany him that Night to London; for that he himself, with his two Uncles of Lancaster and York, was to hold a Council the next Day, in which he wanted also his Advice, what Answer to give the Londoners, to a Petition they were to present him. Upon this the Duke, who suspected no harm, taking along with him only three Esquires, and two servants, accompanied the King towards London; who took the way of Boreley (or Epping-Ford) to avoid the great Road, and Boreley, (perhaps Brentwood) and other Towns; still talking familiarly with the Duke, as they went along. When they came near Stratford, between ten and eleven of the Clock, the King putting Spurs to his Hories, rode away before; and at the same time Thomas Mowbray Earl-Marshall, who lay in the Castle of Plym, where King Richard came to the Duke, was the Seat of the High-Constables at England even before the Conquest. Thomas of Woodstock became possessed of it, by his marrying Eleanor, eldest Daughter, and one of the Coheirs of Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Essex. Of this famous and ancient Castle, nothing now remains but the Mount." 1197. as was afterwards known, to have him privately strangled (1) at Calais. Mean time, his Enemies gave out he died of an Apoplexy, and before he expired, confessed himself guilty of Treason against the King. Upon this Report, without any examination of the Grounds, the Duke's whole Estate was confiscated to the King's Use.

It was almost impossible that these Severities should not produce some alteration among the Nobility. But, to prevent Accidents, Richard took care to gratify the principal Lords, and particularly the Princes of the Blood. He created [Henry] Earl of Derby his Cousin, eldest Son of the Duke of Lancaster, Duke of Hereford. [Edward Plantagenet,] Earl of Rutland, eldest Son of the Duke of York, was made Duke of Alenmarle. [Thomas de Holland] Earl of Kent, received the Title of Duke of Surrey. [John de Holland,] Earl of Huntingdon, the King's half Brother, was created Duke of Exeter. [Thomas Mowbray,] Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; and [Sir William le Scrope] Earl of Wiltshire (2). Lastly, made [John Beaufort] his eldest Son by his third Marriage, who was already Earl of Somerset, Marquis of Somerset (3). To these honorable Titles he added other Favours, by distributing among these Lords the forfeited Estates of the Duke of Gloucester, and of the Earls of Arundel and Warwick (4).

In those Days the Parliament seldom sat above one Session, unless the Business required a short Prorogation. But this was too well disposed for the King to be willing to run the hazard of having one less devoted to him. So, not thinking it to dissolve it, he was pleased to adjourn it to Shrewsbury; this Town, in the Neighbourhood of Wales, where he had many Friends, seeming more proper for his Designs than London, where he knew he was not beloved.

The new Session (5) was only a Continuation of the extraordinary Proceedings already began at Westminster. The Parliament strove to carry the Prerogative Royal to a greater height than any King of England had ever pretended to stretch it, and established such Maxims as were destructive of the Constitution and Liberties of the People. They approved, as conformable to Law, the Opinions for which, nine Years before, the Judges were condemned. Pursuant to this Principle, the Judges who attended during the sitting of the Parliament, decided, that When the King proposed any Articles to be debated in Parliament, it was High-Treason to bring in others before the King's were first dispatched. By this and the like decisions, the Cases of High-Treason were so multiplied, that hardly was it possible to prevent falling into that Crime, unless by making the King's Will and Pleasure the sole Rule of Action (6). At last, under colour of dispatching Business, the Parliament appointed a certain Number of Commissioners (7), who were invested with the Authority of the whole House. Thus by an unprecedented Act, the whole Power of the Nation was devolved to the King, twelve Peers, and six Commons. To give the more strength to these irregular Proceedings, the King caused them to be confirmed by the Pope's Bull, which was published in all the Counties of the Kingdom (8).

During this second Session, Richard brought into Shrewsbury a numerous Guard of the Militia of Cheshire, who expressed so strong an Inclination to serve him, that to gratify the County, he erected it into a Principality (9).

Let us stay here a Moment, and reflect on the Constitution of the English Government. It is certain, the Institution of Parliaments is very advantageous to the Kingdom, being the only support of the Liberties of the People, who, without that, would long since have fallen into a fatal Slavery. But on the other hand, it cannot be denied, that these Assemblies become sometimes very dangerous, when influenced by Popular Factions, or the Cabals of an ambitious Prince. Accordingly, it has often happened, that, instead of procuring the Good of the Realm, they have produced Confusion, and the Subversion of the Laws, one while by too much depressing the Prerogative Royal, another while, by carrying it higher than is consistent with the Welfare of the Nation. At such times, the Evil is so much the harder to be cured, as what is done by the Parliament is deemed to flow from the unanimous Consent of the whole Nation. For this reason, it rarely happens that this disorder can be remedied, but by means as violent as those made use of to produce it, from whence generally spring Civil Wars. This is one of the principal Causes of the domestic Troubles which have all along afflicted England more than any other European State.

It may be further observed, that the violent Method practised by Richard to attain to Arbitrary Power, I mean forced Elections, and the Opinions of the Judges, was exactly copied in our days by one of his Successors, who had without doubt the same Intention. But we may add, that the Attempts of these two Monarchs served only to promote their own Destruction, and that their designs came to the same Catastrophe. This is what we are going to see, with regard to Richard II, in the remaining Part of his Reign.

Every thing seemed to contribute to the support of the King, in the Enjoyment of the despotick Power he had lately assumed. They who would have been mistaken capable of opposing his designs, had suffered a tragical Death, or were banished the Realm, and they who still remained, were gained by Places, Grants, or other sorts of Favours. The great Officers of the Crown, the Governors of the Towns and Counties, were all devoted to the King. Among the Magistrates of the Towns and Country, not one was suffered but what was ready to promote, to the utmost, the Increase of the Royal Power. Notwithstanding all these Advantages, Richard was much mistaken, in imagining this new-acquired Power was safe, since the People were not for him, but on the contrary, hated him for his violent Actions. It is even likely, that among those whom he accounted his Friends, there were many who out of Weakness or Prudence, did but conceal their real Sentiments, till an opportunity offered to free the Kingdom from the Yoke it began to groan under. And an opportunity presented it self sooner than the King imagined; for suffering himself to be swayed by his Passion, he had not the Prudence to keep within those Bounds, an Error which Princes of his Character seldom fail of committing. As they are always surrounded with Flatterers, they fancy all the rest of the People are in the same Sentiments, and generally it is too late before they perceive, that the small Numbers they have gained, is a weak Defence against the Fury of an enraged Nation. For a while, five or six hundred Persons, who compose the Parliament, and some hundreds of Magistrates in the Towns and Counties, seem to make the Body of the Nation, and the rest are reckoned as nothing. But a Time comes when every single Person must be taken into the Account, and then the Number of those that are in Office, is infinitely small in comparison of the rest of the Nation.

Richard, incapable of making these Reflections, suffered himself to be blindly guided by his Passion, which made him consider, as a great Advantage, all occasions of exercising the Arbitrary Power he thought to have firmly established. Towards the end of the Year 1398, he gave a signal Proof of the little regard he intended to have for his Subjects, on occasion of a Quarrel between two of the principal Lords of his Court. The Duke of Hereford, eldest Son of the Duke of Lancaster, swayed by the Examples of the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, and the other Lords, whom the King had sacrificed to his Revenge, limiting his Desires, made it the height of his Ambition, to keep in his favour; and carefully endeavoured voured to avoid giving any cause of Suspicion. It was, probably, from this Consideration, that fearing the Duke of Norfolk had laid a Snare for him, in speaking to him very disrespectfully of the King (1), he informed Richard of the same. The Duke of Norfolk denying he had ever spoken against the King, and the Duke of Hereford maintaining his Accusation, it was ordered, that the Affair should be decided according to the Law of Chivalry, that is, by single Combat (2). Country was appointed for the Duel, at which the King would be present in Person. But just as the two Dukes were entering the Lists, the King, on pretence of avoiding the Effusion of Blood, but in reality to be rid of these two Lords at once, commanded them to proceed no farther. Then, though there could be but one guilty, he banished them both, the Duke of Norfolk for Life, and the Duke of Hereford for ten Years. The former died shortly after at Venice, and the other retired into France (3). This Act of Authority was no less contrary to the Privileges of the Nobility, than what the King had hitherto done with regard to the whole Nation in general; for by the Laws of the Land, these Lords could only be tried by their Peers. But at that time the Privileges of the People were little regarded.

Not long after the Duke of Hereford's departure, his Father, the Duke of Lancaster died (4) little lamented by the People, and still less by the King, who could not help fearing him. By the death of this Prince, his Honours and Estates, which were very considerable, fell to the Duke of Hereford's Son, to whom before his departure, the King had remitted four Years of his Banishment. Moreover, he had granted him Letters Patents, empowering him, though in Exile, to take possession by his Attorney of the Fees, that should happen to fall to him in his Absence, with a suspension of Homage till his return (5). Notwithstanding, immediately after the death of the Duke his Father, the King, by a Sentence no less unjust than the former, decreed, that his Banishment should be perpetual, and confiscated all his Estate.

By such Acts of despotick Power, the Laws and Liberties of England were in a deplorable State. The Dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester, and the Earl of Arundel being dead, Warwick sent away, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Dukes of Hereford and Norfolk in Exile, there was scarce a Man in the Kingdom able to oppose the Arbitrary Power usurped by the King. The Duke of York alone, the King's Uncle, might have defended the Nation's Interests. But as he loved his ease, he was no proper Person to engage in such an Undertaking. Richard seeing himself therefore above all restraint, gave himself up to a soft and effeminate Life, regardless of the Good of the Publick. Mean time, his Ministers, little qualified for their Posts, suffered their Affairs to decay, and saw, without any concern, the English Nation fall into the utmost Contempt. The Scots frequently broke the Truce (6), by Incursions upon the Borders, being very sure, the Court of England was far from thinking of revenging their Insults. The English Possessions in France were almost reduced to nothing, and the Places which might one day have served to repair these Losses, were sold without any necessity. The Merchant-Ships were daily plundered by the Corsairs of France and the Low-Countries, without any means used to protect the Trade. Amidst these disorders, the Ministers, of whom the Earl of Wiltshire was the chief, sought only to augment the King's Revenues, by Borrowings, new Taxes, and still less legal Ways. Pretences were no longer sought to demand Subsidies; the Ministers whole Business was only to find speedy and effectual means to extort Money from the People, to whom the demanding it was thought to be too great an Honour. At length, having practised divers Expedients, as unjust as extraordinary, to supply the King's prodigious Expences (7), and satisfy his Ministers Avarice, a Method was used which could not fail of procuring large Sums. As the late Parliament had reversed the Pardon granted in 1385, to the Duke of Gloucester's Adherents, Accusations were brought against such as had then taken Arms in favour of that Prince. By the Judgments given upon these Accusations, seventeen Counties were condemned as guilty of Treason, and the Estates of all the Inhabitants adjudged to the King. In this Extremity, the richer sort of Gentlemen and Burgesses were forced, in order to avoid the seizure of their Estates, to give blank Obligations, which the King caused to be filled with what Sums he was pleased to exact. Moreover, by what was inserted in these Notes, which were termed Ragmans (8), every Person was bound, under great Penalties, to support the Statutes of the Shrewsbury Parliament, and all the subsequent Acts; that is to say, they entirely threw themselves upon the King's Mercy (9). It was impossible that a Government so tyrannical, should not draw the hatred of the Nation upon the Prince and his Instruments. It was also very visible, that these Oppressions, kindled in the hearts of the People, an ardent desire of freeing themselves from them, inasmuch that the least Spark was capable of producing a fatal Combustion.

Whilst England was exposed to all these Calamities, the Irish, contemning the small number of Troops left by Richard in their Country, took up Arms with one Consent. Roger Mortimer Earl of March, Governor of Ireland, opposing the Rebels, was slain in the first Battle. This Prince, who was declared by an Act of Parliament, presumptive Heir of the Crown, left two Sons, Edmund and Roger, the eldest of whom succeeded him in his Honour of Earl of March, and died without Issue, as well as Roger his Brother. But the Marriage of Ann their Sister with the Duke of York's second Son, proved a fertile source of Troubles, which long afflicted the Kingdom.

Richard receiving the News of the Irish Revolt, resolved to go in Person and chastise the Rebels, being in a terrible Rage, that such a pitiful and wretched People should dare to contemn his Power, at a time when he found no opposition in England. Pursuant to this Resolution, he levied a numerous Army, which furnished him with a fresh occasion to exact great Sums from his Subjects (10), whereby he considerably increased the hatred already entertained against him.

When he was ready to embark, some Suspensions infiltrated into him, of the Earl of Northumberland, Governor of the northern Counties, moved him to send that Earl a positive Order, to come and join him without delay. But the Earl excusing himself, on account that his Presence was absolutely necessary in those Parts, the King, without further Examination, pronounced him Traitor (11), and ordered all his Estate to be seized. Then leaving the Regency of the Kingdom to the Duke of York's Uncle, he set sail, and arrived May the 31st at Waterford, from whence he marched to Dublin. He was attended by the Sons of the Duke of Lancaster, by his third Wife, and by those of the late Duke of Gloucester, whom he carried like Hostages; and had taken with him the best part of his Jewels, as if he had foreseen he should never more return to his Palace. He made at first some Progress against the Rebels, and in several Encounters, gave Marks of Valour, which caused a belief, that if hitherto he had shewn no great Inclination for War, it was not to be ascribed so much to a want of Courage, as to a bad Education.

But whilst his Vanity was flattered with the Advantages he gained over the Irish, a Conspiracy was forming in England to deprive him of the Crown. Under an arbitrary Government, such as Richard's, there must needs be great numbers of Malecontents. Some Persons indeed find their account in the absolute Power of the 1399. Prince, but they are far from being the Majority. So, though a King of this Character is commonly surrounded with a crowd of Flatterers, who endeavour to persuade him, that the People bear his Yoke patiently, if he has any Knowledge of the World, he ought to confider, there is no preserving the Power acquired by Force, but by the same way it was usurped. And if he is so impolitick, as to confide in Subjects he has violently oppressed, in vain does he expect from them a Fidelity, which serves only to increase their Misery. This is what Richard did not fail to experience. By an imprudent Security, he had left his Kingdom, and carried all his Forces into Ireland, at a Time when the People's hatred of him was at the height, wherein he committed a capital Error, which his Enemies failed not to improve. He was scarce gone for Ireland, with almost all the Lords, his Creatures, but the Male-contents in England, began to think of means to dethrone him. To that end, after several Conferences together, they sent Word to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, since his Banishment, was retired into France, "That all England was ready to

to obtain Satisfaction for all the Injustices done . . . This Manifesto produced to great an Effect, that when the Regent would have issued out Commissions to levy Troops, he hardly found any willing to accept them. Every one said publicly, he did not care to oppose the lawful Pictentions of a Prince so unjustly oppressed. Thus Refusal convincing the Earl of Wiltshire and the rest of the Ministry, that instead of being able to support their Authority, they ran the hazard of seeing themselves sacrificed to the publick Hatred, they deserted the Duke of York and retired to Bristol Castle. After the Flight of the Counsellors, the Regent perceiving there was no stemming the Torrent, threw up the care of the publick Affairs, and withdrew to his own House, leaving the Kingdom like a Ship exposed to the Winds and Waves without Pilot or Mariners. All the other Lords, who had as yet remained Neuter, in order to join the strongest Party, finding the King's Interest abandoned, no longer deferred openly declaring for the Duke.

Mean while, the Duke improving these Advantages, marched with all speed to London, where the Citizens had invited him. He was triumphantly received in that noble City, with all the Demonstrations of Zeal and Affection, which could be given by a People extremely incensed against their Sovereign, and considering themselves as delivered from Tyranny. But how pleasing soever the Honours he received from the Londoners might be, he staid no longer than was necessary to secure their Allegiance; after which, he marched directly towards Bristol. Upon his Arrival, the Gates being opened to him with Joy, he commanded the Castle to be assaulted, where the Counsellors were retired. The Siege was pushed so vigorously, that in four Days the Besieged were forced to surrender at Discretion. The People's Fury against the Earl of Wiltshire and his Companions, was so violent, that the Duke thought he could not refuse them the Satisfaction to see these odious Ministers sacrificed to their Vengeance. So, without considering the Power he assumed was still more illegal than the King's Usurpations, he ordered the Earl of Wiltshire to be beheaded, with some others of the Council (6), to satisfy the People who had ly called for their Death. The happy Success of this Expedition made the whole Kingdom embrace the Duke's Party, and shortly after he had the Satisfaction to see his Uncle the Duke of York, come and assist him with his Counsels.

Whilst these things were transacting in England, Richard was in Ireland in a perfect Security. The contrary Winds which continued to blow above three Weeks, hindered his receiving any News. When he heard of the Duke of Lancaster's Descent, he imprisoned his Brothers, with the Duke of Gloucester's Sons, and resolved to go immediately into England, and fight his Enemy. But the Duke of Albemarle advised him to stay a few Days, to have time to prepare Ships to transport all his Forces at once. He took this fatal Advice, which completed his Ruin, since every Moment is precious at such a Juncture. And indeed, it was during that time that London declared for the Duke, which perhaps would not have been, had the King been known to be in England, with a Resolution vigorously to oppose the Designs of his Enemies. Richard, being determined to stay some Days longer in Ireland, sent the Earl of Salisbury before, to levy Troops in Wales, assuring him he would quickly follow him (7). The Earl used such Expedition, that in a few Days he assembled an Army of forty thousand Men, the Welsh and Cheshire Men zealously taking Arms for the King. If Richard had arrived with his Forces by the time he had promised, he might at least have had the Satisfaction, of trying the Fortune of a Battle in Defence of his Crown. But the Wind returning to the East, detained him eighteen Days longer in Ireland, and would not permit him to make so short a Passage. During that time a Rumour being spread in the Earl of Salisbury's Army, that the King was dead in Ireland, the Troops would have disbanded themselves. It was with great Difficulty the Earl prevailed with them to stay a few Days, in order to have certain News of the King. This Delay being expired, and Richard not appearing, the Welsh and Cheshire Men deserted their Colours, and retired to their Homes.

Richard landed a few Days after (8), and as he knew nothing of the Earl of Salisbury's Army being dispersed, he marched to Carmarthen in hopes to meet them. But 1399. when he heard that he had lost that Refuge, and all the Nobility had declared against him, that his Ministers were beleagued at Bristol, and the People ardently espoused the Duke of Lancaster's Quarrel, he knew not what Course to take, all that were proposed appearing equally dangerous. The Officers and Soldiers would have had him put himself at their Head, and give his Enemy Battle. They promised to spill the last Drop of their Blood in his Defence, and inspired him with hopes that his Army would daily increase in his March, by the junction of those, who, through Force, or the Belief of his Death had deserted him. Some advised him to return, and fortify himself in Ireland. Others were of Opinion, that he should fly for Refuge into France, to the King his Father-in-law, till a more favorable Season afforded an Opportunity to return to his Dominions. Amidst these Uncertainties, the unfortunate King, incapable of chusing the best Advice, and having none about him but such as wanted Courage or Capacity, could not come to any Resolution. However as he distrusted every Body, he could not long remain in a Situation which seemed to him to be very dangerous. On a sudden, without advising with any Person, he privately withdrew from his Army in the Night, and shut himself up in Conway Castle, which was deemed impregnable, but at that time unprovided of all things. He had no sooner disappeared, but the Lord Thomas Percy Earl of Worcester, Master of the Household, broke his White-Staff (1) before the King's Domesticks, and went to meet the Duke of Lancaster, who was advancing towards Chester at the Head of his Army.

(8) When

Richard finding himself almost alone in the Castle he had chosen for his Sanctuary, without any Prospect of being able to defend himself, was afraid, if he attempted to escape, of falling into the Hands of an enraged People, who gave him but too many Proofs of their Hatred. In this Extremity, he saw no other Remedy but to throw himself upon the Generosity of his Enemy. He sent him word by one of his Attendants, that he was ready to submit to what Terms he himself should judge reasonable, and desired him to send some Person to confer with him. The Duke immediately dispatched the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Northumberland, both sworn Enemies of the King (2), to know his Intentions. In the short Conference with these Deputies, Richard offered, if his Life were secured, with an honorable Pension for himself and eight Persons (3) he should name, to resign his Crown, and be content to lead the Residue of his Days like a private Person. The Deputies giving him hopes, his Offer would be accepted, he desired to confer with the Duke himself. To that Purpose he went to Flint, not above ten Miles from Chester, where the Duke was now arrived. Next Day the Duke being come to Flint, went to the King, who said to him with a cheerful Countenance: "Cousin of Lancaster, you are welcome."

Then the Duke thrice bowing to the Ground, replied, "My Lord the King, I am come sooner than you appointed me, because the common Fame of your People is, that you have for these one and twenty Years governed very ill and rigorously, of which they are not at all satisfied; but if it please God, I will help you to govern them better for the future." To which the King only returned, Fair Cousins, since it pleases you, it pleases us too (4). Some add, that Richard intreated the Duke, in very submissive Terms, not to touch his Life, in consideration of his having spared his Brothers, whom he had only confined in Ireland, and that the Duke gave him a positive Promise he would not. There are Historians who say, that Richard was betrayed by the Earl of Northumberland, who persuading him to demand this Conference, laid an Ambush for him in the Way, and carried him Prisoner to the Duke. Be that as it will, the two Princes went the same Day (5) and lodged at Chester, from whence they set out together for London.

Upon their Approach, the Londoners came out in Crouds, to receive, the one with a thousand Curfies, and the other with excessive Applauses and Commendations. Then the King was conducted to the Tower, and confined there, whilst the Duke took measures with his Friends to compleat his Work. The suddenness of this Revolution, and the Duke of Lancaster's Diligence in travelling so many Counties are very surprising. If it is considered that in seven and forty Days, he marched from Ravensbur where he landed, to London, Bristol, Chester, and from thence back to London, it will hardly be conceivable, that an Army of sixty thousand Men could possibly run over so much Ground in so short a Space (6).

The Moment the Duke had got the King in his Power, he took care to cause him to summon a Parliament at London, that no time might be lost. In the Conferences he had with his Friends, before the meeting of the Parliament, the Question was not so much concerning what was to be done, since the placing him upon the Throne was resolved, as how to proceed. Some were for his taking possession upon Richard's bare Promise of resigning the Crown. Others thought, the Promise appeared too constrained to be the Foundation of any Right, and the more, as there was a nearer Heir than the Duke. This was Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, Son of that Roger who was declared Richard's presumptive Successor. The Truth is, he was descended from Lionel Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, whereas the Duke of Lancaster was Son of John, younger Brother of Lionel. Though Edmund's Right was only derived from a Woman, that would have been no Objection, provided the usual Practice had been observed, since there was no such thing in England as the Salic Law. Thus by Richard's Resignation, the Duke of Lancaster had no Right to claim the Crown. For this reason they added, that since there was a necessity of setting aside the Law, the Authority of Parliament was absolutely requisite. Hence they concluded, that Richard must be formally deposed, and the Duke elected by the same Authority. This Opinion had likewise Difficulties, as it ascribed to the Parliament a Power to dispose of the Crown, contrary to the Laws and Customs, to the Prejudice of the lawful Heir, against whom nothing could be objected to weaken his Title. At last, after many Debates upon so nice a Point, it was the Duke of York's Opinion to unite the three Ways proposed, in order to give the more Strength to what they had resolved. In the first place, Richard should be obliged to make an absolute Resignation. Secondly, the Parliament should proceed to depose him before the Crown was disposed of. Lastly, these two Steps being taken, and the Throne declared vacant, the same Parliament, in consideration of the Duke of Lancaster's great Service to the State, should adjudge him the Crown by their supreme Authority, which, in extraordinary Cases, was superior to the Laws. This Opinion was unanimously approved. Thus in punishing a King for setting himself above the Laws, a Power was given the Parliament no less contrary to them. So difficult it is on such Occasions, to keep within the Bounds of Justice and Equity. This Expedient, then thought proper to restore the Peace of the Kingdom, proved the real Source of the Calamities which afterwards afflicted the Nation, when these violent Proceedings seemed to be entirely forgotten. The Descendants of the Duke of York, who proposed this Opinion, found it their Interest to destroy the Foundation on which it was built, and maintain, that the Parliament had exceeded their Power in transferring the Crown to the House of Lancaster.

Pursuant to the Resolutions, the Duke of Lancaster had taken with his Friends, he repaired to the Tower, the Day before the opening of the Parliament (7), attended by a great Number of Lords. There, in the presence of all, Richard delivered up the Crown and Scepter, with the other Ensigns of Royalty, and by an Instrument signed with his own Hand, confessed himself unworthy and unfit to govern any longer (8). Next Day the Parliament being

I Richard, by the Grace of God King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, do hereby the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates whatsoever of Churches, secular or regular, of what Dignity, Degree, State, or Condition they are; Dukes, Marquises, Earls, Barons, Vassals, Vassalvassors, and my Liege-Men whatsoever, Ecclesiastick or secular, by whatever Name they are called, from the Oath of Fealty and Homage, and all others to me made, and from all Bond of Liegeance, Regality, and Government or Command, by which they have been, or may be bound to me; and them, their Heirs, and Successors for ever, from the same Oath, homage, Fealty, and other things, whosoever I free, release, and quit, and make them free, absolved, and quit, as to my Person, according to the whole Effort of the Law, which now shall be on the Premises, or any of them; And I do purely, freely of my own accord, simply and absolutely, in the best Manner, Way, and form that I am by this Writing, renounce, wholly resign, and by Word and Deed, put from me, and recede for ever, from all Royal Dignity, Majesty, the Crown and Lordship, and the Power of the said Kingdom, and other my Dominions and Possessions, which may any way belong to me, as to a King, of Law of Right, and Title, Possession and Dominion, that I ever had, have, or may have, in the Line

1399. being met, the Instrument of Resignation was produced, and approved by unanimous Consent. But as this Resignation alone, according to the Measures agreed upon, did not appear, sufficient, the two Houses ordered Articles of Accusation against Richard to be drawn up, to serve for reasons of his Deposition, to which they intended to proceed. The Articles were as follow (1):

"I. It is objected to King Richard, That for his evil Government, by giving the Goods and Possessions of the Crown to unworthy Persons, and indiscreetly dissipating of them; and for this cause imposing grievous and intolerable Burthens upon the People, and otherwise committing other innumerable Evils: Having, by his Assent and Command, by the whole Parliament, chosen and assigned certain Prelates and other Lords Temporal, who with all their Power should faithfully labour, at their own Costs, about the just Government of the Kingdom, made a Conventicle of his Accomplices, proposing to impeach of high Treason the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal, so employed about the Government of the Kingdom, and violently drew the Justices of the Kingdom to confirm his wicked purpose, for fear of Death and Torment of Body, endeavouring to destroy the said Lords.

"II. The same King lately at Shrewsbury, caused to come before him, and others that favoured him, in a Chamber many Persons, and the greater Part of the Justices, where, by Threats, and divers Terrors, he induced, caused, and forced them singly to answer to certain Questions on his behalf, touching the Laws of his Kingdom, against their Will, and otherwise than they would have answered, had they not been forced; by colour of which answers the same King propounded to have proceeded to the Destruction of Thomas Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and other Lords, with whom he was very angry, especially because they desired him to be under Good Government, but by divine Providence, and the Resistance and Power of the said Lords, the King could not bring his Design to effect.

"III. When the Lords Temporal, in Defence of themselves, resisted his Malice and Craft, the said King prefixed a Day for the Parliament to do them and others Justice, who upon Faith and Confidence therein, remained quietly in their own Houses; the King privately, with his Letters or Commission, sent the Duke of Ireland into Cheshire, to raise Arms against the said Lords, Great Men, and Officers of the Commonwealth, publicly erecting his Banners against the Peace he had sworn to, from whence Homicides, Captivities, Diffusions, and other infinite Evils followed in the whole Kingdom, for which cause he incurred Perjury.

"IV. That although the said King had pardoned the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and all their Assistants in full Parliament, and for many Years had shewn cheerful Signs of Peace and Love towards them; yet the same King always bearing Gall in his Heart, taking Opportunity, caused to be seized the Duke of Gloucester, and the said Earls of Arundel and Warwick; and sent the Duke to Calais, to be imprisoned under the Keeping of the Earl of Nottingham, one of his Appellants; and without Answer, or lawful Process, caused him to be strangled, and inhumanly and cruelly murdered. The Earl of Arundel pleading his Charter of Pardon, and demanding Justice in Parliament, was encompassed with great Numbers of armed Men, and had his Head damnablely struck off; and committed the Earl of Warwick and Lord Cobham to perpetual Prison, confiscating their Lands, against Justice, the Laws of the Land, and his express Oath, giving them to their Appellants.

"V. At the time when in his Parliament he caused the Duke of Gloucester, and Earls of Arundel and Warwick, to be adjudged, that he might more freely exercise his Cruelty upon them; and in others fulfil his injurious Will, he drew to him a great Multitude of Malefactors out of the County of Cheshire, who marching up and down the Kingdom with the King, as well within his own House, as without, cruelly killed his Lieges, beat and wounded others, plundering the Goods of the People, refusing to pay for their Victuals; violating and ravishing Men's Wives, and other Women. And

"although Complaints were made to the King of these Excesses, yet he took no care to apply Remedy, or do Justice in them; but favoured those People in their Wickedness, confiding in them and their Assistance against all others of his Kingdom; wherefore his good Subjects had great Matter of Commotion and Indignation.

"VI. Though the said King caused Proclamation to be made through the Kingdom, That he caused his Uncle the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, to be arrested not for any rebellious Congregations, or marching with Horse within the Kingdom; but for many Extortions, Oppressions, and other things done against his Regality and Royal Majesty; and that it was not his Intention, that any of their Company at the time of the Congregation and Marching with Horse aforesaid, should for that reason be questioned or disturbed: Yet the same King afterwards, in his Parliament, impeached the said Lords; not for Extortions, Oppressions, or other things aforesaid, but for rebellious Tumults and Congregations and Marching with Horse, adjudged them to Death; and caused many of their Company for fear of Death, to make Fine and Ranfom as Traitors, to the great Destruction of many of his People; and so he craftily, deceitfully and maliciously deceived the Lords, their Followers, and People of the Nation.

"VII. After many of these Persons had paid their Fines and Ranfoms, and had obtained his Letters Patents of full Pardon; yet they received no Benefit by them, until they made new Fines for their Lives, by which they were much impoverished: and this was much in Derogation to the Name and State of a King.

"VIII. In the last Parliament holden at Shrewsbury, the same King propounding to oppress his People, subtly procured and caused to be granted, that the Power of Parliament, by consent of all the States of the Kingdom, should remain in some certain Persons, who, after the Parliament should be dissolved, might answer the Petitions depending in Parliament, then undetermined, under pretence whereof they proceeded to other general Matters touching that Parliament, according to the King's Will, in Derogation to the State of Parliament, great Disadvantage to the Kingdom, and a pernicious Example. And that these Actions might seem to have some Colour and Authority, the King caused the Rolls of Parliament to be changed and blotted, contrary to the Effect of the Grant aforesaid.

"IX. Notwithstanding the said King at his Coronation swore, That he would do in all his Judgments, equal and right Justice and Discretion, in Mercy and Truth, according to his Power; yet the said King, without all Mercy, rigorously, amongst other things, ordained, under great Punishments, That no Man should intercede with him, for any favour towards Henry Duke of Lancaster, then in Banishment; in so doing; he acted against the Bond of Charity, and rashly violated his Oath.

"X. That though the Crown of England, the Rights of the Crown, and Kingdom itself, have been in all times so free, as the Pope, or any other foreign Power, had nothing to do in them; yet the said King, for the confirming of his erroneous Statutes, supplicated the Pope to confirm the Statutes made in his last Parliament; whereupon he obtained his Apostolic Letters, or Bull, wherein were contained grievous Censures against all such as should presume to contravene them. All which things are known to be against the Crown and Royal Dignity, and against the Statutes and Liberty of the Kingdom.

"XI. Though Henry now Duke of Lancaster, by the King's Command, exhibited his Bill of Accusation against the Duke of Norfolk, concerning the State and Honour of the King, and duly prosecuted it, so as he was ready to make it good by Duel, and the King had ordered it; yet the same King put it by, and without any lawful Cause banished the Duke of Lancaster for ten Years, against all Justice, the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom, and the Military Law, damnablely incurring Perjury.

"XII. After the said King had graciously granted to the now Duke of Lancaster, by his Letters Patents,

"Some or any of them; also the Government and Administration of the said Kingdoms and Lordship, and all mere and mixt Empire in the same; and to all Honour and Royalty therein, saving to my Successors Kings of England, in the Kingdoms, Dominions, and Premises, for ever their competent Rights. And I do certify, acknowledge, repute, and truly of certain Knowledge, judge myself to be insufficient for the Government of the said Kingdoms and Dominions, and for my nervous Decretes not unworthily, disposed. And I swear by these H.ly Gospels of God by me corporally touched, That I never will contravene this Resignation, Renunciation, Dimission, and Cession, or will any way oppose them in Word or Deed, by myself or others, nor will suffer them to be opposed or contravened, as much as in me is, publicly or privately, but the same Renunciation, Resignation, Dimission, and Cession, will I receive and firm, and will firmly hold and observe them in the whole and every part, as God and his Gospels help me."

(1) Introductory of the impressed Alfred's given of these Articles by Mr. Rapin, it has been thought proper to insert them all at length, translated from the authentic Copy of the Roll of Parliament, printed at the end of Drum Scriptores, Col. 2743, 86.

1399. "That while he was in Banishment his Attorneys might sue for Livery of any Inheritance that might fall to him for which Homage was due, which should be respited for a reasonable Fine; he injuriously revoked those Letters Patents, against the Laws of the Land, incurring Perjury.

"XIII. Notwithstanding it had been ordained, That every Year the King's Officers, with the Justices, and others of his Council, should nominate and chuse the Sheriffs of all Counties according to their Discretion; yet he commanded others of his Party, and such as would do as he would have them, to be Sheriffs; to the great Grievance of his People, contrary to the Laws of his Kingdom, notoriously incurring Perjury.

"XIV. That whereas the said King borrowed several Sums of Money from Lords and others by his Letters Patents, promising faithfully to pay them at a certain Term; he did not perform his Promise; whence his Creditors were much grieved; and not only they, but many others thought him an unfaithful King.

"XV. Whereas the Kings of England used to live upon the Revenues of the Kingdom, and Patrimony of the Crown in time of Peace, without Oppression of his People; that the same King during his whole time, gave the greatest part of his Revenue to unworthy Persons, and imposed Burthens upon his Subjects as it were every Year; by which he excessively oppressed his People, and impoverished his Kingdom, not employing these Goods to the Advantage of the Nation, but prodigally wasting them in Ostentation, Pomp, and Glory, owing great Sums for Victuals and other Necessaries of his House, though his Revenues were greater than any of his Progenitors.

"XVI. The same King not willing to keep and protect the just Laws and Customs of his Kingdom, but do what he pleased, when those Laws were declared to him by the Justices and others of his Council, desiring Justice might be done accordingly, he said expressly with an austere Countenance, That the Laws were only in his Mouth and Breast; and that he only could make and change the Laws of this Kingdom. And being so seduced, he would not permit Justice to be done to many of his Lieges, but by Threats and Terrors, forced many to cease from the Prosecution of common Justice.

"XVII. That whereas Laws made in Parliament do always bind, until revoked by another Parliament, yet the same King, desiring to enjoy such Liberty as no Laws might bind him, and to do what he pleased, he cunningly procured such a Petition, on behalf of the Community of his Kingdom, to be exhibited in Parliament, and to be granted, That he might be as free as any of his Progenitors before him. By colour of which Petition and Grant, he often commanded, and caused many things to be done contrary to the Laws not revoked, doing expressly and knowingly against the Oath taken at his Coronation.

"XVIII. Though it had been ordained, That no Sheriff should continue in his Office above a Year, and could not be again chosen to that Office in three Years after, the same King, for his singular Profit, and sometimes for the Benefit of others, suffered some Sheriffs to remain in their Offices for two or three Years, contrary to the Tenor and Effect of the Statute, incurring Perjury; and this was notorious, publick, and famous.

"XIX. Although by Law and Custom, the People ought to be free to chuse Knights to represent them in Parliament, to propound their Grievances, and provide Remedies for them; yet the said King, that he might obtain his own rash Will in his Parliaments, directed by Writs often to the Sheriffs, to send such as he named, some of whom he induced by Favors, others by Threats and Terrors, others by Bribes, to consent to things prejudicial to the Kingdom, and grievous to the People; and especially by granting to him the Subsidy of Wool for his Life, and another Subsidy for certain Years, too much oppressing the People.

"XX. The same King, that in all things he might Act Arbitrarily, unlawfully made and commanded all the Sheriffs to swear beyond their usual Oath, That they would obey all his Commands sent to them under the Great Seal, Privy Seal, or Signet; and in case they should know any in their Bailiwicks or Jurisdic-tions, that should speak any ill publicly or privately, to the disgrace or scandal of the King's Person, they should arrest and commit them to Prison, there to remain while they received other Commands from the King, as it might be found upon Record; which Practice might likely tend to the Destruction of many of his Subjects.

"XXI. The same King, that he might supplant his People, and get their Estates to enrich himself, caused the People of sixteen Counties, by Letters under their Seals, to submit to him as Traitors; by colour of which, he obtained of them great Sums of Money to procure his Favour: And although to please the People, those Letters Obligatory were restored to them; yet their Procurators had full Power to bind themselves for them to the King, which he caused to be done; and so deceived his People, and subtilly extorted their Goods from them.

"XXII. Although the same King swore at his Coronation, to preserve the Liberties granted to the Church of England; yet by reason of his Voyage into Ireland, he by his Letters, commanded many religious Persons, Abbots, and Priors, some to send him Horfes, others Waggones, others great Sums of Money; and by his way of writing, he forced many by Fear, to comply with his Demands; whence they were impoverished and oppressed, in manifest derogation to Ecclesiastick Liberty; by which pretext he incurred Perjury.

"XXIII. In many great Councils, when the Lords and Justices were charged to counsel him faithfully, in things that touched his own, and the State of the Kingdom, they were often so sharply rebuked and reproved, that they durst not speak Truth, in giving Advice concerning the State of the Kingdom.

"XXIV. The Treasure, Reliques, and Jewels of the Crown, which ought to be preserved in the Treasury, for the Honour of the King, and Conservation of the Kingdom, if any thing might happen, the said King carried with him towards Ireland, without the consent of the States of the Kingdom; whence the Kingdom had been greatly impoverished, if God had not otherwise provided for the taking of those Goods from him against his Will. And further, he caused the Records concerning the State and Government of his Kingdom to be razed, in great Prejudice of his People, and disinherence of the Crown, and very likely, as it was believed, for the support of his ill Government.

"XXV. He was so variable and dissembling in Words and Writing, and so contrary to himself, especially in writing to the Pope, Kings, and other Lords, without and within the Kingdom, and also to his Subjects, that no Man living, knowing what he was, could confide in him; yea, he was reputed so unfaithful and inconstant, that he was not only a scandal to his own Person, but to the whole Kingdom, and all Strangers that knew him.

"XXVI. Though the Lands, Tenements, Goods, and Chattels of all Freeman, by the Laws of the Land, ought not to be seized without Forfeiture; yet the said King intending to enervate those Laws, in the Presence of many Lords, and others of the Community of the Kingdom, he often said and affirmed, That the Life of every Subject, his Lands, Tenements, Goods, and Chattels, were his, to be disposed as he pleased without forfeiture; which was altogether against the Laws and Customs of his Kingdom.

"XXVII. Although it had been made a Law, which had hitherto been confirmed, That no Freeman might be taken, &c. nor any ways destroyed, nor that the King should proceed against him, but by lawful Trial of his Peers, or the Law of the Land; yet according to the Will, Command, and Appointment of the said King, very many of his Lieges being maliciously accused, for having spoke publicly, or privately, Words that might tend to the scandal and disgrace of the King's Person, were taken, imprisoned, and brought before the Constable and Marshal in the Court Military; where being accused, they could not be admitted to give any other Answer, than Not Guilty; and could defend themselves no otherwise than by their Bodies, their Accusers being young Men, lusty, and found; whereas they were old, impotent, lame, and infirm; from whence not only the destruction of Lords and great Men, but of singular Persons of the Community of the Kingdom very likely might have followed: When therefore the said King willingly contravened this Law, no doubt he incurred Perjury.

"XXVIII. Although the People of England, by virtue of their Liegeance, were sufficiently bound to their King, and if they offended in any manner, he might correct and punish them by the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom; yet the said King desired to supplant, and too much oppress his People, that he might more

"freely execute, and be able to follow the fancy of his foolish and unlawful Will, he sent his Letters into all Counties of his Kingdom, that all his Lieges, as well Spiritual as Temporal, should take certain Oaths in general, which were too burthenome to them, and which very likely might cause the final Destruction of his People, and that under their Letters and Seals they should confirm these Oaths; which Command the People obeyed, lest they should incur his Indignation, and for fear of Death.

"XXXIX. When the Parties contending in the Ecclesiastick Court, in Causes merely Ecclesiastick and Spiritual, endeavoured to procure Prohibitions to hinder Process in the same, from the Chancellor of England, who out of Justice refused to grant them, yet the same King often granted them under his Signet, wickedly infringing the Church Liberties granted in Magna Charta, which he had sworn to preserve, damnably incurring Perjury, and the sentence of Excommunication pronounced by the Holy Fathers against the Violators of Church Liberties.

"XXX. The said King in Parliament, compassed about with armed Men, without reasonable Cause or legal Process, contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom, banished Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury, and his Spiritual Father, being then absent by his Contrivance.

"XXXI. Upon perusal of the said King's Will under his Great Seal, Privy Seal, and Signet, there was in it this Clause: Also we Will, that the Debts of our House, Chamber, and Wardrobe being paid, for which we allow twenty thousand Pounds, and the Leprose, and Chaplains we appointed to be maintained at Westminster, and Bernardsey, for which we allow five or six thousand Marks, the Residue of our Gold shall remain to our Successor, upon condition he approves, ratifies, confirms, holds, and causeth to be holden and observed, all Laws, Statutes, Ordinances and Judgments, made, had, or done, in the Parliament held at Westminster, on the 17th of September, in the 21st of our Reign, and continued or adjourned to Shrewsbury, and all things done at Conwy, on the 16th of September, in the 22d of our Reign, as also what was done at Westminster, on the 18th of March, in the same Year, by Authority of the same Parliament. But if he shall refuse to do these things, then we will that Thomas Duke of Surry, Edward Duke of Aumale, John Duke of Exeter, and William le Scrope Earl of Wiltshire, my Debts, &c. as aforesaid, being paid, shall have the said Residue for the Defence of the Statutes, Ordinances, Judgments, and Stabilitiments aforesaid, to the utmost of their Power, yea, to Death, if it be necessary. Upon all which things we burthen their Consciences, as they will answer it at the Day of Judgment." By which Article it appears evidently, That the same King endeavoured pertinaciously to maintain those Statutes and Ordinances, which were erroneous, wicked, and repugnant to all Law and Reason, not only in his Life, but after he was dead, neither regarding the Danger of his Soul, or the utmost Destruction of his Kingdom or liege People.

"XXXII. In the eleventh Year of the said King Richard, at his Manor of Langley, in the presence of the Dukes of Lancaster and York, and many other Lords, desiring, as it seemed, that his Uncle the Duke of Glocester, there also present, might trust and have Confidence in him, of his own accord, swore upon the venerable Sacrament of the Lord's Body placed upon the Altar, that he would pardon unto him all things which were said to be committed against his Person, and that he should never receive any Damage for them; yet afterwards the said King, notwithstanding this Oath, caused the Duke for those Offences horribly and cruelly to be murdered, damnably incurring the Guilt of Perjury.

"XXXIII. After a Knight of the Shire, who had a Vote in Parliament, impeached the Archbishop of Canterbury, publicly before the King and all the States of the Kingdom, upon certain Defects committed against the King, with little Truth, as it was said: Although he offered presently to answer what was objected against him, and desired to be admitted by the King so to do, sufficiently trusting, as he said, to demonstrate his Innocency, yet the same King contriving by all the Ways and Means he could, to oppress and reduce to nothing the State of the Archbishop, as the Event shewed, kindly spake to, and earnestly desired him, that he would say nothing then, but expect a more fit time: That Day being past, for five Days and more together, the King deceived him, advising and persuading him not to come to Parliament, but to remain at his own House, promising, that in his Absence he should not receive Injury; but the said King in that Parliament, banished the Archbishop, during his Pleasure, being absent, and not called to answer, without any reasonable Cause, confiscating all his Goods against the Laws of the Land and all Justice, by which he incurred Perjury. Further, the King intending to palliate his Inconstancy, by flattering Words, endeavoured to cast the Injury done him upon others: Whence the Archbishop having Discourse with the King, the Duke of Norfolk, other Lords, and great Men, lamenting said, he was not the first that had been Banished, nor should be the last, for that he thought within a short Time the Duke of Norfolk, and other Lords, would follow him; and constantly told the King, that the Consequences of the Premises would fall upon his own Head at last: To which the King, as if he had been astonished, presently answered, he thought it might so happen, he might be expelled his Kingdom by his Subjects; and farther said, if it should be so, he would go to the Place where he was; and that the Archbishop might believe him, he shewed him a great Jewel of Gold, which he would send to him as a Token, that he would not defer his coming to the Place where he was. And that the same Archbishop might have greater Confidence in him, he sent to him, advising him, that he should privately send all the Jewels belonging to his Chapel to be safely kept, left under the colour of the Judgment of Banishment, they might be seized; it being so done, the King caused the Goods to be put in Coffers, which he caused to be locked, and sealed by one of the Archbishop's Clerks, by whom he sent the Keys to him; and afterwards caused the Coffers to be broken, taking the Goods, and disposing of them as he pleased: the same King also faithfully promised the Archbishop, that if he would go to the Port of Hampton, in order to go out of the Kingdom, that by the Queen's Intercession he should be recalled; and if it should so happen as he should go out of the Kingdom, yet after Easter next coming, without fail, he should return into England, nor should he any way lose his Archbishoprick: This he faithfully promised, swearing to it, touching the Cross of Thomas the Martyr, Archbishop of Canterbury: Which Promises notwithstanding, the King caused the Archbishop to go out of the Kingdom, and wrote to the Pope for his Translation; and thus, and otherwise, by the Frauds and Cheats of the King, was the Archbishop, a Man of good Faith, craftily circumvented.

These Articles being drawn up, were laid before the Parliament, who with one Voice acknowledged them to be well grounded and publicly known, and pronounced, that Richard should be deposed. At the same time, Commissioners were appointed to give him notice of his Deposition, and to annul the Oaths and Homage of the People of England, after much the same manner as in the Case of Edward II (1).

This Affair being thus settled, and the Throne become vacant, the Duke of Lancaster rose up, and after crossing himself, claimed the Crown. He built his Pretensions upon his being descended from Henry III, and upon the Right

(1) The Bishop of St. Asaph, the Abbot of Glastonbury, the Earl of Glocester, the Lord Buckley, Sir Thomas Erpingham, and Sir Thomas Grey, and William Tyrington Justice, were appointed to pronounce Sentence of Deposition against King Richard, which being drawn up in writing, was read by the Bishop of St. Asaph as follows: "In the Name of God, Amen. We John Bishop of St. Asaph, John Abbot of Glastonbury, Thomas Earl of Glocester, Thomas Lord Beauchamp, Thomas de Erpingham, and Thomas Grey, Knights, and William Tyrington Justice, by the Spiritual and Temporal Peers, and Great Men of the Kingdom of England, and by the Communities of the same, representing all States thereof, being specially deputed Commissioners for the things underwritten, duly considering the many Perjuries, Cruelty, and many other Crimes committed by King Richard in the time of his Government, and publicly exhibited and retold before the States, which were so publick, notorious, manifest, and infamous, as they could no way be denied; and also his Cruelty, acknowledging, and truly of his own certain knowledge, judging himself to have been altogether intolent for the Government of the Kingdoms and Lordship aforesaid; and that for his notorious Demerits he was worthy to be deposed; which thing by his own Will and Command was, published before the States. Having had diligent Deliberation upon these things, for the greater Caution to the Government of the Kingdoms, and to the Honour, the Rights and Appertinances of the same, in the Name and Authority to us committed, do pronounce, decree, and declare, that King Richard should be deposed de facto from all Royal Dignity and Honour, and for the like Caution, we desire him by our definitive Sentence in this Writing, expressly inhibiting all and singular Archbishops, Bishops, and Prelates, Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Barons, Knights, Vassals, and Vassallages, and all other Men and Subjects of the said Kingdoms and Dominion or Places belonging to them, for the future to give the said Richard as King." Then the States, that nothing might be wanting, being severally interrogated, did constitute certain Peers to be their Peers, named by the said Commissioners, to go and resign to King Richard the Homage and Fealty that had been made to him, and give him notice of what had been done touching his Deposition and Renunciation. Rel. Parl. 2 Hen. IV.

1399. he had received from God, by the Assistance of his Relations and Friends, for the Recovery of his Realm of England, which was upon the Brink of Destruction (1).

Remarks upon it.

It was not without reason that he affected to make use of obscure Expressions, which left undetermined the Foundation on which he built his pretended Right. If he seemed to derive his Title from Henry III, rather than from Edward III his Grandfather, it was, because there was a Rumour, that Edmund Earl of Lancaster, surnamed Crouch-Back, was eldest Son of Henry III, but by reason of his Deformity, Edward I, his younger Brother, was placed on the Throne. According to this Supposition, the Duke would have made the Ignorant believe, he could ground his Title upon being Son of Blanch of Lancaster, Grand-daughter of Edmund Crouch-Back, and Heiress of that Family. But as he was sensible, every Body could not be imposed upon by so gross a Forgery, he added certain Expressions, intimating, that he built his Right also upon the Service he had just done the State. This is the meaning of the Claim, expressed in such obscure Terms.

As it was resolved to adjudge the Crown to the Duke, the Parliament took care not to examine his Claim too closely, but were very willing to suppose it uncontested. Thus, without any Regard to the just Rights of the Earl of March, it was decreed that Henry of Lancaster should be proclaimed King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, which was done that very Day, being the 30th of September (2).

Thus ended the Reign of Richard II, a Prince who in his younger Years seemed to have noble and generous Inclinations, but unfortunately suffered himself to be corrupted by Flattery. He had the Advantage of being descended from a Father and Grandfather so universally esteemed, that had he never so little answered the Nobleness of his Birth, he might have been one of the most glorious Kings that ever wore the English Crown. But like Edward II his Great-grandfather, he had the Weakness to give himself up to the Guidance of his Favorites. Accordingly he underwent the same Fate with that Prince, whom he did but too much resemble in every other respect. The chief Difference to be observed between them is, that Richard was of a more cruel and inflexible Temper, and usurped a more absolute Power than Edward, which rendered him more odious, and less lamented. Let us close this Reign with a Reflection which the sad Catastrophe of these two Princes affords; namely, That in a Government like that of England, all the King's Endeavours to usurp an arbitrary Power, are but so many Steps towards his Destruction (3).

THE STATE of the CHURCH,

FROM THE

Reign of EDWARD I, in 1272, to the End of the Reign of RICHARD II, in 1399.

Tyranny of the Court of Rome, with Regard to England.

AFTER John Lackland became Vassal and Tributary to the See of Rome, the Popes considered England only as a conquered Country, for which they had no manner of regard. Of this the Reigns of John and Henry III, afford us such flagrant Instances, that it would be needless to add any thing to shew to what Excess the Papal Power was carried in the Kingdom. It will suffice to remark, that the Incroachments of the Court of Rome continuing incessantly, or rather daily increasing, the English grew so weary of them, that at length in the Reign of Edward I, they began to seek effectual Means for their Deliverance. This was not however till after frequent Experience, that all their Complaints and Solicitations to the Popes were to no purpose. Herein chiefly consists what I have to say concerning Religion during the four Reigns we have gone through. But to render this matter more intelligible, it will be necessary briefly to observe the Occasion of the Difficulties England had, as well with the Court of Rome, as with the Clergy.

I. The first Cause of Complaint, was the frequent Appeals to the Court of Rome, not one of which was rejected.

II. The frequent Citations were complained of, caused by these Appeals, which obliged People to spend their Substance in Journeys to Rome, to solicit their Affairs.

III. That the Pope had usurped the Collation of almost all the Church-Preferments, not excepting the Bishopricks

Alfo Ladies used high Attire on their Heads, piked Horns, with long trained Gowns, and rode on Side-Saddles, after the Example of the Queen, Ann of Bohemia, who first brought that Fashion into this Kingdom: for before Women used to ride astride like Men. Stow's Ann. p. 295.—In 1397, King Richard began repairing Westminster Hall, and caused the Walls, Windows, and Roof to be taken down and new built, with a stately Perch, as it now remaineth. Stow's Survey, B. 6. p. 48. Camden in Middlesex, Rymor's Fed. T. VIII. p. 749.

In the 18th of Richard II, a Pound Weight of Gold of the old Standard was to make by Tale forty five Nobles, amounting to fifteen Pounds, or a proportionable Number of half or quarter Nobles: And a Pound Weight of Silver of the old Sterling, to make by Tale seventy five Groffes or Groats, amounting to twenty five Shillings, or a hundred and fifty half Groffes, at Two-pence a piece, or three hundred Sterlings at a Penny a-piece, or six hundred half Sterlings: And Nicholas Makin a Florentine, was Matter and Worker. These Robt Nobles (if that in speed be genuine, for it wants both the Robt and the constant Legend of Jesus autem, &c.) gives his Portraiture in a sedentary Posture, with a Sword in his Right hand, and RICAR. We ought perhaps to read HYB for AQUIT. since it's hard to imagine, why Aquitaine should be so much as mentioned after France: and AGLIE instead of ANGLIE, makes it probable, that this was rather coined by Richard III, (in whose Reign that way of writing was in use) than by the 14th. His other Coins were exactly like his Grandfather's. RICARDUS. REX. ANGLIE. REVER. CIVITAS. EBORACI.

and Archbishopricks, contrary to the Rights of the King, the Chapters, and the Patrons.

This Encroachment was grown to that height, that there was not a Benefice great or small, but what the Popes disposed of, by the infallible means they had contrived to be Matters of all the Collations. One while, by the Plenitude of the Apostolick Power, they referred to themselves all the Benefices, which should become void by Translation. Another while, all such as should be vacant by Death, or any other way whatever. By this means, they eluded all the Canonical Elections in England, without alleging other Reasons, save, that they had received to themselves beforehand the Right of Nomination to these Benefices. It appeared so plainly, that their Aim was, to procure by degrees, the Collation of all the Benefices of the Kingdom, that every one could not but see it. For whenever they could not make use of these Pretences, they seldom failed to object against the Party elected, and confer the Benefice upon another. Very often, when the Bishop elect came to be confirmed, he found his Bishoprick already disposed of by the Pope.

IV. But as this was generally the occasion of great Contests, and as those that were canonically elected were commonly supported by the King, the Pope found a certain means to free himself from these Importunities. He bestowed the Bishopricks, and other Benefices, before they were vacant, by way of Provision; and this was another great cause of Complaint for the English.

V. It was moreover complained of, that most of the Benefices disposed of by the Pope, by the Plenitude of his Power, were conferred on Foreigners, particularly on the Cardinals, and their Relations, who by virtue of the Pope's Dispensation, enjoyed the Profit without ever residing. These Benefices were commonly farmed out to the English, who, to make the most profit, got the Cure served for a very small Salary. Hence Divine Service was neglected, the Churches ran to ruin, Hospitality was banished, and the Instruction of Christians almost wholly abolished. Hence likewise this further Inconvenience, the Money was carried out of the Kingdom for ever. It may easily be judged how prejudicial this was to the Country, if it is considered, that by a Calculation made in the Reign of Henry III, the foreign Ecclesiasticks were found to have greater Revenues in England than the King himself.

VI. Another cause of Complaint sprang from the frequent Taxes imposed on the Clergy by the Popes; one while, under colour of a Crusade; another while, to supply the Necessities of the Holy See; and lastly, by the Tents, which they liberally granted to the King, because they generally had a share.

VII. In the next Place, the Legates and Nuntio's, sent into England without any Necessity, were a great Grievance to the English. The Clergy were not only obliged to maintain them at a great Expence, but also to make them considerable Presents, and pay them Procurations, and other Impositions, which the Pope allowed them to levy upon the Ecclesiasticks. Hence the Money went out of the Kingdom, without any possibility of recovering it.

VIII. The Popes were likewise possessed of the First-fruits of all the Benefices, from whence arose the same Inconvenience, I mean a great exhausting of the Kingdom's Treasure.

IX. Peter-Pence, which originally was only a charitable Allowance, granted by the Saxon Kings for the Maintenance of the English College at Rome, was converted into a Tribute; which the Pope collected in a very rigorous manner, very different from that practised in former Days.

X. In fine, the Tribute King John had engaged to pay the Holy See, and which the Popes exacted with great haughtiness, was considered by the English as an intolerable Yoke, and a standing Badge of their Servitude.

XI. As to the Contests between the Crown and the Clergy, the King and the Magistrates complained, that the Clergy were continually endeavouring to encroach upon the Prerogatives of the Crown, secure as they were, of being always supported by the Pope.

XII. That the Clergy had extended their Jurisdiction to many Things purely Civil, under pretence there is no Case but where Religion may be concerned. This Complaint chiefly regarded Matrimonial Causes.

XIII. They said further, that the Ecclesiasticks, instead of supporting, on occasion, the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown, were always ready to join with the Pope, as if he were their only Sovereign.

These are the principal Grievances complained of by the English, and from which they endeavoured from time to time to free themselves, either by Acts of Parliament, or Orders of Council. But these Precautions to free themselves from the Papal Usurpations, added the Popes at the same time, an occasion of complaining in their turn, that the English were striving to rob the Church of her Privileges. Herein they had a great Advantage, by loudly urging the Cause of God, which they always took care to confound with their own Interest. In a Bull of Pope Clement V, inserted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, are specified the Complaints of the Court of Rome against the English. And since I have related the Grievances of the English, it is reasonable I should likewise make known those of the Pope.

I. The Pope complained, that the Cardinals were hindered from enjoying the Prebends, he conferred on them, without any Consideration of the Respect due to them, ordained by God, to bear their part of the Burden of governing the Church.

II. He said, though he had an incontestable Right to collate Benefices, as well in England as in all other States, yet those on whom he had bestowed them were not permitted to take possession, neither were they that had the boldness to oppose it excommunicated.

III. That such as were summoned upon that account, were not suffered to obey the Summons. That Notaries were forbid to act, and the King's Subjects to appear out of the Kingdom.

IV. That the Pope's Nuntio's were hindered from exercising their Commission, without the King's License. That some of them had even been publicly imprisoned, and not released, without paying a large Fine.

V. That the Magistrates would not suffer the Excommunicated to be imprisoned, after the forty Days, which, according to good and laudable Custom, were allowed them, to make the Church satisfaction.

VI. That the King sent frequent Prohibitions to the Ecclesiastical Courts, not to try Causes which were of their Cognizance.

VII. That the same Courts were abridged of their Jurisdiction over the Clergy, without considering, that Ecclesiastical Persons are in no manner dependent upon the Laity.

VIII. That the Civil Courts dared to condemn Ecclesiasticks, without the consent of their Superiors.

IX. That Clergymen were made to appear in their Shirts in the Civil Courts, notwithstanding they pleaded their Privileges. That indeed they were sent back to the Ecclesiastical Court when they were demanded; but it very often happened, if they were not found guilty, the Civil Judges were so bold, as fully to acquit them, without suffering the Ecclesiastical Court to take any Cognizance of the Matter.

X. That Clergymen were subjected to the Tryal of twelve Lay-Persons, and were acquitted or condemned by the Verdict of these twelve incompetent Judges.

XI. That the great Men frequently lodged in the Monasteries, and put them to a great Expence, on the frivolous pretence of their being founded by their Ancestors.

XII. That during the Vacancy of the Abbeyes, those who were entrusted with the Custody by the King, wasted the Revenues, and committed great Damages.

XIII. Lastly, That the Tribute of a thousand Marks due to the Holy See, was not regularly paid, and the Arrears which were to be sent to Avignon, were put to other Uses.

These are the mutual Complaints of the English and the Popes, concerning which it may be observed, that both Parties were agreed as to Facts, and differed only as to Right. To discover on which side the Right lay, it would be necessary to examine, whether the Pope and Clergy were originally possessed of the Rights they assumed; or, they were granted by some Authority; and lastly, whether that Authority could lawfully confer them. But this would be entering into an old beaten Dispute, on which nothing new can be expected. Leaving every one therefore to his own Notions, I shall only relate the Means used by the English to do themselves Justice for the Injuries they complained of, and the Endeavours of the Popes, to support the Privileges they were possessed of. But first, it will be proper to take notice, that in these Contests, the Popes had great Advantages. Every Pope constantly adhered to the same Maxims, without the least Variation. But it was not the same with the Kings of England, who, to please their Humour, or gratify their Passions, scrupled not, very often, to derogate from the Prerogatives of the Crown. This is the true Cause of the slow Progress of the English in their Design of freeing themselves from the oppressions of Rome. The least Relaxation laxation made them lose a great deal of Ground. And it may be, they would never have accomplished the redress of any one Grievance, if the Schisms in the Church had not afforded them Opportunities, which they wisely improved. For the Popes, who, at such Junctures, stood in need of the Kings of England, found themselves many times obliged to Compliances, to which doubtless they would never have submitted at any other Season.

As the Pope and Clergy mutually supported each other, one of the most effectual Means practised in England to oppose the Papal Power, was to check the Growth of the Clergy's Riches. To that end, in the Reign of Edward I. the Statute of Mortmain was enacted, as has been related. This was a fatal Blow to the Clergy, who, without this Statute, would have been Masters of all the Lands in the Kingdom, since they incessantly acquired, and never alienated. But this Statute was almost as prejudicial to the Pope, since bounds could not be set to the Clergy's Power, without lessening, at the same time, that of the Court of Rome. Edward I. struck likewise at the Papal Authority, at least with regard to the Collation of the Bishopricks, by obliging the Bishops to renounce the Article of the Provision-Bull, which gave them the Tenporalities, wherein he was followed by his Successors (1).

Louis, Guard II, had shown more Resolution and Firmness, or had not been forced by the Circumstances of the Times to accept with Rome, he might have greatly promoted the Work of Liberty, which the English had so long and so passionately desired. Never were they in a better Disposition to shake off the galling Yoke. This appears in the King's Letters to the Pope, and in the vigorous Refutations of several Parliaments in his Reign.
 But Edward, expecting always to find in the Pope's Authority, a Protection against his Subjects, frequently stooped to Condemnations for the Court of Rome, destructive to the Interests of his Kingdom. This rendered the Parliament's Endeavours ineffectual during the Course of his Reign.

But under Edward III, more effectual Measures were taken to be delivered from the so long complained of Oppressions. I mean the two Statutes, which tended to Grievance up by the Roots two of the most considerable Grievances, had they been punctually executed. The first was the Statute of Provisors, whereby it was enacted, that in case the Pope collated any Archbishopsrick, Bishopsrick, Dignity, or other Benefice, contrary to the Rights of the Kings, Chapters, or Patrons, the Collation was to devolve to the King for one Turn. And if any Person sued for, and procured, Reservations, or Provisions from the Court of Rome, he should be imprisoned till he had made Fine to the King at his Will, and found sufficient Security not to prosecute any Man in the Court of Rome, on account of his Imprisonment.

The second Act was the Statute of Premunire, by which it was enacted, That in Case any of the King's Subjects should carry into a foreign Court, Causes, the Cognizance whereof belonged to the King's Court, they should be imprisoned, and their Lands, Goods, and Chattels be forfeited to the King.

forfeited to the King.

Notwithstanding theſe two Acts, which ſeemed to take from the Pope all hopes of diſpoſing for the future of any Benefice, and ought to have made him apprehenſive, that the Parliament would proceed to redreſs other Grievances, the Court of Rome ſtill continued her Oppreſſions. In 1576, that is, about a Year before the Death of Edward III. a Memorial was preſented to the Parliament, ſhewing, That by the Death and Tranſlation of Biſhops, the Pope exacted five times the yearly Revenue of the vacant See, and by that Means drew out of the Kingdom twenty thouſand Marks a Year. That the Pope's Agents collected the ſame Sum, for the Neceſſities of the Holy See. That this very Year, the Pope had ſeized the Firſt-Fruits of all the Benefices in England. That he had increaſed the Number of the Cardinals to thirty, among whom there were not above two or three well-affect'd to England. That the Pope's Avarice was worſe than the Plague. That in ſpite of the Statute of Proviſors, there were Perſons every Day provided of Benefices by the Court of Rome, and there was no hindering it, but by banſhing all that ſhould dare to accept of theſe Proviſions. In ſhort, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to put a ſtop to theſe Oppreſſions, in order to prevent England from falling into a fatal Slavery. Upon theſe Complaints, which were carried to Gregory XI, there was a sort of Agreement made between the King and the Pope, but so full of Equivocations and Reservations on the Part of the Pope, that it was easy to perceive he did not mean to desist from his pretended Rights. He was content with promising in general, that he would consider the Complaints of the English, and behave with more Moderation for the future. Gregory dying soon after, his Successors regardless of his Engagements, still continued to bestow English Benefices upon Foreigners. This Conduct obliged the House of Commons to petition Richard II, to banish all the Effects of the beneficed Agents, and banish them the Realm, which the King did accordingly.

In the same Reign, the Statute of Provifers was confirmed [and enlarged.]

Two Years before, Richard forbid the Clergy, under great Penalties, to pay a Tax imposed by the Pope

The next Year he issued out a Proclamation commanding, upon pain of Death and forfeiture of Estate, all Persons that were gone to Rome to sollicite the Repeal of the Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire, to return into England within such a time.

And within such time. And these Precautions being insufficient to check the P^{res}sumptions of Popes, who pretended not to be bound by Acts of Par^{liam}ent, the Statute of Præmunire was revived in 1393, with Enlargements, which seemed to leave the Court of Rome no hopes of evading it. The Act ran, That all Persons that should pursue, in the Court of Rome, Translations, Sentences of Excommunication, Bulls, Murders, or any other things whatsoever, contrary to the Rights of the King and Crown, should be put out of the Protection of the Laws, and proceeded against according to the Statute of Præmunire. That all those who should bring into the Kingdom these foreign Instruments, or receive and publish them, should be liable to the same Penalties. Lastly, that they who pursued any Process in a foreign Court, to the prejudice of the King's Right, should be treated in the same manner.

They rigid A^t might well curb the English who were subject to the Laws, but not the Pope, who was out of their Reach, accordingly he defisted not by his Pretensions. In 1398 he translated the Bishop of Lincoln to the See of Chöfer (2), and gave the Bishöperick of Lincoln to Henry Beaufort, a Son of the Duke of Lancaster. But the Bishop of Lincoln, who had not sued for this Translation, not daring to accept it, by reason of the bruterie of Præmonstré, retired to a Monastery, and the Pope translated the Bishop of Landoff to the See of Chöfer. Richards was extremely offended, that the Pope should take upon him, without being desired, to remove Bishops from one See to another. He summoned the Clergy upon this occasion, and demanded their Opinion of these Translations contrary to his Will. This was a puzzling Question for the Clergy, who, fearing to displease the King or the Pope, avoided giving a positive Answer. Some time after, the Pope sent a Nuntio into England, to try to procure a Repeal of the forementioned Statutes. But though the Nuntio met with an honorable Reception, he could not possibly succeed in his Commission. Richards being deposed the next Year, the Contests with the Court of Rome remained in this Situation.

Certainly it was time for the English Nation, as well as the rest of Europe, to use their utmost Endeavours to stop the Growth of the Papal Power. They must have voluntary shut their Eyes, not to see that all the Proceedings of the Popes tended to render them Temporal Sovereigns of Europe. Of this the Decretal Unanctam Boniface VIII., which shows, that Pope thought himself invested with the Temporal as well as Spiritual Power, is a clear Evidence. But since it might be said, it is not reasonable to ascribe the ambitious Design of Boniface to all the Popes, this Evidence may be supported by another, which demonstrates that Boniface did but tread in the Steps of his Predecessors. I mean John XXII., who by his sole Authority, published a Truce between England and Scotland, against the Consent of one of the Parties, and impowered his Legates to conclude a Peace between the two Kingdoms, upon what Terms they pleased; with Orders to compel the two Kings and their Subjects, punctually to observe the same, under pain of Excommunication. Does not this proceeding show that the Popes acted with the same Spirit, and if their Ambition had been indulged, would have considered Christian Princes but as Subjects, or at least, as Vassals of the See of Rome?

Let us proceed now to the Heresies, or rather the Opinions branded with that Name, during the Interval we have gone through.

In 1286 or 1287, Peckham Archbishop of Canterbury, confuted eight Propositions, maintained by one Richard Knapwell a Dominican Friar. Some of these Propositions, which will serve to show what Subjects were discussed in the Schools, and wherein Knowledge was made to consist, were as follows:

I. That the dead Body of Jesus Christ, had not the same substantial Form, as when living.

III. That if the Eucharistical Bread had been consecrated with these Words, This is my Body, during the three Days Jesus Christ lay in his Grave, the Bread would have been transubstantiated into the New Form, which the Body of Christ took at the Separation of his Soul.

IV. That after the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, the Eucharistical Bread is transubstantiated by virtue of these Words, This is my Body, into the whole living Body of Christ; that is, the Matter of the Bread is converted into the Matter of his Body, and the substantial Form of the Bread, into the substantial Form of his Body, that is to say, into his intellectual Soul, so far as it constitutes the Form of his Body.

VII. That in the Articles of Faith, a Man is not bound to rest upon the Authority of the Pope, or of any Priest or Doctor (1), but that the Holy Scriptures and evident Deductions from thence (2), are the only Foundation of our Assent.

VIII. That the rational Soul is the only Form by which a Man is a Man (3).

This last Article was considered as the Foundation of the rest, and all together were condemned by the Archbishop.

In 1314, In the Reign of Edward II. some Students of Oxford, maintained in their Disputations certain Opinions, concerning the Trinity and Creation of the World, which being brought before the University, were condemned as Heretical.

These Opinions, being wholly founded on Scholastick Notions, were stifled in the Birth, because the People understood nothing of such Matters. But it was not the same with Wickliff's Doctrine, published towards the close of the XIVth Century, in the same University. The Reason is, his Doctrine was of another Nature, and tended to reform the Abuses crept into the Church. Accordingly his Opinions were embraced by great Numbers. As this is the most important Ecclesiastical Affair of the XIVth Century, it will be necessary fully to show these Opinions, and the Zeal wherewith they were received by some, and condemned by others.

John Wickliff, or rather Wickliff, was educated at Oxford in Merton College, where he took his Degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was so eminent for his Learning, Parts, and fine Genius, that Simon lllp Archbishop of Canterbury, having founded Canterbury College (4) in Oxford, made him Rector. Wickliff behaved in his Post with universal Approbation till the Death of the Archbishop, who had a great Esteem for him. Langham, Successor of lsp (5), willing to favour the Monks, and introduce them into the College, attempted to turn out Wickliff, and put one Woodhall a Monk in his room. But he could never obtain the Consent of the Fellows of the College, who were desirous to keep their old Rector. This Affair being brought to Rome, the Monks of Canterbury solicited the Pope to earnestly in behalf of Woodhall, that Wickliff was deprived of his Rectortship. However, this was no Injury to the Doctor's Reputation. Every Body saw it was a general Affair, and that the Monks did not so much strike at his Person, as at all the Seculars that were Members of the College. And indeed, they were all turned out as well he, to make room for the Monks. Shortly after, Wickliff was presented to the Living of Lutterworth in the Diocese of Lincoln, and then it was that he published, in his Sermons and Writings, certain Opinions, which appeared to be Novel, because contrary to the received Doctrine of those Days. As he did not declare his Sentiments till after the loss of his Rectortship, his Enemies have taken occasion, to accuse him of acting from a Spirit of Revenge, by reason of the Injury done him. I shall not undertake to clear him from this Charge. As there is none but God alone that sees into the Hearts of Men, it is rashness to accuse, or excuse them, with regard to the secret Motives of their Actions.

I shall only take notice, that Wickliff's bitter Enemies have never taxed him with any Immoralities. These are the chief Articles maintained by Wickliff in his Writings and Sermons.

I. That the Eucharist, after Consecration, is not the whole real Body of Christ, but only its Emblem or Figure.

II. That the Church of Rome is no more the Head of the Universal Church, than any other Church; nor was there any greater Power given to St. Peter, than to the rest of the Apostles.

III. That the Pope of Rome has no more Jurisdiction in the Exercise of the Keys, than any other Priest.

IV. That in case the Church misbehave, it is not only lawful, but meritorious to dispossess her of her Temporalities.

V. That when a Prince, or Temporal Lord, is convinced, that the Church makes an ill use of her Endowments, he is bound, under pain of Damnation, to take them away.

VI. That the Gospel is sufficient to direct a Christian in the Conduct of his Life.

VII. That all other Rules instituted by Holy Men, and practised in the Monasteries, add no more Perfection to Christianity, than whiteness to a Wall.

VIII. That neither the Pope, nor any other Prelate, ought to have Prisons for the punishing Offenders against the Discipline of the Church, but that every Person ought to be left at his Liberty in the Conduct of his Life.

It must be observed, that Wickliff, in the last Article, did not pretend, as he explained himself afterwards, to take from the Pope or the Prelates, the Power of Binding and Loosing, but only meant, that the Church had no Right to inflict Temporal Punishments on Sinners.

Whether Wickliff and his Followers stretched these Articles, by the Consequences which may naturally be deduced from them, or his Adversaries, from whom we have all we know of him, made any Additions, in order to render him odious, we find in the Historians, many of other Opinions ascribed to him. Among these additional Opinions, there may be some not to be maintained, and there are others, which, being contrary to the Articles of the Church of England, have made some English Writers speak of Wickliff with Contempt, and even call him Heretic. But it would be too long, fully to examine here all these Opinions. Let us therefore be contented with those that first appeared, which are really his, and have served for Foundation to all the rest.

These Opinions, maintained by Wickliff with great Vivacity, were immediately espoused by great Numbers, not only among the Students of Oxford, but the great Men at Court; particularly the Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Percy, Earl Marshal, declared for him. It must be observed, that this happened towards the End of the Reign of Edward III. at a time when that Monarch, old and infirm, left the Administration of the Government to the Duke of Lancaster his Son, as we have seen in his History.

Gregory XI. being informed, that these Articles were publicly maintained at Oxford, dispatched an Order to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of London, to apprehend and examine Wickliff, and send the two prelates to Rome. But it was difficult for these two prelates to execute these Orders, the Duke of Lancaster, and the Earl Marshal, having openly declared, they would not suffer Wickliff to be imprisoned. Indeed, there was yet no Act of Parliament, empowering the Bishops to imprison Heretics, without the King's Consent. The two Prelates therefore were contented with summoning Wickliff before them, in St. Paul's Church, where there was a vast Concourse of People to hear the Examination. The Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Percy accompanied the Doctor, assuring him, there was no danger, and that he might make his Defence with Courage, against Men, who were but mere Ignoramuses in comparison to him. Here is a short Dialogue which passed between these two Lords, and the Bishop of London, upon Wickliff's account. The Lord Percy bidding the Doctor sit down, the Bishop of London opposed it, and commanded him to stand up, but the Earl Marshal would not let him.

Bishop of London. Lord Percy, if I could have guessed, you would have played the Master here. I would have prevented your coming.

The Duke of Lancaster. Yea, he shall play the Master here for all you.

The Lord Percy. Wickliff, sit down; you have need of a Seat, for you have many things to say.

Bishop. It is unreasonable that a Clergyman, cited before his Ordinary, should sit down during his Answer. He shall stand.

Duke of Lancaster. My Lord Percy is in the Right. And for you, my Lord Bishop, who are grown so proud and arrogant, I will take care to humble your Pride, and not only yours, but that of all the Prelates in England. Thou dependest upon the Credit of thy Relations, but far from being able to help thee, they shall have enough to do to support themselves.

Bishop. I place no Confidence either in my Relations, or in any Man else, but in God alone, who will give me the Boldness to speak the Truth.

The Duke speaking softly to the Lord Percy :

Rather than take this at the Bishop's Hands, I'll drag him by the Hair of the Head out of the Church.

The Duke of Lancaster must needs have been very passionate, since it is certain the Bishop's last Words were not inoffensive enough, to occasion so great a transport of Anger. But it may be, the Bishop used harsher Expressions, which the Historians, Friends of the Clergy, have taken care to soften, that the Duke might appear to be in the wrong. However, the Duke's Words to the Lord Percy, being overheard by some Standers-by, occasioned the Tumult, mentioned in the Reign of Edward III, the Particulars whereof it will be needless to repeat. It suffices to observe, that upon this Accident the Assembly broke up, and Wickliff's Examination was deferred to another time.

The Death of Edward III happening shortly after, and the Duke of Lancaster being President of the new King's Council, the Bishops durst not proceed against Wickliff. During that time, the Number of his Followers increased so considerably, that the University of Oxford, debated whether they should receive the Pope's Bull, commanding them to prosecute Wickliff with the utmost Rigor. The Historian who relates this particular, not acquainting us with their final Resolution, the Bull was probably rejected. Hence it appears, that Wickliff's Doctrine was not embraced by some ignorant Persons only, but by Men of Letters, and Persons of Quality. Some would make us believe, that People were frightened into a feigned Approbation of his Doctrine. But it may be said, on the contrary, with much more probability, that Fear hindered many from being his Followers. For a Man ran no risk in continuing to adhere to the old, whereas it was dangerous to embrace the new Doctrine.

The Pope finding, his Bull to the University of Oxford produced no great Effect, sent fresh Orders to the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London, to prosecute Wickliff. But as he had Intimation, that the Bishops could not proceed in the Affair without the King's Licence, he enjoyed them to represent to Richard and his Council, that Wickliff's Errors were not only dangerous to Religion, but likewise to the State. However, the King's Council, it seems, did not think so. Perhaps no body was willing to offend the Duke of Lancaster, Wickliff's open Protector.

The two Prelates however, willing to obey the Pope to the utmost of their Power, summoned Wickliff a second time before them at Lambeth. He appeared, and by his manner of explaining his Opinions, seemed ready to give the Prelates some sort of Satisfaction. But, probably, they would not have been contented with so general an Explanation, if one Clifford a Gentleman, had not rudely entered the Assembly, and forbid them to proceed. It is said, the two Prelates were over-awed by this absolute Order, though they knew not from whence it came; believing that Clifford durst not act thus of himself. Besides, the Populace intimidated by their menacing Words, that they would not see Wickliff ill-treated. These Considerations obliged the Bishops to disavow the Doctor, forbidding him to amuse the People any more with Disputations of so dangerous a Consequence. But he had no regard to this Injunction, since, according to the Testimony of an antient Historian, he continued to preach and defend his Doctrine. By the way, this Steadiness ill agrees with the Explanation of his Opinions, which it is pretended he gave to the Bishops, and is represented as full of Equivocations and Evasions. The Truth is, this disguising his Sentiments is little agreeable to his natural Temper, which was far from being timorous. Be this as it will, from that time he lived in quiet upon his Cure of Lutterworth, without any farther disturbance. Some time after, Courteney Archbishop of Canterbury, Successor of Simon Sudbury, beheaded by the Kentish Rebels, summoned a Provincial Synod at London, where Wickliff's Doctrine was condemned. An Historian affirms, that Wickliff was cited, and explained his Opinions in a manner very different from the literal Sense of the Words. But as the Records of the Synod mention nothing like it, the Historian has, very probably, confounded this Synod with that of Lambeth.

The Condemnation of Wickliff's Doctrine, prevented not its spreading all over the Kingdom, and with such Success, that the fore-mentioned Historian assures us, two Men could not be found together, and one not a Lollard. Richard II, as was observed in his History, permitting the Bishops to prosecute and imprison Heretics, several Lollards were cited before their respective Bishops. Some recanted, and others bravely stood the Shock. But among these last, there was not one delivered over to the secular Arm, there being yet no Law to that purpose. It was not till the next Reign, that those barbarous Executions commenced in England. So, notwithstanding the Opposition of the Bishops, Wickliff's Opinions flew over the Kingdom with a wonderful Swiftness, because the Clergy were not at Liberty to oppose the only means they have all along thought proper to extirpate Herefy. It seems also, the Bishops durst not personally attack Wickliff, for fear of having their Ignorance too much displayed by his superior Learning. Be that as it will, Wickliff was left in quiet at Lutterworth till his death, in 1384 (1). Probably, in process of time, his Followers made some Additions to his Doctrine, and hence it is, they have ascribed to him whatever was advanced by his Disciples.

The Loss of the Master disheartened not his Followers. They continued to preach and maintain their Opinions, with the same Courage as during his Life. The daily Progress of their Doctrine, became at length so considerable, that in 1386, the Parliament thought themselves obliged, to petition the King to take care that the Church and State received no detriment by the novel Opinions of the Lollards. Whereupon the King appointed Commissioners to peruse Wickliff's Books; but this Commission was very negligently executed.

In 1389, the Wickliffites or Lollards began to separate from the Church of Rome, and appoint Priests from among themselves, to perform Divine Service, after their way. Though some were from time to time prosecuted by the Bishops, these Prosecutions were not very rigorous. Their Aim seemed to be only to hinder them from pleading Prescription. Besides, a Petition presented to the King by a former Parliament, to revoke the Power granted the Bishops to imprison Heretics, restrained the most forward.

But in 1395, the Endeavours of the Lollards, in the King's Absence, to get their Doctrine approved by the Parliament, put the Bishops upon taking other Measures. These pretended Heretics finding themselves supported by an infinite Number of Followers, presented to the House of Commons a Remonstrance (2), containing these twelve Articles.

I. That when the Church of England, treading in the Steps of the Church of Rome, began to make an ill use of her Temporalities, Faith and Charity began to disappear.

II. That the English Priesthood derived from Rome, and pretending to a Power superior to Angels, is not the Priesthood settled by Christ upon his Apostles.

III. That the Celibacy of the Clergy, was the occasion of many scandalous Irregularities in the Church.

IV. That the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, renders the greatest part of Christendom guilty of Idolatry.

V. That Exorcisms, Benedictions, pronounced over Water, Bread, Oil, Stones, for the Altar, Church-Walls, Priest's Vestments, the Mitre, Crosse, Pilgrim's Staff, have more of Necromancy than Religion.

VI. That it was a great Crime, to join in the same Person Ecclesiastical and Civil Offices.

VII. That Prayers for the Dead, in which one Person is preferred to another, are not conformable to the Charity prescribed by the Gospel.

VIII. That Pilgrimages, and Offerings made to Images and Croffes, and especially the Pictures representing the Holy Trinity, are a sort of Idolatry.

IX. That Auricular Confession, serves only to make the Priests proud, and by letting them into the Secrets of the Penitent, gives Opportunities for many Sins, and scandalous Intrigues.

X. That the taking away any Man's Life, either in War, or Courts of Justice, is contrary to the Doctrine of the Gospel, which is a Dispensation of Grace and Mercy.

XI. That the Vow of single Life, undertaken by Women, is the Occasion of numberless Disorders, and of the Murder of Multitudes of Children unbaptized, or even unborn.

XII. That it is necessary to banish from Civil Society all useless Trades, which serve only to support Pride and Luxury.

All these Articles were backed with Proofs too long to be inserted.

This Remonstrance, which very likely was privately approved by several Members of Parliament, so alarmed the Clergy, that they immediately deputed the Archbishop of York and Bishop of London to the King, praying him to return with all speed into England, that he might by his Presence and Authority check the Growth of the new Doctrine, as was related in the Reign of Richard II.

Some time after, Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, summoned a Synod at London, where eighteen Articles extracted from Wickliff's Book, entitled Triologus, were condemned.

These are the most remarkable Particulars concerning Wickliff and his Doctrine, before the Deposing of Richard II. But I must not forget to add, that certain Bohemian Students, being at Oxford when Wickliff began to publish his Doctrine, they carried it into their own Country, where it spread wonderfully. It is time now to proceed to other Affairs relating to the English Church, and in the first Place to the Councils.

I shall begin this Head with the General Council of Lyons, opened May 1. 1274. This Council was summoned chiefly to receive the Greeks into the Communion of the Church of Rome, from which they had separated a second Time, upon the Latines being driven out of Constantinople. This Union indeed was accomplished, but did not last long. Another Reason of the Council's meetings, was to reform the Affairs of the Christians in Syria. As great Endeavours were pretended to be used in their favour, the Pope demanded a Subsidy of every Church. It was easy to see the Pope's Interest in this Demand. His Predecessors had made so frequent use of this Means to procure Money, that there was no being deceived. However, not a Prelate dared to open his mouth against it, and the Archbishop of Canterbury who was present, kept silence like the rest. Richard Mepham (1) Dean of Lincoln, was the only Person that ventured to speak for the Interests of England. He boldly said, the English Clergy were not able to contribute to the War, by reason of the continual Exactions of the Court of Rome, which scarce left them wherewithal to subsist. This Freedom cost him his Deanery, of which the Pope instantly deprived him. Hence we may judge of the Liberty in this Council. I come now to the Councils held in England during the four last Reigns.

The first was convened in the Reign of Edward I (2), by John de Peckham Archbishop of Canterbury. In this Council were ratified the Canons of the General Council of Lyons, concerning Pluralities. Then the Archbishop passed some Canons directly contrary to the Prerogative Royal, and for that reason he was obliged to repeal them afterwards.

The First decreed Excommunication against such as sued for the King's Letters, to prohibit certain Causes from being tried in the Ecclesiastical Court.

The Second rendered liable to the same Penalty the Magistrates, who refused to imprison excommunicated Persons, after the forty Days allowed by the Canons.

By the Third, they that invaded the Church's Lands were likewise to be excommunicated.

The Fourth prohibited under the same Penalty the selling of Provisions to the Archbishop of York, whenever he should come within the Archbishop of Canterbury's Jurisdiction.

This was a short and sure way to end his Dispute with the Archbishop of York, about carrying the Cross. So, in case this Canon had not been annulled, the Archbishop of York would have found it difficult to be present at the Parliament, which was generally held at London.

The Fifth ordered the Copies of Magna Charta to be set up on Church-Doors, that every one might read them.

Hence may be judged with what Spirit this Prelate, who had long sojourned at Rome, was returned to England, and how far he would have extended the Church's Power, if the King had not opposed his Designs (3).

In 1281, the same Archbishop convened at Lambeth a Synod of provincial Synod, where, among others, the following Canons were made.

The Second enjoined the Priests to acquaint the more ignorant sort of the Laity, that the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ are delivered to them, together with the Species of Bread, and that what they receive in the Chalice, is not Holy, but only mere Wine, to help them to swallow the other Species with more ease. For (as the Canon goes on) the Blood of our Lord is allowed only to the Priests that celebrate Divine Service in these lesser Churches (4).

The Third Canon forbids Priests to re-baptize the Children that had been baptized by the Laity, unless there is Reason to doubt, whether the Child was baptized or not.

In that case the Canon allowed the Priest to baptize the Infant, with these additional Words, If thou art not already baptized, I baptize thee in the Name of the Father, &c.

The Xth enjoins the Priests to instruct the People committed to their Charge in plain intelligible Language, without making use of scholastic Terms and Distinctions. Then the Canon lays down the Heads they were to expound upon, and the Sense they were to give them.

In 1287, Peter Quivil Bishop of Exeter, held a Diocesan Synod, which enjoined, that care should be taken to instruct the People concerning the Doctrine of Transubstantiation. They were to be told, that the Adoration of the Host could not be carried too far, since they received under the Species of Bread, the same Body that hung upon the Cross for their Salvation, and under the Species of Wine, the Blood which was shed from Christ's Side. It seems that we may infer from hence, that in the Church of Exeter, the Laity received the Sacrament then in both Kinds (5).

We meet but with one remarkable Council in the Reign of Edward II, held at London in 1310, where the Templars were condemned to perpetual imprisonment.

In 1328, in the Reign of Edward III, Mepham Archbishop of Canterbury, held a provincial Synod at London. By this Synod, Good-Friday, and the Conception of the Blessed Virgin were made Holy-Days, and all Work forbidden; but however the Country People were allowed to follow their Business after Divine Service. By the same Synod, all Monks, Hermits, and Canons Regular, were prohibited taking Confessions. A Canon made in a former Synod at Oxford, which admitted Appeals only after a definitive Sentence, was revoked.

In 1332, Mepham held another Provincial Synod at Magfield, which settled all the Holy-Days observed in the Province of Canterbury. Among the Festivals we find St. George's Day, and St. Augustin's first Archbishop of Canterbury (6).

Stratford Archbishop of Canterbury, held at London in 1342 a provincial Synod, the most remarkable Canons whereof are these:

The IVth enjoined the Monks, who had any appropriated Livings, to relieve the Poor in proportion to the Value of the Benefice. In case of failure, the Bishops were empowered to compel them to their Duty by sequestrating the Profits.

The IXth was levelled against the mendicant Friars, who abusing the Confidence of dying Persons, persuaded them to make Wills prejudicial to their Families. As the Synod durst not directly attack the Friars, who were under the Pope's Protection, those who were prevailed on to dispose of their Estates so unreasonably, were barred the Benefit of Christian Burial.

During the Reign of Richard II, we find no remarkable Councils, but those held on occasion of Wickliff and his Followers. But as these have been mentioned elsewhere, it will be needless to repeat here what has been said.

(1) Reyn by mistake calls him Richard de Peckham. It was Richard Mepham, who is supposed to have died at the Council of Lyons.

Of the Schism.

Though England was no more concerned than other Christian States in the Schisms that happened in the Church, I do not think it proper wholly to pass them over in Silence. This Knowledge is not only absolutely necessary, for the understanding of the Ecclesiastical History of those times, but it may in some measure be said, that the best Part of that History consists of what followed from these scandalous Schisms.

John XXII. and Clement
V.

From the beginning of the Reign of Edward I, to the end of the Reign of Richard II, Christendom was divided by two Schisms. The first lasted not long. Clement V, removing the Papal Chair to Avignon, died there in 1314, and was succeeded by John XXII, who kept his Residence at the same Place. This Pope's Election was after an extraordinary manner. The Holy See remaining vacant about two Years after the Death of Clement, because the Cardinals could not agree, they met at length at Lyons in 1316, in order to chuse a Pope. But the same Divisions still reigning among them, they agreed to refer the Matter to the Cardinal of Ostia (1) Bishop of Oporto, who, without any Suspence, nominated himself, and took the Name of John XXII. At the same time the Empire was divided by a double Election, one part of the Electors voting for Lewis of Bavaria, and the other, for Frederic Duke of Austria. John's Refusal to acknowledge the first, occasioned a Quarrel between them, which continually increased till 1328, when Lewis passing into Italy degraded Pope John, and caused Peter de Corbaria a Cordelier, to be elected, who assumed the Name of Nicholas V, and resided at Rome. This Anti-pope being supported by the Emperor and the General of the Cordeliers, kept his ground some time. But at last the Emperor being forced to quit Italy, and Dissension arising among the Cordeliers, Nicholas having none to defend him, was taken and carried to Avignon, where he asked John's Pardon with a Halter about his Neck. After this Submission, he was put into close Confinement, where he died in a few Months.

and Cl.
VII.

The second Schism between Urban VI, and Clement VII, was more considerable and of longer Continuance. I have related the Rise of it in the History of Richard II, for which reason I shall only shew its Effects, to the end of this Century.

To Pope Urban VI, succeeded in 1389, Boniface IX, who, as well as Clement, pretended to be desirous to put an end to the Schism; but nothing was farther from their Intentions. Clement VII, who died at Avignon in 1394, had for Successor Benedict XIII.

All Christendom being tired and offended at the Schism, the Court of France endeavoured to persuade the two Popes to resign their Dignity, that another Pope might be canonically elected. They both consented, but broke their Word. Benedict especially used so many Evasions, that the King of France resolved to withdraw his Kingdom from his Obedience. For that purpose, he gained the Cardinals of that Party, who promised to desert him; but Benedict having notice, fortified himself in his Palace of Avignon, by introducing an Aragonian Garrison. He was besieged by Marshal Baucourt, but shortly after, that General had Orders to raise the Siege. Thus by the Intrigues of some Princes of the Court of France, the Schism still continued, notwithstanding the King's Endeavours to close it.

Nothing more remains but to give a brief account of such Ecclesiasticks as were eminent for their Merit and Learning, in the Reigns of the three Edwards and Richard II.

Kilwarby.

Robert Kilwarby, a Cordelier, or Minorite, was Archbishop of Canterbury in the Reign of Edward I, and a Prelate of eminent Learning for the Age he lived in. He wrote several Theological Tracts, which were in great repute in those Days. His Merit having raised him to the Dignity of a Cardinal, he resigned his Archbishoprick, and went and lived at Rome, where he died.

Burnell.

Robert Burnell, Bishop of Bath, was chosen for Successor to Kilwarby; but the Pope, by the Plenitude of his Apostolick Power, gave the See of Canterbury to John Peckham an English Franciscan, who was Auditor of his Chamber. This Prelate had great Contest with Edward I, as well on occasion of the Canons of his Synod, before mentioned, as upon other Accounts. The Quarrel went so far, that the King was going to banish him the Realm. He was reckoned very learned, particularly in the Civil and Canon Law. There are some Theological Tracts of his, with Commentaries upon several Books of the Scripture.

Wanchese.

Robert Wanchese, Successor of Peckham, preferred his Archbishoprick to a Cardinalate which the Pope would have honoured him with. This Prelate is chiefly praised for his Charities. He used to relieve four thousand poor People twice a Week at his House, besides his maintaining many young Scholars at both the Universities. These Charities gained him the Affections of the People, who, after his Death, stocked in Crouds to his Tomb, and payed him the regard of a Saint. Mean while, this Archbishop, so beloved by the People, had great Contests with Edward I, for being deeply concerned in the Intrigues of the Lords who opposed the Designs of the King. The Pope, whom Edward knew how to gain to his Interest, cited the Archbishop to Rome, to justify his Conduct, and laid him under a Suspension. It was not till the Reign of Edward II, that he was restored.

John Britton Bishop of Hereford, chiefly excelled in the Knowledge of the Common Law. He wrote a Book much esteemed, de Juribus Anglicanis, and died in 1275.

Joannes Duns Scotus, commonly called Doctor Subtilis, lived in the Reign of Edward II, and is too well known to be enlarged upon. It suffices to observe, that he differed in many Things from the Opinion of Thomas Aquinas, and was a great Champion for the immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin. After being Professor in Divinity at Oxford and Paris, he died at Cologne in the same Office, in 1309 or 1310.

Walter Stapleton Bishop of Exeter, was eminent for his Learning, and Capacity in the Administration of the Public Affairs; and particularly for Loyalty to Edward II, his Sovereign, for which he lost his Life, as was related in the History of that Prince (2).

Stratford Archbishop of Canterbury under Edward III, was more famous as a Statesman, than as an Archbishop. I have related elsewhere his Contest with Edward III, who accused him of Misdemeanours. But afterwards the King commanded his Accusations against him to be cancelled, as containing Things neither true nor reasonable.

Thomas Bradwardin Successor of Stratford, was a great Bradwardin, Philosopher and Mathematician, and withal a very learned Divine. He was commonly called the profound Doctor, according to the Custom of those Days, of giving such Titles, to those that were eminent for their Learning. He wrote a Book against the Pelagians, which gained him great Reputation, intitled, Of the Cause of God. But what rendered him still more esteemed than his Learning, was, his Humility, and his Zeal to instruct the People committed to his Care. Before his Promotion to the Archiepiscopal See, he was Confessor to Edward III, and attended that great Prince in all his Expeditions. Some have done him the Honour to say, that the Progress of Edward's Arms, in France, was in great measure owing to his prudent Counsels.

William Occam, of the Order St. Francis, Disciple of Occam. Duns Scotus, is famous for being head of the Nominallists against the Realists, of whom his Master Scotus was Chief. It would be needless to explain here, wherein consisted the Difference between these two Sects of Philosophers, with which, God be thanked, the publick Schools are now seldom troubled.

Richard Fitz-Ralph, Archbishop of Armagh (3), born at Fitz-Ralph Dundalk in Ireland, was a great Enemy to the mendicant Friars. He attacked them vigorously in his Sermons preached at London, wherein he undertook to prove the nine following Propositions.

I. That, with respect to the Place where Confessions are to be made, the Parish Churches are to be preferred before those of the Friars.

II. That Parishoners ought rather to confess to a Curate, than to a Fryar.

III. That, notwithstanding Jesus Christ was poor whilst upon Earth, yet he never affected Poverty.

IV. That Christ did never beg, nor make Profession of voluntary Poverty.

V. That he never taught People to make Profession of Beggary.

VI. That Christ held the contrary, namely, that Men ought not to beg by Inclination and Choice, but only when forced to it by Necessity.

VII. That to profess Beggary, is a thing contrary to Religion and common Sense.

VIII. That to be under Engagements of voluntary Poverty, is not agreeable to the Rule of the Friars Minorites, or Cordeliers.

IX. That the Bull of Alexander IV, which condemns the Libel of the Doctors of Paris, censures none of these eight Propositions.

These Articles, which attacked the mendicant Friars in the most sensible part, it being by their voluntary Poverty that they had gained, and preserved their Credit with the People, were carried to the Pope, who cited the Archbishop before him. He appeared, and courageously maintained all his Assertions. But before this Affair was decided, he died at Avignon 1360. He translated the Bible into English, and wrote two Treatises, one in Defence of the Parish Priests, against the Fryars; the other, de Audientia Confessionum.

Trevel. John de Trevisa, a Cornish Man, who lived in the Reign of Edward III. translated the Bible, and several other Books into English. He was of the same Opinion as the Archbishop of Armagh, and maintained, that Jesus Christ sent Apostles, but never mendicant Fryars, to preach the Gospel.

These are almost all that were eminent for their Piety and Learning, during the four last Reigns; unless we reckon among the famous and learned Men, a Company of School-men, who, in my Opinion, deserve not to be placed in that Class. Some add, the Founders of Colleges and Monasteries, as meriting to hold a considerable Rank among the Devout. But these are too ambiguous Marks to be relied on. One may judge by this small Number of learned Persons, how the Sciences were degenerated, since among all the above-named hardly is there one truly learned. In spite of the Prejudices of Wolfe's Enemies, I shall make no scruple to except that Doctor, of whom I have already said enough to excuse me from adding any thing farther (1).

He was Canon Regular of St. Albans, and wrote a History of the English, and ends at the Death of Edward I. 1294.

Beampton. The Author of the Chronicle, which goes under the Name of John Beampton, Abbot of Jervaulx in Yorkshire, died about the time of the Black Death, in 1348, and ends with the Death of Richard I. 1298. It is plain from this History, that he was a person of that Order, and that neither Beampton, nor any Member of that Religious House was a Canon Regular, but that Times, but takes notice of the Chronological part in the whole Story of the History. He gives the same Law, and the same Translation pretty nearly.

Higden. Ravenna Higden, Monk of St. Werke, in Cheshire, where he died very aged in 1367, was a downright Plagiarist. He took all the Chronicle of Matthew, in many Places. He uses his Words, Politeness. What he collected relating to the Time of the Normans, and the Plantagenets, published by Dr. Gale, V. I. Matthew of Westminster. Matthew, a Broadshire Monk of Westminster, ended his History at the Year 1209, though it was afterwards continued by other Hands. He was a choice Collector of the Flowers of famous Historians, from whence he usually filed Florilegia. He chiefly translated Matthæus Paris. His most eminent Continuator was Adam Murimuth, Canon Regular of St. Paul's, and an eminent Chronologist, who in his latter Days gave birth to the Reading and Writing English History. He begins his Work at 1302, and reaches to 1380.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

The Reigns of HENRY IV, and HENRY V. Containing the Space of Twenty two Years and Ten Months.

13. HENRY IV. Surnam'd of BULLINGBROKE.

HENRY IV, continues the same Parliament called by Richard.

HENRY Duke of Lancaster, fir-named of Bullingbroke the Place of his Birth (1), having been proclaimed the 30th of September, took that very Day the Reins of the Government. As the Parliament then assembled was called in Richard's Name, and as their Authority ceased upon his being deposed, Henry's first Care was to call another. To proceed according to Custom, the Representatives must have been chosen anew.
But Henry did not think fit to run the risk, of having a less favorable Parliament than that which had so heartily espoused his Cause. He was contented therefore, with im-powering the same Representatives, to make, with the House of Lords, a new Parliament under his Authority.
I shall not venture to decide, whether this Proceeding was somewhat irregular, or authorized by any former Precedent. Be this as it will, after a few Days Interruption, the same Parliament met again on the 9th of October, as if called by the new King.

72. Earl of Marche returns to Wigmore.

Mean time Edmund Mortimer Earl of Marche, confidering it would be no less dangerous than fruitless, at such a juncture, to assert his just Right to the Crown, retired to his Lordship of Wigmore (2), near the Borders of Wales. The more incontestable his Title was, the more reason he had to dread the new King's Jealousy. So, giving way to the Torrent which he could not stem, he resolved to live in Retirement, without shewing the least Ambition, or the least Uneasiness at the Injustice that was done him. He had no other way to secure his Repose, and even his Life, against the Suspicions of a Prince whose Interest it was to destroy him. It was but too probable, that the new King would embrace the first Occasion, to free himself from the Uneasiness which such a Rival could create.

The Parliament being assembled, as I said, Thomas the Arch-Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury made a long Speech, tending to inspire a high Opinion of the Advantages procured to the Kingdom by the late Revolution. He enlarged chiefly on the Disorders of the late Reign, and assured that the new Sovereign proposed to govern after a very different manner, and to preserve to All their Rights and Liberties. This Prelate was banished the Realm in the late Reign, and Roger Walden, who was appointed in his Room, had hitherto performed the Archiepiscopal Functions. But as Arundel was not canonically deposed, the Parliament in their first Session (3) ordered that he should resume his Dignity, and the rather as the other had not yet obtained the Pope's Confirmation. The Archbishop's Speech, and some preliminary Formalities, were the only things remarkable in the first Session of the new Parliament, which was adjourned to the 14th of October. This Adjournment was necessary in order to prepare for the Coronation, which was to be on the 13th.

During this Interval the King filled several Posts, which he were vacant, or possessed by Persons he did not like. Henry the King Percy Earl of Northumberland, and Ralph Nevill Earl of Westmoreland, had shewn too great a Zeal for the late King, by joining him at Ravenpur, presently after his Landing, not to have a share in his Favours. Henry willing to shew his Gratitude, made the first High-Constable, and the other, Earl-Marshal (4). A few Days after, he gave also to the Earl of Northumberland the Isle of Mann.

particularly of the Court of Rome, and that the Pope had no Right to interpose in the Civil Government of the Realm.

The Shrewsbury Parliament designing to extend the Royal Authority as much as possible, had so multiplied the Cases of High-Treason (1), that none, but such as acknowledged in the Sovereign an unlimited Power, could possibly avoid the Penalty of it. To redress so dangerous a Grievance, which tended to render the King absolute Master of the Lives and Fortunes of his Subjects, the Parliament revived a Statute, made in the Reign of Edward III (2), and enacted, that nothing should be adjudged to be Treason, but what was contained therein.

After the Rights and Privileges of the People were, by these Acts, restored to the same State as before the Incroachments of Richard, the Authors and Advisers of the Usurpations, were called to an account. When King Richard apprehended the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, he was not invested with that absolute Power, so liberally conferred upon him afterwards by the Shrewsbury Parliament; so that he was forced to proceed according to Law, in the Condemnation of these three Lords. To that end, he ordered it, that John Holland Earl of Huntington, his Half-Brother Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, his Nephew, Edward Plantagenet Earl of Albemarle, his Cousin, Son of the Duke of York, John Beaufort Earl of Somerset, Son of the Duke of Lancaster by his third Wife, and the Lord Thomas Spencer, were the Accusers of the three imprisoned Lords. The Earl of Salisbury (3) and the Lord Mortimer (4), were reported to be the chief Contrivers of this Plot. After Condemnation, Richard distributed the Estates of the three Lords among the Accusers and Evidences. Moreover, he made the Earl of Albemarle a Duke, and conferred the Title of Duke of Exeter on the Earl of Huntington, of Duke of Surrey on the Earl of Kent, of Duke of Somerset on the Earl of Somerset, and of Earl of Gloucester on Thomas Spencer.

Walling.

As it was publicly known, that the three Lords were unjustly oppressed by the late King, the Parliament thought it necessary to punish the Authors and Instruments of this Violence. For that purpose, after reversing the Sentence against the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, as directly contrary to the Pardon that was granted them, it was resolved, that the Accusers should be deprived both of their new Titles, and the Estates distributed among them (5). As to their own Lands, it was left to the King, either to continue them in possession, or turn them out as he pleased. Henry, willing to show his Clemency in the beginning of his Reign, not only left them their Estates, but likewise restored them to their Honours. Moreover, he made the Duke of Exeter his Brother-in-law (6), Governor of Calais. The Earl of Salisbury and the Lord Mortimer, Richard's detested Ministers, and principal Authors of the Violence practised upon the Duke of Gloucester, and the other two Lords, were released after a short Imprisonment, though the People loudly called for their Death. As the Friends of these Lords alleged in their Excuse, that Richard compelled them to act, the Parliament took occasion to pass an Act, declaring, That for the future, Compulsion should be no legal Excuse to justify Actions contrary to Law.

General
Pardon.

This Affair being over, the Parliament prevailed with the King to grant a general Pardon, in which however were excepted, the Duke of Gloucester's Murderers. One of the Villains (7) being apprehended and convicted, was hanged at London, and his Head sent to Calais, to be fixed on one of the Gates.

The Succession settled on the House of Lancaster.
Walling.
Cotton's Abridg.

Though the Injustice done to the Earl of March was manifest, it might in some measure be coloured, with the pretence of rewarding Henry for the signal Service he had done the State. If this Reward had been limited to his Person, perhaps it would not have seemed very strange, that in so extraordinary a Case the Laws should be superseded in favour of a Prince who had so freely exposed himself for the Publick. But at such junctures, it is very difficult to keep within the Bounds of Equity. The Parliament not content with adjudging to Henry the Crown taken from Richard, would moreover secure it to his Posterity. To that end, an Act was passed, settling the Succession on the House of Lancaster: first on the Person of the Prince of Wales, the King's eldest Son and his Heirs, then on his three Brothers and their Issue.

A very important Affair still remained, concerning which the King was desirous to have the Advice of the Parliament before they broke up. The Commons, not satisfied with the bare deposing of Richard, after a very irregular Manner, would have had him tried in Form, and petitioned the King for that Purpose (8). It was therefore to know how Richard was to be disposed of, that the King wanted the Advice of the two Houses. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who was charged with his Orders, having exacted an Oath of Secrecy from all the Members, made the first Motion. It may well be thought, that Richard had not many Friends in the House, and if any disapproved of the Proceedings against him, they were too much awed to venture to speak in his behalf. There was one however bold enough, to say publicly, what others only thought, namely, Thomas Marks Bishop of Carlisle, who, without regarding the Motives which might induce him, as well as the rest of Richard's Friends, to keep Silence, made a long Speech, wherein he alleged every thing that could with any Plausibleness be said for the King deposed, and against the King on the Throne.

The Bishop undertook to prove three Things. "First, That there was no Authority which could lawfully depose a King of England. Secondly, That the Offences Richard was accused of, deserved not Deposition; on, and besides were not proved. Thirdly, That the Crown was unjustly adjudged to the Duke of Lancaster."

"He enlarged very much on the first, showing the great Difference between the several kinds of Government established in the World. He confessed that in some, the Prince or Head might be deposed, because the supreme Authority was not solely lodged in his Person, but the People, or Nobles, had a Share. Of this sort he reckoned the Republicks, the antient Government of Rome, the Empire of Germany, the Kingdoms of Sweden and Denmark, the Earldom of Flanders, and some other States. But he maintained, it was otherwise in the Governments where the supreme Authority resides in the single Person of the Sovereign. In this Class he ranked the Kingdom of Israel, among the Antients, with the three first Empires; and among the Moderns, England, France, Spain, Scotland, Muscovy, Turkey, Perfia, and in general all the Kingdoms of Asia and Africa. With regard to these he alleged, that though the Vices of a Sovereign should be not only detrimental, but even intolerable to his Subjects, he could not be lawfully deposed by any Means whatever: That Force could not be used, without incurring the Crime of Rebellion and Treason; and much less Authority, since there was not in the State any lawful Authority but what was derived from him. He produced Arguments and Precedents from the Holy Scriptures and profane Authors, which cannot be repeated without being exceedingly tedious."

Upon the second Article, he boldly asserted, "That the Crimes for which Richard was deposed, were either false or aggravated: That indeed, he might be guilty of some Errors or Oversight, but his Faults could not be styled Tyranny: That if his Failings afforded just Cause to depose him, how many Sovereigns would daily be treated as Tyrants, and deposed by their Subjects? Every Tax, Execution of Rebels, in a word, whatever was not relished by the People, would furnish a pretence to dethrone the most lawful Prince." He passed over the more slightly the proofs of this second Head, as the Parliament, it self seemed to question the Truth of the Crimes alleged against Richard, since there was no Step taken to prove them in a legal manner. By the way, it is very likely that for fear of this Reproach, the Commons wanted to proceed in Form against the deposed King.

Upon the third Article the Bishop maintained, "That even supposing Richard guilty; and granting the Na-

The Offences declared to be Treason by that Statute are these: "Compelling or imagining the Death of the King, the Queen, or of their eldest Son and heir: Violating the King's Companion, or the King's eldest Daughter unmarried, or the Wife of the King's eldest Son and heir: Levying War against the King in his Realm, or aiding in Aidment to the King's Enemies in his Realm, or giving them Aid or Comfort in the Realm, or elsewhere: Counterfeiting the King's Great Seal, or Privy Seal, or his Money, or bringing counterfeit Money into the Kingdom: Killing the Chancellor, Treasurer, or any of the King's Justices, in their places, and in the Execution of their Office."

1399. "tion had Authority to depose him, there was not the least Colour of Justice to give the Crown to the Duke of Lancaster. That if the Duke was the true Heir of Richard, as he pretended, he must wait his Death before he could inherit. But it was known to all then, there was a nearer Heir, whose Father was declared Successor of Richard by Act of Parliament." As for Henry's pretended Right from Edmund Crouch-back Son of Henry III, the Bishop disdain'd to consider it, affirming, "he was very certain, that People of Sense were ashamed of a Right, built upon so slender a Foundation."

After this the Orator proceeded to examine the other two Titles contained in the King's Proclamation, namely, Conquest, and Richard's Renunciation. To the first he said, "That a Subject could never pretend to a Right of Conquest against his Sovereign, since the Victory it self was high and heinous Treason." As for the Renunciation, he said, "it was not only extorted by Force, but supposing it voluntary, could be of no Validity: That in Richard's Situation, it was not in his Power to make a valid Act: That besides, since by the Laws of the Land the King could not alienate the Crown Jewels, much less surely could he give away the Crown it self (1)." Then he spoke of the general Content of the People, though Henry had not thought proper to insist upon it; "That the Kingdom of England having never been Elective, it was ridiculous to ascribe to the People the Power of disposing of the Crown." Lastly, he replied to the Objection, which might be alledged from the deposing of Edward II, "That wise Men must be guided by Law, and not by Examples and Precedents. That however the Deposing of Edward II, was no more to be urged, than the poisoning of King John, or the Murder of any other Prince; But even in the deposing of Edward II, care was taken to preserve the Rights of the lawful Successor."

What the Bishop had hitherto said, might pass for Reasons, to question whether Richard II could be lawfully deposed. At most, it might be considered as the private Opinion of the Speaker. But towards the Conclusion of his Speech, he launched out strangely against Henry, and expressed a Passion very injurious to the Reasons he had alledged. He said, "it was to be feared the People of England would soon find themselves in the Case of Asop's Frogs; boldly adding, as long as Richard was alive, the English could not with Justice own any other Sovereign. In fine, he maintained, that the Person whom they called King, had committed much more heinous Crimes, than those for which Richard was deposed: That he had, after his Banishment, entered the Kingdom, contrary to his Oath, and without being legally recalled: That, not content with disturbing the Quiet of the Land, by an unjust and impious Insurrection against his Sovereign, he had moreover dispossessed him: That he had also demanded Judgment against him, without offering to prove his Accusation, or permitting the Party accused to make his Defence, contrary to the express Laws of the Realm." He concluded with saying, "That if the wrong done Richard was not capable of moving the Hearts of the English, at least their common and manifest Danger ought to stop the Course of these violent Proceedings."

This Speech produced not the Effect, the Speaker expected. It was so unseasonable, that, supposing the Majority had been of his Mind, it was impossible to recede from what had been done. But most of the Members persisted in the same Maxims they had followed when Richard was deposed. Accordingly, the Bishop reaped no other Fruit from his Harangue, than to be confined in the Abbey of St. Albans, from whence however he was shortly after released without farther Punishment (2).

The Bishop of Carlisle's Opinion being unanimously rejected, the Parliament came, with regard to Richard, to a Resolution, seemingly so extraordinary, that there is some reason to suspect, that History is defective in this Place. However all the Historians agree, that it was resolved, Richard should be kept in Confinement during Life, with a Princely Allowance: But in case any Person should attempt his Deliverance, Richard should be the first Man that should suffer Death. If this be true, it cannot be denied that he was really condemned to die, since his Life was only granted him, on a condition not in his Power. Besides, such a condition cannot be annexed to the Sentence of a Criminal, but on Supposition that he is already condemned.

It is not my Business to determine, how far the Authority of the Parliament may be extended, with respect to the King's Person. I shall only observe, that this is the second Instance of the deposing of a King of England, without hearing his Defence, or so much as observing the usual Formalities prescribed by the Law, in the Trial of the meanest Subject. The Parliament which deposed Edward II, was satisfied with decreeing, that he should be kept in safe Custody during Life. But this Parliament, to Richard's deposing, adds the Sentence of Death: For no otherwise can the Condition be considered, upon which his Life is granted. Let us farther remark, that one of the chief Articles of Accusation against this Prince, was his putting to Death the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, without a previous Trial. And yet this same Parliament condemns him unheard, upon his bare Confession, when a Prisoner; not, that he is guilty of the particular Crimes laid to his Charge, but that he is in his own Opinion unworthy to wear the Crown. They are not content with stripping him of his Royalty, but order him to be imprisoned for Life. What do I say? They really condemn him to die, since in seeming to grant him his Life, they add a condition, which probably must soon make him lose it. If in perusing the Reign of Richard II, one can't help detesting the Principles of the Shrewsbury Parliament, which tended to subject the Lives, Honours, and Fortunes of the Nation to the King's Will, what ought we to think of this? By a contrary Excess, they put the Life and Honour of the King himself in the Power of his Subjects, and refuse the Sovereign a Privilege, which every English Subject has a just Right to demand. The Examples these two Parliaments afford, are a clear Evidence, that the English Constitution can never pretend to that Degree of Perfection, boasted by some, till the Bounds to be prescribed to the Prerogative Royal, and the Privileges of Parliament are precisely determined.

Whilst the two Houses acted in common and with equal Ardour, for the Interest of the Prince they had placed on the Throne, the Convocation was sitting in St. Paul's. As the King rightly judged, that, in order to support himself in the Throne, it was absolutely necessary to make the Clergy his Friends, he sent the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, to assure them of his Protection. The Earls being admitted into the Assembly, said, they were come from the King, not to demand Money, as was customary in the late Reign, but to acquaint the Clergy of the King's Resolution to maintain their Privileges and Immunities. Adding, they ordered to assure the Convocation, that the King was ready to concur with them, in whatever Means should be judged proper to extirpate Heresy, and punish obstinate Hereticks. They concluded, with desiring the Clergy's Prayers for the Welfare of the King and Kingdom. Nothing was more apt to gain the Hearts of the Ecclesiastics, than the King's Promise with regard to Heresy. The Number of the Lollards, which daily increased, gave the Clergy just occasion to fear, that in the end a Reformation might be set on foot, which could not be but very detrimental to their Temporal Interests. Accordingly, the Assurances the King gave the Convocation, were received with great Demonstrations of Joy and Thankfulness.

Some Days after, the Parliament having finished the principal Affairs to the King's Satisfaction, and, in appearance, with the Approbation of the whole Kingdom, was dissolved according to Custom. Prorogations were not then so frequent as since (3).

The Parliament dissolved.

During the whole Session, Henry had little attended to foreign Affairs. Those at home seemed to him of much greater Moment, since the Business was to settle a Revolution that procured him the Crown. As soon as he found himself free from these first Concerns, he thought of means to justify to the other Sovereigns, the late Alterations in England. The Deposing of a King being odious in it self, and seeming to affect all Princes, it was not easy to persuade them, that a Nation had sufficient reason to use so violent a Remedy, to free themselves from Tyranny. Upon this account, Henry dispatched Ambassadors to all the principal Courts of Europe (4), to endeavour to give a plausible colour to Richard's Deposition, and his own Promotion. He was chiefly concerned to pacify the Court of France, as the only one whose Repentment was dangerrous (1). He was not ignorant, that Charles VI had formed a Design to revenge the Injury done his Son-in-Law, and that his Displeasure, into which he was relapsed upon hearing the News, had hindered him from instantly breaking the twenty eight Years Truce, made with England. Henry chose, for Ambassadors, the Bishop of Durham and Earl of Worcester (2), who had Instructions, to propose a perpetual League and Alliance between the two Crowns. Moreover, he ordered them to make Overtures for a double Marriage. The first, which he had projected, was between Henry his eldest Son, and a Daughter of the French King, or one of his Uncles: The second, between his own Daughter and one of the same King's Sons, or nearest Relations. The Ambassadors met with a cold Reception in France; but, as they had Orders not to obstruct their Negotiation, by standing on Ceremony, they patiently waited till the French were grown cooler.

As for the other Courts of Europe, Henry had no occasion to proceed so cautiously. The Emperor Wenceslaus, who was still alive, was a Prince grown stupid with Drinking, and withal, like the rest of the German Princes, regardless of what passed in England. As for the Kings of Castile and Portugal, they were rather Gainers than Losers by a Revolution, that advanced their Brother-in-law to the Throne. So, they readily approved, or at least seemed to approve it.

But another Affair of more Importance created the new King great Uneasiness. Guienne was going to revolt. Already the Gascans publicly talked, of putting themselves under the Dominion of France. It was the City of Bordeaux, Richard's Birth-Place, that stirred up the whole Province, prompted by her Affection for that unhappy Prince, whose Misfortune she lamented. On the other hand, the Court of France, watchful to improve these Dispositions, had sent the Duke of Bourbon into Guienne, to inflame these Discontents. The famous Robert Knolles Governor of that Province, who was no less commendable for his Prudence than Valour, could hardly curb the rebellious Spirit of the Gascans. Nay perhaps he would never have accomplished it, had he not been timely assisted by the Earl of Worcester (3), who being in Embassy at Paris, speedily posted to Bordeaux. The Moderation and prudent Conduct of these two Lords, effected what could scarce have been executed by Force, and at length they had the Satisfaction of seeing the Commotions appeased.

Henry had moreover upon his hands another Affair, which gave him no less Disturbance. As he was sensible, that amidst all the Acclamations he was flattered with, it could not be, but that the late Revolution had bred many Male-content, it was his Interest to keep Peace with his Neighbours. Accordingly this was his purpose, least a foreign War employing his Forces abroad, he should be unprovided, in case of any sudden Insurrection. Besides, a War would have obliged him to demand Supplies of the Parliament, which he was willing to avoid, till his Dominion was more firmly established. These Considerations made him extremely uneasy, to hear that the Scots had broke the Truce, and taken Werk Castle (4). He thought best, however, to take no notice of this Insult, till it was more in his Power to revenge it. But least this Diffimulation should encourage the King of Scotland, he sent Ambassadors to demand Satisfaction for this Outrage. However, as the Scots complained likewise, on their side, of some Breach on the part of the English, he made use of that Pretence to demand a Confirmation of the Truce, by a mutual Reparation of the Damages the two Nations had done each other. When Robert broke the Truce, he imagined France would take his Part, and that the Deposing of Richard would raise Commotions in England, which he designed to improve. But finding France remained quiet, and England undisturbed, he did not think fit to push his Enterprize further. So, without much Solicitation, he agreed to put his Affairs with Henry in Negotiation.

Things being thus in a fair way abroad, Henry chiefly applied himself to what might contribute to support him on the Throne. Two things were absolutely necessary for that purpose. First, to preserve the Affection the People had hitherto expressed for him. Secondly to guard Richard so strictly, that it should be impossible for him to make his Escape. As to the first, he affected to make himself popular, by showing, upon all Occasions, a Detesta-tion of his Predecessor's Tyrannical Government, and a greater Concern for the People's Interest than for his own. To that end, he ordered all the subscribed Blanks extorted by Richard from the Inhabitants of London, and the seventeen condemned Counties, to be brought into Chancery and publicly burnt. These Blank Bonds, which were called Ragmans, had been filled, not only with the Sums, Richard was pleased to exact from the Subscribers, but moreover with an Engagement to observe, under certain Penalties, the Statutes of Shrewsbury and all the consequent Acts. In burning these Bonds, Henry's Intent was to inflame the People, that he designed not to make an Advantage of these extorted Engagements, much less to practise the like Methods himself to fill his Coffers.

As for the deposed King, he did not think proper to keep him any longer in the Tower of London, for fear he should move the Compassion of the Citizens, but ordered him to be conducted to the Castle of Leeds in the County of Kent. Some time after, fearing still, that Richard's Neighbourhood to London would give too frequent Occasion to talk of him, he caused him to be removed to Pontefract Castle in the North.

This Year in November, John the Valiant, Duke of Bretagne, departed this Life in his Capital City. His first Wife was Daughter of Edward III, by whom he had no Issue. By his second, Jean of Navarre, he left two Sons, of whom John the eldest succeeded him, under the Guardianship of the Duke of Burgundy and Oliver de Clifton (5).

In this manner passed the three first Months of Henry's Reign, in a deceitful Calm, followed by violent Storms. It was necessary to enlarge a little on the first Events of this Reign, because they serve for Foundation to all the rest.

The Year 1400, began with a Conspiracy against the King, from which he was as it were miraculously delivered. Historians somewhat differ concerning the Author of this Plot, commonly ascribed to the Abbot of Westminster. However it is more likely, the Abbot was only the Agent of the Lords Conspirators, and lent them his House for their Meetings. Perhaps he was employed to found the Inclinations of several Persons, according to the direction of Men more powerful than he. However this be, it is agreed, that in his House the Plot was formed, into which came as Heads, the [late] Dukes of Albemarle, Surrey and Exeter, the [late] Earls of Gloucester and Salisbury, the Bishop of Carlisle, and Sir Thomas Blunt. All these Lords had been in great favour with Richard II, and were the same Persons to whom the King had left their Honours and Estates, taken from them by the Parliament (6). Among these Conspirators, John Holland Duke of Exeter was his Brother-in-law, and Edward de Langley Duke of Albemarle his First-Cousin. Notwithstanding these Relations, and the Favours they had all received from the King, they resolved to assassinate him and restore Richard to the Throne. The Affection shown them by that unfortunate Prince, the desire of revenging their late Disgrace, of which they looked upon the King as the principal Author, and perhaps the Fear that the Pardon granted them, was not sincere, concurred to inspire them with this furious Resolution. They had drawn into the Plot one Maudlin a Domestic of Richard's (7), who resembled his Master so perfectly, that many were deceived. The Result of their Debates was, that the Duke of Exeter and John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, should pretend to challenge one another at a Tournament, to be held at Oxford, and desire the King to honour it with his Presence; and, whilst he should be intent upon the Sight, an opportunity should be taken to murder him. To the end each might know what Part he was to act in this Tragedy, they carefully set down all the Particulars in Writing. Then they transcribed six Copies under their Hands and Seals, of which each of the principal Parties took one. Pursuant to this Plot, the Duke of Exeter waited upon the King at Windsor, and invited him, as was agreed. The King not mistrusting a Brother-in-law to whom he had just given such signal Marks of his Favour, promised to be at Oxford on the Day appointed. Thus the Conspirators, pleased with this first Success of their Enterprize, went and prepared to put it in Execution.

Under colour of the Pomp and Magnificence usual upon such Occasions, the Lords Conspirators came to Oxford, with a numerous Train of armed Domesticks, and many other Attendants, who pretended to come only out of Curiosity. The Duke of Albemarle was the only Person wanting at the Rendezvous. He had a mind first to visit his Father the Duke of York, then at his Seat at Langley (1), not to communicate the Plot, but upon some other Business. Whilst they were at Dinner, the Duke of York seeing a Paper in his Son's Bosom, asked him what it was. The Son confounded at this unexpected Question, replied, but with a visible Concern, that the Paper contained nothing of moment. But, whether the old Duke had received some dark Intimations of the Plot, or his Son's Confusion inspired him with the Curiosity, he snatched it out of his Bosom. This Paper was one of the six Copies signed by the Conspirators. His surprize was extreme, at seeing all the particulars of the Plot. He reproached his Son the more justly, as, besides the Blackness of the Crime, he had not scrupled to expose his own Father's Life, who was bound for his Allegiance. But his Reproaches being incapable of remedying the Evil, he resolved to prevent it, by acquainting the King with what was come to his Knowledge. To that end, he ordered his Horses to be saddled immediately, in order to go himself to Windsor, and carry the Paper to the King. The young Duke seeing himself infallibly ruined, if the King was informed of the Conspiracy by any but himself, resolved to be before-hand with his Father. As he was better able than the old Duke to take this Journey, he rode another way, and came full speed to Windsor. Upon his Arrival he cast himself at the King's Feet (2), and discovered the whole Plot. Henry was so far from imagining, that the Duke of Exeter and the rest of the Conspirators, had plotted against his Life, that he believed at first, the Duke of Albemarle had invented this Accusation, on purpose to ruin them. He told him, if the thing was true, he would pardon him upon his Repentance; but if it was a malicious Accusation, he should find no Favour. The Duke of York arriving soon after, put him out of all doubt, by delivering him the Paper taken from his Son. After so convincing a Proof, the King no longer questioning the Truth, broke off his Journey to Oxford, where he was to be the next Day. However he resolved to stay at Windsor, to see what Course the Conspirators would take, when they saw themselves disappointed.

The Conspirators in Perplexity.

Mean while, the Lords were extremely uneasy at Oxford, because the Duke of Albemarle was not yet arrived. They had already sent to his House to know the reason of his delay, and were told that he was set out for Oxford, but by the way of Langley, to visit the Duke his Father. This Visit giving them some Suspicion, their Trouble increased, upon hearing that the King designed not to come to Oxford, and had seen the Dukes of York and Albemarle. Then, no longer doubting that they were discovered, they resolved to accomplish by Force, what they could not effect by other Means. Accordingly they dressed up Maudlin in Royal Robes, and gave out he was Richard, who having escaped out of Prison, was come to implore the Assistance of his good Subjects (3).

They resolve to take up Arms, and give out Richard was with them.

The People flock to the pretended King.

The Readiness wherewith People listed under the Banner of the pretended King, plainly showed, that all had not approved the deposing of Richard, though the Parliament acted in the Name of the whole Nation. Wherefore, there is nothing more liable to mistake, than judging of the Sentiments of the People, by those of their Representatives. The Reason is, because the Representatives debating upon Matters laid before them, without any Instructions from those they represent, their Resolves can be considered but as private Opinions, though they are of force to bind the People. Upon this Account it is, that the People sometimes appeal to Arms from the Decisions of Parliaments, when thought too prejudicial to the Nation. Of this we have many Instances, but particularly in the Reign of Henry IV. Though Richard was deposed by the Parliament, it appeared, upon several Occasions, that the People submitted to the Sentence, purely by Constraint; since, not only at the time we are speaking of, but, upon other Occasions, they were always ready to run after any Counterfeit Richard that was presented them.

In a very short time, the Lords Conspirators saw waiting themselves at the head of so formidable an Army, that they thought themselves able to seize the King at Windsor. It is said, that in two or three Days, their Army consisted of forty thousand Men. With these numerous Troops they began their march to Windsor, which lies but thirty Miles from Oxford, and arrived at break of Day (4), in great Expectation of surprising the King. And indeed, Henry not imagining they could possibly be so soon in condition to execute such an Enterprize, staid at Windsor till that very Night, and was gone but a few Hours before their Arrival. His Retreat blasting their Design, they were in great Perplexity. Some were for marching directly to London, before the King had time to secure the City. Others affirmed, their Business was to go to Pontfract, to free Richard and set him at their Head. This Diversity of Opinion made them lose in Debates, the time they should have spent in Action. So the King had Leisure to provide for his Defence, and assemble an Army of twenty thousand Men. As he did not question but the Male-Contents would take the road to London, he went and expected them on Hounslow-Heath, in hopes his Army would daily increase. However, he was resolved, though much inferior, to hazard a Battle. This Resolution inspired his Troops with Courage, and made them imagine, the Male-Contents were not so formidable as reported. It was likewise the Cause, that many, seeing the King march unconcerned towards his Enemies, came and joined him, in order to show their Diligence; which doubtless they would not have done, had he shown, on this Occasion, the least signs of Fear or Diffidence. At such Junctures, the Majority of the People, without considering Right or Justice, generally declare for the Side that is most like to succeed.

The King's Resolution of Advantage is bimo.

Mean while, the Conspirators seeing the King able to withstand them, durst not cope with him. Whether it proceeded from their little Capacity, or from a Fear of being deserted by their Army, they only thought of avoiding a Battle. Instead of marching to London to meet the King, they took the Road to Reading, and encamped near Coltbrook, where the young Queen Jabilla resided (5). Here they resolved to put an end to Maudlin's acting the part he had hitherto played, thinking it more proper to spread a Report, that Richard was in Yorkshire, at the head of a hundred thousand Men. Their Design was not only to avoid the King, but, in all appearance, to approach Wales, from whence they expected Assistance, as Richard was well beloved in that Country. Be that as it will, encamping near Cirencester (6), the Generals took up their Quarters in the Town, whilst the Army lay without. The Duke of Surry, and the Earl of Salisbury lodged at one Inn, and the Duke of Exeter, and the Earl of Gloucester, at another. Their little Experience causing them to neglect to set Guards at the Gates, the Mayor of the Town, a Man of Sense and Courage, took advantage of their Negligence, to do the King a signal Service. He privately drew together in the Night, four hundred Townsmen, and ordering the Gates to be shut, divided his Followers into two Companies, and attacked at once the two Inns where the four Generals were lodged. Though these Lords had only their Domesticks with them, they defended themselves the best part of the Night. During the Conflict, one of their People bethought himself of setting Fire to a neighbouring House, imagining the Townsmen would run to extinguish the Flames, and thereby give the Lords opportunity to escape. But this Stratagem had a quite contrary Effect. The Townsmen, still more incensed by this Action, redoubled their Efforts, and at length broke open the Inn, defended by the Duke of Surry (7), and the Earl of Salisbury (8). These two Lords being much wounded, were, by the Mayor's Order, immediately beheaded. On the other hand, the Duke of Exeter (9), and the Earl of Gloucester, perceiving they were no longer able to resist with so few Attendants, found means to escape over the Houses, and get out of the Town by the help of some of the Inhabitants. They intended to march the Army into the Town, but upon coming to the Camp, found it deserted. The Report the Soldiers had heard, and the Fire they had seen in the Town, making them believe the King's Army was there, they had all taken to sudden Flight, seized with a Panic, which made them fear Danger where there was really none. So the two Lords, perceiving it out of their Power to execute their Design, parted, the better to make their escape. But they had the misfortune to be taken (1), and shortly after lost their Heads on the Scaffold. Maudlin was also apprehended (2) as he was flying into Scotland, and condemned to be hanged. The Abbot of Westminster likewise withdrawing, was seized with so violent a Fright, that he fell into a Fit of the Apoplexy, and died. As for the Bishop of Carlisle, he was taken also, and sentenced to Death. But though, out of regard to his Character, the King pardoned him, he was not in a Capacity to enjoy the Benefit, when the News was brought him. The Terror of his Punishment made such an Impression upon him, that it occasioned his Death, when Mercy was influencing the King to spare his Life.

In all likelihood, the ill Success of this Enterprize hastened Richard's End. There is some Diversity among the Historians concerning the manner of his Death, though all agree, it was unnatural. Some affirm, he was starved to Death. Others pretending to be better informed, relate his death with these Circumstances. After the Troubles were appeased, by the Death of the principal Conspirators, one Sir Piers Exton (3), came to Pontfract, with eight Attendants. On the day of his arrival, Richard perceived at Dinner, that the Victuals were not tasted as usual. He asked the Reason of the Taster, and upon his telling him, that Piers had brought an Order from the King, took up a Carving-Knife, and struck him on the Face. Piers coming in, with his eight Attendants, at the Noise, Richard found he was a lost Man, and resolving to sell his Life dearly, wrung a Pole-Ax out of one of their Hands, and defended himself so bravely, that he slew four of them. But at length, standing accidentally near Piers, who was got upon a Chair, the Villain discharged such a Blow on his Head, as laid him dead at his Feet (4).

Thus died this unfortunate Prince, Thirty-three Years old, of which he had reigned Twenty-two (5). A melancholy Reward for the many signal Services his Father had done England! He was carried to London in a Coffin, with his Face uncovered, to be seen of all Persons. His Funeral was solemnized at St. Paul's, the King himself being present. After that, he was carried to Langley Abbey, and buried (6) without any Ceremony. Henry V. ordered his Body to be removed to Westminster Abby, and laid among his Ancestors (7). Though it was reported all over the Kingdom, that he was murdered, no Inquiry was made. This neglect confirmed the People in their belief, that the King was not innocent. And indeed, if Richard died of a natural Death, it would have been necessary to undeceive the Publick. But if his Life was taken away by Violence, it was difficult to do it without the King's Knowledge (8).

Though Richard was not beloved whilst he sat on the Throne, his Misfortunes failed not to raise the Compassion of the very People that were so ready to desert him. It is peculiar to Misfortunes, especially to those of Princes, generally to turn Hatred into Pity. Of this we shall see in the Course even of the present Reign, several Instances.

The English Authors pretend, that Charles VI. made great Preparations to restore Richard to the Throne. But the History of France does not observe that there were any. It is true, there are in the Collection of the Publick Acts, several of Henry's Orders relating to the Preparations in France, to invade England; but that might be an Effect of Henry's Policy, to show thereby, the Necessity of Richard's Death. And indeed, the Truce of Twenty-eight Years between the two Crowns, was confirmed in May this very Year, and all the pretended Motions of France, ended only in a Negotiation, to draw from England Queen Isabella, with whom Richard had not consummated his Marriage. It was not without reason, that Henry endeavoured to preserve the Truce with France. He had a Quarrel with the King of Scotland, which would not suffer him to carry his Forces out of the Kingdom. The occasion of the Rupture between these two Princes was this:

Robert Stuart, King of Scotland, the third of that Name, was desirous to marry Prince David his eldest Son, to a Daughter of George Dunbar, Earl of March. The Earl thinking himself honoured by this Alliance, joyfully received the Proposal, and even paid beforehand part of the Portion. However, shortly after, by Intrigues foreign to our purpose, Prince David married a Daughter of Archibald, Earl of Douglas. Dunbar was extremely mortified at this Affront, to which the King added another Cause of Discontent, by refusing, or delaying to re-pay the Money he had received. The desire of being revenged, and making the King sensible, that he deserved a better Treatment, inspired the Earl with a Resolution to throw himself into the Arms of the King of England, and do his Enemies all possible Mischief. To that end, he imparted his design to the Earl of Northumberland, Governor of the northern Counties, who presently after sent him a Safe-Conduct from the King his Master. Upon receiving this Assurance, he repaired to Henry, and had several Conferences with him (9). The King of Scotland being sensible, that the Earl of March was contriving some Plot against him in England, sent Ambassadors to Henry to demand the Fugitive, and upon his Refusal, proclaimed War against him.

Henry not thinking fit to expect his Enemy in England, prepared to carry the War into Scotland. As soon as his Enemy was ready to march, he came to Newcastle, and sent Robert a Summons to appear in Person (10), and do Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland. In the Summons, he revived the Pretensions of Edward I. to the Sovereignty of that Kingdom, from the time of Lachrimus Son of Brutus, first pretended King of the whole Island of Albion. Upon Robert's Refusal to do any such Homage, Henry entered Scotland, and made some Progress. Towards the end of September, he besieged the Castle of Edinburgh, defended by Prince David and the Earl of Douglas his Brother-in-law. But the Season being too far advanced to continue the Siege, he suddenly raised it, and retired into his own Dominions. As soon as he was gone, the Scots under the Conduct of Sir Patrick Hepburn and Sir Thomas Haliburton, made an Inroad into England, and cruelly revenged the Ravages committed by the English in Scotland. But in their Return, they were met by the Earl of Northumberland, who defeated and stripped them of their Booty. Hepburn, one of the Scotch Generals, was slain in the Action (11). This Victory procured between the two Nations a fix Weeks Truce, which was afterwards prolonged, by reason of the Posture of Henry's Affairs. Hardly had he begun the War with Scotland, when he received certain Advice, that the Welsh were about to revolt, and intended to raise Commotions in their Country, which could not but be attended with fatal Consequences. This was the reason, that notwithstanding his Success against the Scots, he would not improve his Advantages, for fear of exasperating them too much. Buchanan himself gives him this Testimony, ascribing to his Generosity what was entirely owing to his Policy; for the Motions of the Welsh had rendered a Peace with Scotland absolutely necessary.

The Welsh, who, since the Reign of Edward I. were subject, or rather united to England, believed they could improve the present Juncture, to recover their former State. Owen Glendour or Glendourdy, as he is always called in the Collection of the Publick Acts (12), was the

In this Town of Plymth, the said Duke of Exeter was beheaded on September 22. — Thomas le Spenser, Earl of Gloucester, was taken at Bristol, and beheaded there. Walslog. p. 163.

Polydore Virgil says, He was not fasted to death, but he kept himself in such a manner, that he died in a few Days. He was buried in a Church in London, where giving himself up wholly to Contemplation, he lived and died, and was buried at Stirling. Perhaps this was true of some counterfeit Richard.

Person

1400. Person that inspired them with this Design. This Man, who a private Gentleman only, had all the Qualities proper for such an Undertaking; if Forces so little considerable as those of the Welsh could have promised him a happy Success. Nevertheless, he so managed this Project, that for several Years he freed his Countrymen from the Servitude, wherein they thought themselves kept by the English. A Law-Suit he had lost at London with the Lord Grey of Rutlin, his Neighbour, was the first occasion of the Difficult, he conceived against the whole English Nation (1). The Conspiracy before spoken of, breaking out in England at this very time, Glendour, not doubting it would cause great Disturbances, thought it a favorable Juncture, to deliver his Country from the English Dominion. He privately founded the Welshmen, and finding them very inclinable to receive his Impressions, he easily persuaded them to resolve to throw off the English Yoke. He would have immediately discovered his Designs, if the ill Success of the English Conspiracy had not restrained him. The Moment he saw the King engaged in the War with Scotland, he prepared to execute his Project; and so ordered it, that the Welsh unanimously renouncing their Allegiance to the Crown of England, acknowledged him for Sovereign. From thenceforward he always styled himself Prince of Wales, as appears in several Acts.

Atheism.

His first Exploit was against the Lord Grey his Adversary, whom he took Prisoner in a Battle, and then made him marry his Daughter, without giving him his Liberty, contrary to his Word. Emboldened with this first Success he made an Incurtion into Herefordshire. Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, who was retired to his Lordship of Wigmore, finding the King was employed in Scotland, thought to do him a signal Service, by drawing together the Gentry of the Country, in order to stop the Progress of the Rebel. But he had the Misfortune to be taken Prisoner in a Battle, and though he offered a large Ransom, could not obtain his Liberty. Glendour imagined, a Prisoner of that Consequence might be of use hereafter, or at least that the King would spare nothing for his Deliverance; and therefore it would be more advantageous to treat with the King, than with the Prisoner himself. But he was mistaken in his Conjecture. Henry was too well pleased, to see the Earl of March a Prisoner, and unable to hurt him, to contribute towards his Release. Glendour however still kept his Prisoner, in expectation that, by his means, he should one Day be able to give the King some Disturbance, as it actually happened. The Earl was not afterwards sorry for being in the hands of the Welsh. Henry's Jealousy of every thing relating to his Crown, and his Severity to those that would dispute it with him, made the Captive Earl sensible, that his Life was safer in Prison than at his own House. Mean while, the King being busied in a Scottish War, Glendour had sufficient time to ravage the Country on the West of the Severn, and carry away a great Booty.

About the end of this Year, Manuel Palaeologus, Emperor of Constantinople, arrived in England, to desire Assistance against Bajazet Emperor of the Turks. The King received, and presented him honorably, but as for Assistance, put him off till his Affairs were better settled in his own Kingdom. The Emperor went from England into France, from whence he departed not till two Years after, upon News that Bajazet his Enemy was vanquished and taken Prisoner by Tamerlane.

On the 20th of January 1401, Henry assembled a Parliament, which passed several Acts, with relation to the Church. The first confirmed the Statutes made in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II, against such as solicited for Papal Provisions (2), or carried to the Ecclesiastical Courts, Causes belonging to the Cognizance of the Judges of the Realm. This was the old subject of Quarrel with the Court of Rome. Whatever Rigour was used to stop the Course of these Abuses, it was not possible, because it was the Interest of too many to countenance the pretended Prerogatives of the Pope. But however this Parliament, considering the Pope still continued to engross the Collations of all the Church-Preferments of the Kingdom, and that the Ecclesiastical Courts were perpetually encroaching upon the Civil, resolved at last to oppose it effectually. For that purpose, were revived the old Statute of Provisors in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II, commonly known by the Name of Premunire. As this Term often occurs in the English History, it will not be improper to explain it. By Premunire is then meant, either the Statute itself, or the Penalty. Former Parliaments, led by the same Motive as this, had ordained Punishments against the Provisors, that is, against such as sued for Bulls, called Provisions or Gratias Exsecratorie, to the Court of Rome, for Benefices that were, or should be, vacant. The same Punishments were ordained against those, that carried to the Ecclesiastical Courts what belonged to the Civil. When any Person was guilty of this sort of Crime, a Writ or Order was issued against him, beginning with these Words, Premunire facias, whereby he was commanded to appear in the King's Court. Hence the Statute, as well as the Penalty, were called Premunire (3). This Penalty consisted in Forfeiture of Lands, and Goods, and Imprisonment during the King's Pleasure. In process of time, several other Offences of a like nature, with those that were the first Cause of the Statute, were made liable to the same Penalty. So all the Statutes of Premunire, are only Enlargements of those made in the Reigns of Edward III and Richard II. In general, the Premunire chiefly concerns Offences committed in Matters Ecclesiastical, belonging to the Civil Jurisdiction.

Premunire.

Explanation of that Term.

The Clergy were always so intent upon favouring the Pretensions of the Court of Rome, that the Endeavours of the former Parliaments had been incapable to stop the Course of this Abuse. The Statute I have just mentioned, was but little more effectual. The Attempt, last Year, to dethrone the King, giving him occasion to fear the like Conspiracies for the future, he had resolved to show great regard for the Clergy, in order to attach them to his Interest. Accordingly, though he did not think proper to refuse his Assent to the new Statute, he connived however at the Breach of it, as much, or more, than any of his Predecessors. But this was not the only thing he did to gain the Affection of the Clergy. His Condescension for them in another Article, of no less Importance, drew on him the Blessings of the Ecclesiastics, and caused him to be considered by the whole Body, as a Prince exceeding zealous for the Church.

Since Wicliff first published his Opinions, about the end of the Reign of Edward III, this Doctrine was so spread, that the Clergy were in continual Apprehensions of its prevailing. I have already related, that, in the Reign of Richard II, the Bishops obtained a general License to imprison Heretics, without being obliged to have a particular Order from the Court; but that the House of Commons caused it to be revoked. From that time there was no Alteration, except that the King more frequently granted such Orders. However, as the Penalty of Imprisonment was not capable to check the pretended Evil, dreaded by the Bishops, Henry, ever proposing to gain the Affection of the Ecclesiastics, earnestly recommended to the Parliament the care of the Church's Concerns. How reluctant soever the House of Commons might be to persecute the Lollards, the Credit of the Court and Councils of the Clergy, obtained at length an Act for the burning of obstinate Heretics (4). This Statute was no sooner passed, but the Ecclesiastical Court immediately condemned one William Sawtre (5) a Lollard, who being delivered over to the secular Arm, was burnt alive by virtue of the King's Writ (6) directed to the Mayor (7) of London. This Man was the first who suffered Death in England, for the sake of Religion. During this Session several Acts were likewise passed (8) concerning the Disputes between the English and the Court of Rome, which I shall have occasion to speak of elsewhere (9).

Since the Truce with France was confirmed, Charles VI. or rather the Duke of Orleans his Brother, and the Dukes of Barri and Burgundy his Uncles, who governed in his Name, often demanded the young Queen Isabella Widow of Richard II. Henry deferred giving a positive Answer, not that the Demand was unjust; but two Reasons made him desirous of keeping that Princess. First, as he could not help dreading a War with France, he wanted to make a firm and lasting Peace with Charles VI. to which he believed the Marriage of Isabella with the Prince his Son would greatly contribute. To that end, before he returned a positive Answer to the Court of France, he frequently proposed that Marriage. But neither Charles's Brother nor Uncles would ever consent to it, not being able to think of marrying the young Queen, to a Prince whose Father was generally reckoned the Murderer of her first Husband. They alleged, however, another Reason for declining it; namely, That her Father not being in Condition to manage his Affairs, they durst not treat of his Daughter's Marriage without his Consent. A second Reason why Henry deferred Isabella's Refutation, was because he knew the Money, Richard received with her, would be demanded. However, as he had no plausible pretence to detain her, he contented at last to restore her with part of her Jewels. He managed so artfully, that in the Conventions made at Lenningham, there was no mention of restoring her Treasure. That was the Subject of another Negotiation, spoken of hereafter.

Whilst this Affair was transacting, Henry had in Germany another Negotiation on foot, about a Marriage between Blanch his eldest Daughter, and Lewis of Bavaria, Grandson of Robert Earl Palatin of the Rhine, who was lately advanced to the Imperial Throne, vacant by the Death of Henry of Brunswick Successor of Wenceslaus. This Affair was concluded in May, to the King's great Satisfaction. The Princess's Portion was forty thousand Pounds Sterling (1). At the same time, a Treaty of perpetual Alliance was made between the Emperor and Henry.

Since the Revolt of the Welsh, Henry had made no Preparations to reduce them to Obedience. Mean while Glendour, taking advantage of this Negligence, continued to ravage the Counties bordering upon Wales. Far from dreading the King's just Indignation, he studied to provoke him by continual Insults. Henry's Indolence appeared strange to many People, because they were ignorant of the Reason. Before he took up Arms against the Welsh, he was desirous of finishing his Affairs with France, and even intended to make a strict Alliance with that Crown. As he knew the Rebels could have no Assistance but from thence, he believed, if he could deprive them of that Protection, they would not be able to support themselves long. Mean time, the Negotiations with France, proceeding more slowly than he wished, and Glendour still continuing to infest his Borders, he could no longer delay taking up Arms. Before he put himself at the Head of his Army (2), he published a general Pardon for the Welsh, provided they submitted within a certain time. But finding his Clemency ineffectual, he marched to chastise them. Upon his Approach, Glendour withdrew to the Mountains, where it was impossible to attack him. All the King could do was to ravage the Country, and then return to London.

The King's Return to his Metropolis, was immediately followed by the Discovery of a Plot against his Life, by the means of an Iron Instrument, with three sharp Spikes placed in his Bed. Had he chanced to lie down, he must inevitably have been run through the Body, but by good Fortune, he perceived it just as he was going into Bed. What Inquiry soever was made, there was no possibility of discovering the Author of this traitorous Attempt.

It was this and not the last Year (3), as some affirm, that Edmund Duke of York the King's Uncle, died. He left two Sons, Edmund Duke of Almarle, who took the Title of Duke of York, and Richard Earl of Cambridge. I shall have frequent Occasion hereafter, to speak of the Posterity of the younger, who, by his Marriage with a Sister of the Earl of March, acquired to his Issue, Rights, which caused such terrible Commotions in the Kingdom.

In the beginning of the next Year, the King by his sole Authority, and without the Intervention of the Parliament (4), laid a Tax for the Marriage of his Daughter. Though herein, he had acted by Virtue of an ancient Privilege of the Kings on the like Occasions, the People however seemed dissatisfied. There were not wanting in the Kingdom Persons, who laid hold of every thing to find fault with his Conduct. About the middle of the Year he had reason to perceive, there was still a dangerous Ferment among his Subjects, and if the M. P. Contents remained quiet, it was only in Expectation of a favorable opportunity to rise. On a sudden, an unexpected Rumour was spread over England, that Richard was alive, and had levied an Army in Scotland, in order to expel the Usurper. The People must needs have wished the News true, since it every where met with such Credit. At the same time, on Church-Doors, and in other publick Places, Papers were posted up, containing outrageous Invectives against the King. The Authors of these Papers asserted, among other things, that the Crimes for which Richard was deposed, were nothing in comparison of the tyrannical Proceedings of Henry, since his Accession to the Throne. The King was so provoked at this Audaciousness, that he swore never to pardon the Offenders. Sir Roger Clarendon, natural Son of Edward the renowned Prince of Wales, fell the first Sacrifice to his Vengeance, being condemned to the ignominious Death of a Traitor. Eight Monks guilty of the same Crime, were also hanged with him. Walter Baldock Prior of Laund (5), underwent the same Fate, with a Franciscan Doctor in Divinity, who was hanged in his Friar's Habit, to the great Mortification of his Fraternity (6). Many more were apprehended, upon finding among the Papers of a certain Priest, a List of the Names of those, that declared Richard was alive. But upon strict Examination, it appeared he had made that List, on purpose to make the News the more probable, or upon groundless Conjectures. So, he suffered alone the Punishment of his Rashness. The King's great Severity upon this Occasion, contributed very much to efface the good Opinion conceived of his Clemency and Humanity.

Whilst these things passed in England, Henry was negotiating in foreign Courts, three Marriages at once. The first was between Philippa his second Daughter, and Eric King of Denmark, who was yet a Minor, under the Guardianship of Queen Margaret his Mother. The second, was between the Prince of Wales, and a Sister of Eric's. And the third was his own, with Joanna of Navarre, Widow of the Duke of Bretagne. Of these three Marriages, the first and last were concluded this same Year, but the Prince of Wales's did not succeed.

Henry, in resolving to espouse the Dutchesse Dowager of Bretagne, had probably an Eye, by virtue of this Marriage, to the Guardianship of the three Princes, which the late Duke of Bretagne had left under Age. At least the Court of France, taking it for granted, appeared very much alarmed at this Alliance, which might be very prejudicial to them. This was the Reason that the Duke of Burgundy, Guardian of the young Princes, took them from the Dutchesse's Mother, and carried them to Paris, where they were educated. By this means, the Court of France had the Direction of the Affairs of Bretagne, during the young Duke's Minority. If it be true, that Henry had an Eye to Bretagne, he not only was disappointed, but drew upon himself fresh Enemies. During the whole time the new Duke was in France, the Bretons scarce ever ceased infesting the Coasts of England, though there was no War proclaimed between their Sovereign and Henry. The King's Marriage was not consummated till the Year following.

These Negotiations being ended, Henry prepared in good earnest to chastise the Welsh. To that end, he drew together a numerous Army, and heading them in Person, advanced towards Wales. Upon his Approach, Glendour retired to the Mountains of Snowdon, where he knew there was no possibility of attacking him. Mean time, the King was preparing to ravage the Country; but the Weather became on a sudden so tempestuous, that he was forced to retire. The Storms were so uncommon for the Season, that the English fancied Glendour had made a Contract with the Devil, to prevent the Destruction of his Country.

Whilst the King was employed in those Parts, the Scots under the Command of Hepburne, Son of him slain two Years before, made an Irruption into England, and advanced as far as New-castle. The Earl of Northumber-1402. land, General of the North, was unprepared to repulse the Invasion. But afterwards assembling a great Body of Troops, whilst they continued their Ravages, he went and expected them at Nisbet, where he attacked and defeated them, seizing all their Booty. The Scotch General lost his Life in the Action.

Their Troops were properly but the Vanguard of an Army, with which the Earl of Douglas was advancing to make a more considerable Effort. Upon News of Hepburn's Defeat, he hastened his march into England, to fight the Earl of Northumberland, who being too weak to venture a Battle, was forced to retire, and leave the Borders exposed to his Ravages. Mean while, he laboured without ceasing to augment his Army, and as soon as he was able to withstand him, marched in quest of him, attended by Henry Hotspur his Son, who was reckoned the braved Man in England. The two Armies meeting at Baldwin-Hill (1), a bloody Battle ensued, wherein the English were entirely victorious. The Scotch General lost an Eye, and fell into the Hands of the Conquerors, with the Earl of Fife, Nephew of the King of Scotland, the Earls of Angus, Arbol, Montith, and a great Number of other Officers of Distinction. According to the English Historians, this Battle was fought in July, about a Month after the former. Buchanan places it among the Occurrences of the Year 1401, but in this he is certainly mistaken.

During the whole Summer, the Ambassadors of France and England continued at Lellingham, on account of the Truce which had been violated, particularly in Guienne. The French Historians cast the blame upon England, and the English upon France; but we are not obliged to believe either on their bare Word. In Cases of this Nature, the Historians of both Nations generally contradict one another, with mutual Reproaches of Partiality. Their Honour, it seems, is concerned, to maintain upon all occasions, the Faith and Sincerity of their respective Sovereigns. Be this as it will, the Circumstances of the two Kings had for some time past, been such, that it could be to neither's Advantage to renew the War. Henry believed, the Welsh, and the Male-contents in England, could procure no Assistance but from France alone, which he thought to prevent by means of the Truce, but was mistaken. On the other hand, King Charles's Dis temper, and the Divisions in his Court and Council, promised the French no hopes of any great Success of their Arms.

So, the Truce was again confirmed, without examining too strictly, by which Side it was first violated.

This Affair being settled, the French Ambassadors demanded the Restitution of what King Richard had received with his Queen. Henry, who forewore this Demand, had instructed his Ambassadors what Answer to make. They pretended to be surprised at this Proposal, and said, they had no Orders about it. However, they added, as of themselves, that they did not question, that for the Preservation of a good Understanding between the two Crowns, their Master would agree to deduct that Sum out of the Million and half of Crowns, still due to England, for the ransom of King John. This Pretension did not a little surprize the French Plenipotentiaries, who having no Instructions upon that head, deferred their Answer, till they knew their Master's Pleasure.

The Parliament that met in October (2), granted the King a Subsidy, and then confirmed divers Statutes, made in the Reign of Edward III., in favour of the Clergy (3). The Session ended with a Petition to the King, recommending to him the Concerns of the Scotch Earl of March, who had done the State considerable Services, since his putting himself under the Protection of England (4).

The new Queen being arrived in England, in February 1403, the King received her at Winchester, where the Marriage was consummated (5). After which, she was solemnly crowned at London (6).

Whilst the Court was wholly taken up with Entertainments and Diversions, the King received Intelligence, that the French were going to make a Descent in the Isle of Wight, under the Conduct of Valeran, Earl of St. Pol, of the House of Luxemburg. This Earl having married a Half-Sister of Richard II., pretended to act in his own Name, to revenge the death of the King his Brother-in-law. The Court of France connived at the Undertaking, and even furnished the Earl with Troops, as if it were no prejudice to the Truce. Mean time, this Bravado was unsuccessful to the Earl of St. Pol. After plundering some Villages, he was dishonourably forced to embark, though the Inhabitants of the Isle had received no Assistance. Henry complained to the Court of France of this Invasion, but could get no other answer, than that it was the King of France's Intention to keep the Truce. Had he not been resolved to avoid a Rupture, the Earl of St. Pol's attempt would have afforded him a very just reason to renew the War. But as he was sensible, the Kingdom abounded with Male-contents, he would not give occasion to France openly to support them. On the contrary, by preserving the Truce with that Crown, he meant, to deprive them of the Hopes of being assisted. So, taking no further notice of the Infult, he was contented with obtaining of the Court of France, a fresh Confirmation of the Truce.

They who governed for King Charles were not ignorant of Henry's Resolution, which induced them to have the less regard for him. This very Year the Duke of Orleans sent him a Challenge to fight, either in single Combat, or with a hundred Knights on each Side. The reason of this Challenge is not mentioned by the English Historians, and the French alledge no other, than the Duke of Orleans's desire to revenge the Death of Richard II. Very likely, it was only a Sally of the young Duke's, to signalize himself, by sending a Challenge to a King of England; but he was not pleased with the answer. Henry intimated, that there was a great distance between a King, and any Subject whatever, and therefore he could not accept his Challenge; but they might happen to meet in a Place, where being both attended with a more numerous Train than what he proposed, they might measure Swords with one another. This answer drew from the Duke of Orleans a very reproachful Reply, wherein he called him, Traitor, Usurper, Murderer of his King. Henry sent him a no less abusive Answer, giving him the Lye in form, charging him with using Sorcery, to throw his Father into his present Dilemper. Mean while, he sent to know of the French Ambassadors, who were still with him at Lellingham, whether this Challenge was approved by the King their Master; if so, he considered it as an open Rupture. But though the Ambassadors were frequently called upon to return a positive Answer, it was not possible to oblige them to speak plainly. They only affirmed, their Master had not broke the Truce, nor intended to break it for the future. In fine, as the English pressed them for a Declaration, from those that governed in Charles's Name during his Illness, they plainly told them, whether the King continued out of order, or recovered his Health, no other answer was to be expected. Henry considering this Silence as a disavowing, or rather thinking proper to dissemble, for Reasons already mentioned, was contented with this slight Satisfaction.

During the Congress, the French Ambassadors moved again the Restitution of Isabella's Portion. On the other hand, the English Plenipotentiaries demanded the Refund of King John's Ransom, and endeavoured to evade the Demand of the French, by alledging, that their Master not receiving Isabella's Dowry, was not obliged to repay it. But they thereby furnished their Adversaries with as just a pretence, to lay in their turn, that neither was their Master under any Engagement to Henry, concerning King John's Ransom. However, as Henry demanded the Arrears of the Ransom, only to be excused paying the Dowry, he had his Ends, and the Affair rested there.

Whilst the Ambassadors of the two Crowns were employed in these mutual Cavils, Matters of much greater moment to Henry passed in England. Nothing less than his Crown was at stake. From the beginning of his Reign, to the Victory over the Scots at Baldwin-Hill, no Lord was in greater Favour with the King, than the Earl of Northumberland. As it was properly by the speedy Junction of that Earl with Henry, at his landing in England, that his Affairs were so successful, the King had all along retained a very grateful Sense of it. The Government of the northern Counties, the Office of High-Constable, the Grant of the Isle of Man, and several other Favours, were plain Indications of his Esteem for the Earl, who, on his part, had always appeared very zealous for his Service. The last Year he had gained over the Scots two Victories, the latter of which had saved them from giving his Master any fresh Disturbance. This was a signal Service; but, besides the fore-mentioned

And yet an Affair of Interest bred such Quarrel, that these happy Dispositions were suddenly altered. The occasion of their Difference was this.

I before observed, that the Earl of Northumberland had in the Battle of Halidon, taken several Prisoners of great Quality. The King believing these Prisoners belonged to him, did not think fit to leave them in the Earl's disposal. Perhaps his design was to raise a large Ransom, or else by their means, to procure an advantageous Peace with Scotland. Be that as it will, immediately after the Battle, he sent an express Order to the Earl, to release none of his Prisoners. This Order was quickly followed by another, enjoining him to deliver them into his Hands. The Earl, who expected the Benefit of their Ransom, forthwith repaired to Court, and prayed the King, to leave the Prisoners at his disposal ; but had the Mortification to be denied. He exclaimed against the Injustice that was done him, and spoke to the King a little too haughtily. The Reproaches he let fall on this occasion, so displeased Henry, that he no longer looked upon him with the same Eye as formerly. This coolness was carried so far, that when the Earl would have spoke with the King, he was denied Admittance. This Alteration could not but exasperate the Earl, who thought his Services deserved a different Treatment. As he was naturally very haughty, he could not bear this Contempt, without seeking occa-

Guard, though he knew not for what they were intended. 4503.

As soon as the Confederates were ready, the three Per- Test Male- ceps suddenly appeared in Arms in the North. Shortly af- ter, with ter, the Earl of Northumberland falling ill, his Brother under arms and Son marched with his Troops to join the Welsh, who Walling.

tolerable Tyranny: That none but the Clergy had access to him, and the greatest Lords could not be admitted into his Presence, unless introduced by some Bishop: That moreover, he converted to his own use the Subsidies granted by the Parliament for the publick occasions.
They likewise spread a Report that Richard II. was alive, and reported and that Chyffler with a Body of Troops, ready to join Richard was them. alive.

Henry, who had received no Intelligence of their Designs, was extremely surpris'd at the News of this Rebellion. But as he had fortunately an Army quite ready, design'd against the Welsh, he shew'd no Concern. However, as he was apprehensive, the Rebels Manifesto might poison the People, he believ'd he ought before all things to efface these Impressions, by an Answer published by way of Proclamation. He cleared himself from the two principal Articles of the Manifesto, first by denying he had ever refus'd to admit into his Presence the very meanest of his Subjects, much less any of the Nobility; and called his whole Court to witness. As for the Subsidies granted by Parliament, he affirm'd, most part of the Money was paid on account of the Scotch War, to the Earl of Northumberland himself, as he could prove by his own Receipts.

After publishing this Answer, he marched (3) towards the Rebels (4), who were encamped at Sherburne. When the two Armies were in fight, and ready to engage, he seemed to dread the Issue. His Uneasiness caused him to offer such advantageous Terms to the Male-contents, that Henry Percy being moved by them, desired the Earl of Worcester his Uncle to wait on the King, and endeavour to procure an Agreement. It is said, that in the Conference with this Earl, the King made such Concessions in favour of the Male-contents, that they would have had reason to be satisfied, had not the Earl of Worcester falsely intimated there was nothing to be expected (5). However this be, the Negotiation proving ineffectual, the Battle began. The King had at first great a disadvantage, that he was like to be entirely defeated. He had even his Horse killed under him, and the Prince of Wales his Son was wounded in the Face. But he so fearlessly recovered his Body of Reserve, that by their Help he re-captured his Ground, and inspired his Troops with fresh Courage. From that Moment, the Face of the Battle was entirely changed, to the Disadvantage of the Male-contents. The King's last Charge putting their Army in Disorder, they were so briskly pushed, that Henry obtained in the end a complete Victory (6). Young Percy was slain, and buried after the Battle with the King's Leave. But afterwards, altering his Mind, the King ordered his Body to be taken up, quartered, and fixed on Poles in the High-ways. The Earl of Worcester being taken Prisoner was beheaded, and his Head set up over London Bridge (7).

Mean while the Earl of Northumberland being recovered, was advancing with a Body of Troops to reinforce the Army of the Male-contents, and take upon him the Command. But hearing by the way of his Son's and Brother's Misfortune, he dismissed his Troops, not daring to keep the Field with so few Forces, before a victorious Army. Mean while the King was marching towards the North, well knowing the Center of Rebellion was there, by reason of the Earl of Northumberland's great Interest in those Parts. When he came to York, he took all imaginable Care to secure the Fidelity of the northern Counties, as well by the Oath of the Inhabitants, as by other ways which he judged proper (8). When he thought he had taken just Measures to prevent an Insurrection, he summoned the Earl of Northumberland to appear before him. He promised him an absolute Pardon, in case he obeyed without Delay, but threatened him with utter Ruin, if he refused the proffered Favour. The Earl, having no way to free himself from his present Condition, chose rather to cast himself upon the King's Mercy than live in perpetual Exile. So, without farther Consideration, he repaired to York, and threw himself at the King's Feet, who punctually kept his word with him. He even left him all his Estate, except the Isle of Man, which he had given him in the beginning of his Reign. This was a very light Punishment for so great Crime. But probably, Henry not forgetting the Services done him by the Earl, thought he still owed him this Acknowledgment. Besides the Criminal was already sufficiently punished in the Death of his Son and Brother.

Whilst the King was employed in the North, the Court of France, having been informed of the Earl of Northumberland's Rebellion, was resolved to take Advantage of these Troubles. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Henry received Advice of a Defect, which the Duke of Orleans was to make in England, whilst John Duke of Burgundy, who lost his Father this Year, was to besiege Calais. It is observable, that notwithstanding the Truce, confirmed almost every Year by the two Crowns, France never failed to show her Readiness, to improve the Advantages procured by the Troubles in England during this Reign (1). They who were at the Helm during King Charles's Illness, and particularly the Duke of Orleans, that Monarch's Brother, never thought themselves bound by any Treaties made with Henry. This might be very evidently proved. But as Henry always got clear of the Troubles raised in his Kingdom, the Court of France could only discover very frequently their ill Intentions, without reaping any Advantage. In all appearance, Henry's late Victory over the Rebels, frustrated the Projects formed against him by that Court. However, not to leave him in perfect Tranquillity, as they directed the Affairs of Bretagne during the Duke's Minority, they engaged the Bretons to make a Defect in the western Coasts of England, where they committed great Ravages (2). This Invasion, for which the Bretons could not allege the least reason, exceedingly troubled the King. Nevertheless, as he was willing to avoid an entire Rupture with Bretagne, in hopes of gaining one Day the young Duke to his Interests, he thought it most advisable to hide his Reluctment. This was the reason he was satisfied with some slight Excuses made by the Regency of Bretagne, in disclaiming the Persons concerned in the Defect, as acting without the Government's Orders. But at the same time, he privately gave leave to the Inhabitants of Plymouth and other Places in those Parts, to fit out a Fleet under the Command of William Wilford. This Admiral, though without the King's Commission, set sail for Bretagne, and revenged the Damages sustained by his Countrymen (3). The Parliament, called last Year (4) and afterwards prorogued, met again on January (5) 1404. The King found means to obtain a Subsidy, which must have been very extraordinary, since it was not to be recorded (6). But in vain are Precautions taken to bury in Oblivion such sort of Precedents, which Princes upon occasion too frequently call to remembrance.

The Severities exercised upon the Authors and Accomplishes of the two late Rebellions, induced the Parliament to petition the King for a General Pardon. Henry very willingly complied with their Request, but with such Exceptions as rendered the Pardon of little Effect, since he forgave only those whom he designed not to punish.

Henry's Severity to those who were infatuated with the false Notion of Richard's being still alive, was not capable of unconvincing every Body. A Rumour being once more spread that Richard was in Scotland, one Serle, who had been Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, went to see his old Master. He met with People, who showed him a Man something like Richard, but not enough for a Domestick, who had long served him, to be deceived. Nevertheless Serle feigning to take him for Richard himself, wrote to several Persons in England, that he was actually with him. The Testimony of a Man who could not, as was thought, be mistaken, produced so great an Effect, that many suffered themselves to be seduced with this Imposture. The Countess of Oxford, Mother of the late Duke of Ireland, Richard's Favorite, believed, or pretended to believe, it, and took care to spread the Report. She even sent to several Persons in Richard's Name, little Silver Harts, such as that Prince used to give his Favorites. Mean while the King's Diligence prevented the ill Effects, this Imposture might have caused. He ordered the Countess to be taken into Custody (7), with her Secretary who was in the Secret. Some time after Serle was seized on the Borders of the North (8), and hanged at Berwick. As he confessed the Cheat, and that he was concerned in the Duke of Gloucester's Murder, the Report died away by degrees.

This Year the Bretons made a Defect near Portland (9), and plundered some Houses on the Coast. But advancing farther into the Country, they met a Body of Militia ready to receive them, who drove them back to their Ships, and took several Prisoners of Distinction. Hence there was no Declaration of War between England and Bretagne: But the two Nations however continued to infect one another, though without the Consent of the Sovereigns. France, which then managed the Bretons, was very glad to sow discord between them and the English, lest Henry should strengthen himself with the Alliance of Bretagne, when the Duke was of Age. For the same reason Henry connived at these Insults, for fear of depriving himself of that Advantage. Besides, he seemed resolved to avoid, as much as possible, engaging in any War, being apprehensive, that the Malecontents would raise Troubles in the Kingdom, in case he was obliged to send his Forces abroad.

It was probably with the same View, that he concluded with Scotland a Truce, from the 20th of July this Year to the Easter next ensuing. However he could not think that all his Precautions would ever prevent the dreaded War. Besides that he plainly saw France only sought an occasion of Rupture, he considered the Affairs of Wales were in a very ill way. Glendour not only persisted in his Rebellion, but had even seized some Places on the West of the Severn. Moreover the Truce with Scotland being to expire in the Spring, there would be a Necessity of sending an Army into the North. These Considerations determined him to summon a Parliament in order to obtain an Aid to enable him to carry on these Wars.

The Parliament met October the 6th (10). It is said, the King in the Writs of Summons commanded the Sheriffs [and Mayors] to return none but such as were unlearned, and that from hence, this Assembly was called the Illiterate or Lack learning Parliament (11). It is a Question however, whether the King's Command was so express as is affirmed (12). The Breach Richard II. had made in the Nation's Liberties by the like Method, and the Punishment which followed, were yet too fresh for Henry so publicly to imitate his Example, and expose himself to the same Danger, in the present Juncture. It cannot be denied however, that the Court, on this Occasion, had laboured to cause such Representatives to be chosen, as were not too prepossessed in favour of the Clergy, for Reasons we shall see presently. Be this as it will, the King representing to the Parliament thus composed, his great want of an extraordinary Aid, the Commons went in a Body, and addressed him, remonstrating, "That without burdening his People he might supply his Occasions, by seizing the Revenues of the Clergy." They set forth, "That the Clergy possessed a third Part of the Lands of the Kingdom, and not doing "the King any personal Service, it was but just, they "should contribute out of their Revenues towards the pressing Necessities of the State. That it was evident, "the Riches of the Ecclesiasticks made them negligent "in their Duty, and the lessening of their excessive Incomes, would be a double Advantage to the State and "Church."

The King so received this Address as plainly showed it was not disagreeable to him, and in all likelihood, it was he that by his Emiffaries had chalked out this way of raising the Money he wanted. The Archbishop of Canterbury being present, thought it his duty to speak on an Occasion, where the Interest of the whole Clergy was concerned. He represented to the King, "That though the Ecclesiasticks served him not in Person, it could not be inferred, that they were unserviceable, since they sent into the Field their Vassals and Tenants whenever there was occasion: That the stripping the Clergy of their Estates, would put a stop to their Prayers Night and Day for the welfare of the State, and there was no expecting God's Protection of the Kingdom, if the Prayers of the Church were so little valued." He added, with a menacing Tone, "That if the Confidantious were not capable of suppressing the Plots against the Clergy, it would be found difficult to deprive them of their Estates, without exposing the Kingdom to great Danger, and so long as he was Archbishop of Canterbury, he would oppose with Injustice to the utmost of his Power." Then suddenly falling on his Knees to the King, he strongly pressed him in point of Conscience, endeavouring to make him sensible, that of all the Crimes a Prince could commit, none was so heinous as the Invasion of the Clergy's Revenues. Whether Henry was moved with the Archbishop's Speech, or the strong Opposition he foresaw from the Clergy, convinced him of the difficulty of accomplishing his Design, he suddenly resolved to desist. He answered the Archbishop, that though he blamed not his Zeal, he could not help saying, his fears were groundless; for when he mounted the Throne, he made a firm Resolution to favour the Church with all his Power, and hoped by God's grace to leave her in a better State than he found her. The Archbishop encouraged by this Answer, turned to the Commons, and spoke to them in a manner not very proper to gain their Good-Will, telling them, their Demands were built wholly on Irreligion and Avarice (1). The Commons made no reply to this offensive Speech; but when they came back to their House, resolved to persist in their Demand, and brought in a Bill to seize the Clergy's Revenues. But there was no possibility of succeeding in their Project. The Solicitations of the Archbishop and the rest of the Clergy, were so prevalent with the Lords, that they threw out the Bill. So the Commons were forced to find other Means to supply the King's Occasions (2).

Towards the latter end of this Year, Innocent VII. notified to the King, his Promotion to the Papal Throne.

It is not strange, that to the great Number of his Enemies, both at Home and Abroad, Henry was unwilling to add likewise the Clergy; who, as the Archbishop had threatened, would have had it in their Power to create him great Trouble. Though all was seemingly quiet in the Kingdom, he discovered about the beginning of the Year 1405, that some ill Design was contriving against him; but however, could not find out the Authors.

The Earl of March had very well concealed his Disguist, when Henry was placed on the Throne; but his League afterwards with Glendour, and the Earl of Northumberland, was sufficient to open the King's Eyes, though he had suffered himself to be deceived by this Dissimulation. He was too jealous of his Crown, to believe the Earl was unmindful of his just Rights. For this reason, he had always refused to promote the recovery of his Liberty. Upon the same account, he kept his Children in safe Custody at Windsor, as Pledges of their Father's Allegiance. Notwithstanding all his care, means were found to convey away the Prisoners, and keep them concealed for some time. But the King caused such diligent Search to be made, that they were at length found, and brought back to their Confinement at Windsor. He would have severely punished this Attempt, if he could have discovered the Authors, but all his Endeavours were fruitless. There was only a poor Lock-Smith hanged for being concerned in it; but he would not discover by whom he was employed. The Duke of York being suspected, was taken up, and sent to the Castle of Peveril, where he remained a Prisoner above three Months. But at last he was released, for want of sufficient Evidence against him.

This Attempt made the King apprehensive, his Enemies would form some new Plot in favour of the Earl of March; and he imagined, before it broke out, they would secure these young Princes. As Glendour was always ready to maintenance the Male-contents, Henry resolved to free himself from these Fears, by exerting his utmost to destroy that Rebel. To that end, he gave the Command of an Army to Henry his eldest Son; who, in the beginning of the Campaign came to an Engagement with the Welsh, and put their Army to flight. Two Months after, this Victory was followed by another still more important, wherein Glendour's Son was made Prisoner. These two Defeats were not, however, capable of disheartening the Welsh. On the contrary, they made fresh Efforts in Defence of their Liberty. The Situation of their Country, the Assurances given them by France of a powerful Diversion, and probably, Glendour's Knowledge of a Conspiracy forming in England, put them in hopes of better Success for the future.

It was not without Ground, that the Welsh relied upon the Assistance of France. That Crown, or rather the Duke of Orleans, who then governed the Kingdom, made no account of the Truce, whenever he thought he could break it with Advantage. Though it was confirmed in 1403, Mazars owns, the Constable D'Albret, and the Earl of Armagnac, had taken from England, above sixty Places in Guienne. This very Year, the Duke of Orleans openly besieged Bourges and Blaye, though in vain, and the Duke of Burgundy, was preparing to lay Siege to Calais. To facilitate this Undertaking, the Earl of St. Pol, attempted to seize the Castle of Merck; but the Garrison of Calais, positing to its Relief, forced him, to retreat in Disorder, though he was now Master of the Inner-Court.

These continual Breaches of the Truce, taught Henry what he was to expect from France, in case his Affairs were not prosperous in England. For this reason, he was desirous to end the Welsh War, before he showed his Resentment to the French, chusing rather to let them act privately, than give occasion for an open Rupture. With this view, he had sent against the Welsh, the Prince his Son, who was crowned with the fore-mentioned Success. Before he entered upon this Expedition, he assembled the Lords (3), to desire an Aid of Money, being ashamed to ask the Parliament, who had lately granted him a considerable Subsidy. But the Lords stoutly refused to comply with the King's Request, without the Authority of the Parliament. The Clergy, whom the King likewise founded, answered with the same Resolution, not being willing to establish a Precedent of that Nature, lest it should be drawn into Custom. Henry extremely mortified with these Denials, dismissed both the Nobles and Clergy, with signs of Displeasure; which showed, he would not miss an Opportunity of making them feel the Effects of his Indignation. He furnished thereby, certain Lords with an occasion and pretence, to hasten the Execution of a Design, which probably, had some time been formed.

Richard Scroppe Archbishop of York, being dissatisfied, and wanting to revenge Richard, by whom he was promoted to that Dignity, engaged several Lords in a Confederacy to dethrone Henry. The Earl of Northumberland entered into the Plot, though the King had already forgiven him the like Fault, and by his Interest in the North, drew the People of those Parts into the same Confederacy. Thomas Mowbray Earl-Marshall, the Lords Baldolf, Hastings, Raltonbridge, and several other Lords and Gentlemen came into the Plot, and levied a great Number of Troops, which they led to York, where the Rendezvous was. When their Forces, which made a considerable Army, were drawn together, the Leaders published a Manifesto against the King, and caused it to be fixed upon the Doors of the Churches in York, for publick View. The Substance of the Articles contained in the Manifesto, was as follows:

I. That Henry, at his Return into England, had protested and sworn, that he was only come to recover his private Inheritance, without any Design upon the Crown, and yet, had caused himself to be proclaimed King.

II. That as an Arch-Traitor, he had imprisoned his Sovereign, and forced him to resign his Crown, and then barbarously murdered him.

III. That ever since the Death of Richard, he had unjustly detained the Crown from Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, to whom it lawfully belonged.

IV. That he had unjustly put to Death several Persons of Quality, who were guilty of no other Crime, than endeavouring to redress the Abuses of the Government, and, contrary to Law, imprisoned the Bishops by his sole Authority.

V. That he had oppressed the People with needless 1404. Taxes, and by his Threats, hindered them from complaining.

VI. That he had violated the Privileges of the Nation, and his Oath to maintain them, by hindering the free Election of Parliaments.

VII. That in a Parliament held at Winchester, he had given his Assent to a very pernicious Statute against the Church of Rome, and the Authority conferred upon St. Peter and his Successors; and thereby, been the Cause of the Simony, Perjury, and other Disorders among the Clergy and Gentry, who sold the vacant Benefices to Persons unqualified to serve the Cure.

VIII. That notwithstanding the frequent Instances of several Lords of his Council, he had refused to ransom the Earl of March, and evaded his just Petition, by falsely charging that Prince with voluntarily making himself a Prisoner to the Welsh.

IX. That, for all these Reasons, they had taken Arms, with design to free the Nation from the Oppressions of this Tyrant, and place the lawful Heir on the Throne.

Some time before the King had Intelligence of this Rebellion, he ordered a Body of Troops to march into the North, under the Command of Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmoreland, to make head against the Scots, who seemed inclined to renew the War. The Earl was near York, when he heard the News of the Insurrection. The Superiority of the Rebels Troops, not permitting him to advance any farther, for fear of being engaged in an unequal Fight, he thought it more advisable to use Policy. To that end, he dispatched a trusty Messenger to the Archbishop of York, and the Earl-Marshal, to tell them from him, that, considering their great Prudence and Zeal for the publick Good, he did not question but weighty Reasons had induced them to take Arms, and desired them to acquaint him with the same. The Confederates thinking him already shaken, sent him word, they had no other Intention, than to procure the Good of the Kingdom, and intreated him to come and join with them in Defence of the Publick. This Answer made him judge, it would not be impossible to over-reach Persons, who thought him capable of so readily taking their Part. To keep them in this Belief, he told them by the same Messenger, he was not so blind, but he could see the Injuries done to the Nation: However, he was afraid, they had been too hasty in their Proceedings: That, before all things, care should have been taken to secure the Concurrence of all the principal Lords, or at least the Majority: That as for himself, he could not communicate all his Thoughts by a third Person; but, if they would agree to an Interview, would more freely open his Mind. The Archbishop of York no longer doubting, that the Earl was privately of the same Sentiments with the Confederates, pressed the Earl-Marshal to go with him to the Interview, and, notwithstanding his unwillingness, prevailed with him at last. The Place assigned for the Conference being in an open Plain, and the Guards advancing at an equal Distance on both Sides, the three Lords began to confer together. The Earl of Westmoreland protested, he had no less at heart than themselves, the Welfare and Prosperity of the State, and approved of the Articles of the Manifesto, except a few things which he wished they would alter. Then he proposed certain Means to execute their Design, which appeared very judicious, and fully convinced them of his Sincerity. When he found he had gained their Confidence, he ordered some Wine to be brought, and they all three drank together. Mean while, he affected to shake them by the Hand, and give them Marks of a hearty Correspondence. In short, to show an intire Confidence, he commanded his Guards to withdraw, who immediately obeyed. This Frankness obliged the Archbishop and Earl-Marshal, to send away their likewise, being unwilling to appear more distrustful than he. But hardly were their Guards out of Sight, when the others returned upon the Gallop, and, before the Archbishop, and Mowbray, could be relieved, they were both taken and conducted to the Royal Army. The Seizure of their Leaders threw the Confederates into such a Consternation, that it was not possible for the Earl of Northumberland, who staid at York, to keep their Troops any longer together. So, every one shifting for himself, the Earl was also forced to retire to Berwick, of which he was Governor. Some time after, the King being come to Pontefract, the Earl of Westmoreland brought his two Prisoners to him, who were both condemned to lose their Heads. The Archbishop finished Death with great Constancy, and was honoured by the People for a Martyr, till the King, by his Authority, put a stop to their Superstition. From Pontefract the King went to York, and severely punished the Inhabitants (1). Then advancing towards the North, in order to besiege the Castle of Berwick, he took in his way the Lords Hastings and Falconbridge, who met with the same Fate as the Archbishop and Earl-Marshal. Upon the King's Approach, the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Bardolf, despairing of being able to defend themselves, and dreading to fall into the Hands of a jolly incensed Prince, withdrew into Scotland at the Lord Clumming's, by whom they were received. Mean while, Henry became Master of Berwick, and several Castles belonging to the Earl of Northumberland, after which, he returned to London.

Though most Historians ascribe the Rise of this Conspiracy to the King's threatening the Clergy and Nobility upon their refusal of the Aid he demanded, it appears however to have been formed before. For, whilst Henry was still in the North, the Marshal de Montmorency arrived in Wales, with a Fleet of a hundred and forty Sail, and twelve thousand Men. As soon as he was landed he joined Glendour, and they marched together, and took Cardarthen, Worcester, and several other Places of the neighbourhood, where they met with a great Booty (2). Mexarai, who places this Event in the last Year, says, the Earl of Marche, of the House of Baunton, caused the Undertaking to miscarry by his too long delay. This shows, the Court of France thought their Army would land in Wales, just at the time the Archbishop of York's Plot broke out. It may be, the Preparations were begun the last Year, and that might occasion Mexarai's mistake. It is much more probable, he should be mistaken in the Date of this Event, than the English Historians, who refer to this Year, the taking of their Towns, and the great Booty made by their Enemies on that occasion. Besides, we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, an order from the King, dated at Pontefract (3), mentioning the Defeat of the French. It is true, in this order, their Leader is called Hugeville, and not Montmorency. But as there were not two Defeats the same Year, and in the same Country, it may be presumed, that Hugeville made the Defeat under the Marshal's Direction.

Henry had no sooner finished his Affairs in the North, but he marched towards Wales, to defend the Borders against the French. But he was so retarded by the Weather, that they had sufficient time to re-embark, leaving Glendour to shift for himself. However, the King could do nothing against the Welsh, though deprived of the Assistance of their Friends, as well because the Season was too far advanced, as because in his march, he had lost great part of his Baggage.

After so manifest a Breach of the Truce, the French, one would have thought, designed openly to renew the War. But that was not their Intention. As the Conspiracy in England had not succeeded as they wished, they did not think proper to carry the Rapture any farther. Mean while, to join Insult with Outrage, at the very time they had sent a powerful Aid to the Welsh Rebels, and their Forces had taken Towns, and ravaged Counties in England, they assured Henry, their Intent was always to keep the Truce, as if bare Words were more proper than directly contrary Facts, to show the Sincerity of their Intentions. This Behaviour was entirely grounded upon the vain Pretence of the Duke of Orleans's private Quarrel with Henry, for the murder of Richard II. wherein he believed, or pretended to believe, he might use the Forces of France, which were at his disposal, without any Violation of the Truce between the two Crowns. So that all Henry's Complaints were fruitless, since he could only apply for Justice to the Duke of Orleans himself, the principal Author of all these Violations. The Court of France was to well acquainted with the Temper, Character, and Politicks of Henry, that they were not afraid to insult him upon all occasions, during almost the whole Course of his Reign. Henry V. his Son, was not so gentle, but knew how to revenge the affronts his Father had received (4).

Towards the end of this Year (1), Philippa the King's Daughter was sent to the King of Denmark her Husband (2).

All being quiet in England after the retreat of the French, the King called a Parliament, which met March 1, 1406 (3). As his design was to demand Money, he readily gave his Assent to an Act to secure the Freedom of Elections (4). This Act shows, that in the Elections for the late Parliament, the King had done something tending to abridge the Liberty of voting. As soon as this Act was passed, Henry demanded an Aid of Money, but was plainly told, there was no visible occasion for it. He was extremely offended at this denial, but however, durst not openly show his Repentment, for fear of exasperating them. Mean while, he devised an Expedient which procured him what he wanted. This was, to keep the Parliament assembled, till they should, of their own accord, be brought to grant his Demand. So, without any fresh Application, he continued the Session till the end of August. This was very inconvenient to the Members, who had Business at home, and withal, very expensive to the People, who were to bear their Charges. At length, the Commons, impatient of returning to their Homes, voted him a Subsidy (5), not without loud murmurs, at the Constraint laid upon them.

During this Session, the Parliament passed an Act, limiting the Succession of the Crown to the King's Male Issue, exclusive of the Female. As this Act was repealed this same Year, and, probably, razed out of the Parliament-Rolls, one can only guess, upon what Foundation it was built. Now what might, very likely, serve the King for Pretence to demand so extraordinary an Act, was this.

During the whole Course of the Dominion of the Saxon Kings, or at least since the Union of the Seven Kingdoms, we do not find a single Instance of the Descendants of the Daughters, being called to the Succession of the Crown. From the Norman Conquest, to the Time I am speaking of, we meet in the English History, with two Precedents in favour of the Women. The first is, that of King Stephen, Son of a Daughter of William the Conqueror, to which may be added, at the same time, that of Matilda, Daughter of Henry I., who disputed the Crown with Stephen. The second, is, that of Henry II., Son of Matilda, who was acknowledged for King without opposition. These two Precedents, seemed to establish the Right of the Females beyond all dispute. And yet they were not unquestionable. It might be alleged, that Stephen ascended the Throne purely by the Cabals of some of the Nobility, and that Henry II., received his Crown only by Virtue of a Treaty, extorted from his Predecessor by Force of Arms. It might moreover be objected, that, as there was no express Law, two Examples since the beginning of the Monarchy, could not have the force of a Law, chiefly by reason of the Circumstances they were attended with. Thus the Right of the Daughters and their Issue, might at least be liable to Dispute.

When Henry IV. mounted the Throne, he pretended to be the next Heir of Richard II., showing thereby, he made no account of the Earl of March's Right, descended only from a Daughter. And indeed, supposing the Invalidity of the Women's Right, it could not be denied, that he was nearer than the Earl of March, who was set up against him. But this pretended Invalidity was a Point that was not decided. Mean while, the People were generally of Opinion, that the Daughters had a Right to the Succession, since, without its being necessary to allege Examples or Precedents in their favour, it was sufficient there was no Law to exclude them. Upon this Foundation the late Rebellion was raised, as appeared by the Manifesto of the Rebels. It is therefore very likely, that, to remove this pretence from the Male-contents, Henry would have decided the Point by an Act, which, in excluding the Daughters and their Issue, seemed to insinuate, that the reigning King ascended the Throne pursuant to the Custom and Laws of the Realm. But this Act, which perhaps was extorted the same way as the Subsidy, lasted but till the end of the Year. The next Parliament, which met in December (6), made such strong Remonstrances to the King, that he consented to the Repeal. This Parliament, not satisfied with leaving the Right of the Daughters in its former doubtful State, passed a new Act, whereby the Females, and their Posterity were established in their natural Rights. The Succession was settled upon the King's eldest Son, and his Heirs, without exception, then upon his Brothers, and their Issue, without excluding the Women. This Act was signed by the King, the House of Lords, and the Speaker, in the Name of all the Commons, the 22d of December 1406, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

The Precaution taken by the King to secure his Right by the first of these Acts, was extremely prejudicial to his Posterity. He thereby gave occasion for the second, which strengthened the Title of the Earl of March, and consequently of the House of York, which became Heir to that Prince.

Whilst the Parliament, which passed the first of these Acts, continued the Session, till the King was pleased to dismiss them, Henry carried on in Scotland a secret Negotiation, to get into his Hands, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolf, who had taken Refuge there. He could not be easy on account of the former, whose Valour, Abilities, and revengeful Temper, were no less known to him, than his great Interest in the North. As it was to be feared, that being so near those Parts, he would contrive some dangerous Plot, Henry believed he ought to spare no pains to make himself easy, by securing his Person. To that end, he sent an offer to certain Scotch Lords, whose Relations and Friends were Prisoners in England, to release them without Ransom, provided they would deliver up the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolf. This offer was gladly received. But as there was no concealing this design from the Lord Flemming, who had entertained these two Lords at his House, he acquainted them with it, and they retired into Wales, under the Protection of Glendour. Some time after, the Scotch Lords, vexed at their disappointment, killed the Lord Flemming, who was the cause that their Friends still remained in Captivity. Afterwards, his Son, revenging his Death upon some of the Murderers, this Quarrel, joined to several other occasions of Discord, which reigned among the great Men, under the Government of a very weak Prince, raised many Commotions in Scotland.

Robert III., of the House of Stuart, who sat then on the Throne of Scotland, was a Prince more free from Vices, than endowed with good Qualities. His easy Nature, or Incapacity, had given opportunity to Robert's Brother, Duke of Albany, to seize, by degrees, the Government of the Kingdom, whilst he left the King his Brother little more than the external Badges of Royalty. His Ambition not being satisfied with a borrowed Authority, he formed a design to seize the Crown, or at least took Measures to secure it to himself after Robert's decease. To compass his Ends, it was necessary to prevent the Obstacles, he would infallibly meet with in execution of his Designs, from the Princes David and James his Nephews, the King's Sons. An opportunity very quickly offered to make away with the eldest. The young Prince committing some Outrage, for which he was complained of to the King, the Duke of Albany procured an Order from his Brother, to keep David confined, till the heat of his Passions was somewhat abated. He executed this order with such rigour, that closely confining the Prince, he caused him to be starved to Death. How careful however he might be to conceal this barbarous Action, Robert was informed of it, but being too weak, and his Brother too potent, durst not attempt to be revenged. The only Remedy he could apply to his Grief, was to put James his second, now become his eldest Son, out of the reach of the Snares of his treacherous Brother. For that purpose, he resolved to educate him at the Court of France, in order to fend him out of Scotland, where he was in such imminent Danger, and accordingly put him on board a Vessel to go by Sea. The young Prince sailing near the Coast of Norfolk, and finding himself Sea-sick, went on shore for refreshment. But he was no sooner landed, than seized by some Mariners, and brought to the King, who was so cruel as to confine him in the Tower. In vain did the Scotch Prince deliver him a Letter from the King his Father, recommending his Son to him, in case any Accident should oblige him to land in his Dominions. Henry only answered with a poor Jest, telling him, there was no occasion to go to Paris to learn French, he should be taught it at London. The King of Scotland died three Days after receiving this bad News, and the Duke of Albany took upon him the Regency, during the Imprisonment of the young Prince, to whom the Crown was devolved.

This Year the French came upon the Coast of Wales with thirty eight Ships, in order to assist Glendour. But a violent Storm, destroying most of their Fleet, hindered the Execution of their Design.

Very likely, the Court of France had received some Intelligence of a Conspiracy forming in England against the King, and in order to counteract it, would have had an Army ready in Wales. But the Disperison of the Fleet probably blasted their ill-concerted Project. There were some Indications of it in the beginning of the Year 1407, by certain Persons daring to post up in several Places in London, that Richard was living, and preparing to enter the Kingdom with a powerful Army. What Inquiries soever the King made, the Authors could never be discovered. Only a poor Wretch, employed in posting up the Papers, was hanged, without being able or willing to tell who set him to work.

This Year a terrible Plague raged at London, which swept away above thirty thousand Inhabitants. The King not daring to stay at London whilst the Plague made such Ravages, retired to the Castle of Leeds in the County of Kent. After spending there Part of the Summer, he had a mind to remove to another of his Seats in Norfolk (1), and resolving to go by Sea, went on board a Vessel which was followed by four more with his Baggage and Attendants. Whilst he was sailing in Sight of Land, without any Precaution, and believing there was no danger, he saw himself on a sudden attacked by some French Pirates (2), who took four of his Ships; that, where he was himself, very narrowly escaping; it was not doubted that some Treachery lurked under this Accident, but it was impossible to be proved.

The famous Robert Kneller, who had abundantly signalized himself in the Wars with France in the Reign of Edward III, died this Year in a very advanced Age. Though of mean Birth, he had raised himself by his Merit to the highest Posts, and gained a Reputation equal to that of the most illustrious Warriors. In the beginning of this Reign, he was Seneschal of Guienne, but afterwards being weary of a Life of too much Hurry and Action, retired to his Estate in Kent. There he ended his Days, after acquiring a still more solid Glory by many Acts of Piety, Charity, Munificence, some of which subsist to this Day (3).

Henry being sensible how ill-affected his Subjects were to him, stood so in Awe of them, that ever since his Accession to the Crown, he had not dared to send any Troops into Guienne for fear of weakening himself at home. Mean while the French taking Advantage of his Negligence, became Masters from time to time of several Places in that Province, by bribing the Governors. They here in followed the Maxim introduced during the War between Edward III and Philip de Valois, that Buying and Selling was no Breach of a Truce. This Year the Duke of Orleans endeavoured, notwithstanding the Truce, to take Burg and Blaye, but could not succeed. On the other hand, the Duke of Burgundy had again formed the Design of besieging Calais, but for want of due Measures, durst not pursue it. He complained, the Duke of Orleans had privately obstructed it. This Occasion of Complaint, with several others, breeding in him a mortal Hatred to that Prince, he caused him to be assassinated this Year in November. He was so hardy as to avow his being Author of the Murder, and so powerful as to procure a Pardon, tho' the Deceased was the King's own Brother.

Though War was not proclaimed between England and Bravagne, the continual Outrages on both Sides, could not fail at length to produce an open Rupture. The Duke of Bravagne was Son of a Father who had an English Heart. But the young Duke had imbibed at the Court of France other Inclinations and Maxims. However, the Death of the Duke of Orleans, and the Troubles in France, convincing the Bretans, they might be abandoned, in case of a Rupture with England, they thought proper to accept of a Truce offered by Henry. The Truce was only to be for a Year, the Bretans imagining, they should see by that time how Matters would go in France, where Disorder began to reign (4).

Henry was not ignorant of the Bretans Design, but thought it his Interest to dissemble. Ever since his coming to the Crown, he had constantly followed this Rule, that it was better to connive at some things in his Neighbours, than be exposed to the Insults of his Subjects. He could not help reflecting on the irregular Means he had used to ascend the Throne. This Consideration keeping him in continual Dread, he chose rather to hazard his Reputation a little, than furnish his Domestick Enemies, by engaging in Foreign Wars, with an Opportunity to execute their ill Designs. It was not without reason that he lived in perpetual Apprehensions. He had still in the Earl of Northumberland an Enemy, who, humbled as he was, continued to be very formidable. Since that Earl and the Lord Bardolf were retired into Wales, they had never ceased contriving Means with Glendour to dethrone the King. The Welsh who were in open War with Henry, concealed not their Preparations. They strengthened their Army with great Numbers of French and Flemish Adventurers, drawn thither by the Prospect of the Booty promised them in England. On the other hand, the Earl of Northumberland privately secured the Assistance of the People of the North, with whom he had all along great Interest, in spite of his past Disgraces. When Matters were ripe, the Earl and Bardolf returned to Scotland, from whence they entered England by the northern Counties, at the head of some Scotch Troops, levied by the Connivance of the Duke of Albany, Regent of the Kingdom. As soon as they appeared in the North, those that were gained before-hand, speedily joined them, and their Army became, in few Days, very considerable.

As the King did not expect this Insurrection, the Earl had time to re-take the Castles he had lost in the first Rebellion. This Success encouraged him to enter Yorkshire. He hoped, when once he was master of that County, nothing would hinder him from joining the Welsh, who only waited his Orders to put themselves in Motion. Upon his entering Yorkshire, he published a Manifesto, containing the Motives of his taking up Arms. This Manifesto was much the same with those published in the former Rebellions. Mean while, as the King lost a great deal of time in Preparations, Sir Thomas Rokely, Sheriff of York, thought it his Duty to levy some Troops in a readines against the King's coming, and at the same time to obstruct the Progress of the Rebels. The Earl of Northumberland judging it of the last Importance, to disperse the Sheriff's Forces before they increased, marched towards him, in expectation that his Approach would put him to flight. But he found he had to deal with an Enemy that was not so easily frightened. Rokely, though far inferior to the Earl, stood his Ground, and fought with that Bravery and Good-Fortune, that the Rebels were entirely routed (5). The Earl of Northumberland was slain on the spot, and the Lord Bardolf taken Prisoner, but so mortally wounded, that he died in few Days. Their Heads being sent to the King, were ordered to be set on a Pole on London Bridge. Thus died the Earl of Northumberland, who, from being the King's great Friend, became his bitterest Enemy. It was he that contributed most to place Henry on the Throne, by his Readiness to join him at Revesham, an Example followed by all the rest of the Kingdom. But afterwards he made several Attempts to wrest the Crown from him. So, it might be a Question, whether he had done more for, than against, him, it in an Affair of this Nature a single Rebellion did not outweigh numberless Services.

Henry being on his March, when he received the News of the Defeat, and Death of the Earl of Northumberland, proceeded to York. He made some stay in that City, to try the Rebels, of whom some were executed (6); others redeemed their Lives with large Sums of Money.

Before the King departed from London, he had ordered a Fleet to be equipped against the French Rovers, who for some time had infested the Coast of England, and done much Damage to the Merchants. Edmund Holland

count of the Schism.
Platina.
Walling.

The Schism, which commenced in 1378, by the double Election of Urban VI. and Clement VII. still continued, to the great Scandal of Christendom. Urban dying in 1390, the Cardinals of his Party chose in his room Boniface IX. who at first seemed very much inclined to put an end to the Schism. Whereupon the Court of France, laboured heartily to inspire Clement with the same Resolution. But as he proved inflexible, the University of Paris was ordered to meet, where it was decided, that, to put an end to the Schism, one of these three ways was absolutely necessary. The first was, That the two Popes should resign. The second, That they should agree upon Umpires to decide their Difference. The third, That the Determination should be referred to a General Council. This Resolution being communicated to Clement, troubled him so, that he died quickly after in 1394. When the King of France had notice of his Death, he wrote to the Cardinals, desiring them not to proceed to a new Election. But as they suspected the Contents of his Letter, they chose, before they opened it, the Cardinal of Luna, an Arragonian, who took the Name of Benedict XIII. Before the Election, they all took a solemn Oath, that whoever was chosen, should renounce the Papacy, in case it was deemed necessary for the good of Christendom. But Benedict being elected, dispensed with the Oath he had taken, when Cardinal. On the other hand, Boniface IX. dying 1404, his Cardinals chose Innocent VII. and he likewise dying the next Year, they elected Angelo Corario a Venetian, who assumed the Name of Gregory XII.

AA. Pub.
VIII. p. 604.

It would be tedious to relate all the Evasions used by Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. to decline the Resignation sworn by each. They were both willing to be thought well-affected, and yet continually started fresh Obstacles to the Agreement desired by all Christendom. In short, the Christian Princes, tired with the Delays of the two Popes, found means to gain the Cardinals of both Sides, who, in their own Name, summoned a General Council at Pisa, for the 25th of March 1409.

The Council being assembled, the two Popes were cited, and as they did not think fit to appear, were declared perjured Heretics, and deprived of their Dignity. At the same time, the Cardinals were empowered to elect a new Pope. They chose Peter de Candia, who filled himself Alexander V. Before the meeting of the Council, Henry writ to Gregory, to admonish him to comply with the Method of Resignation. But his Letter being fruitless, when he heard of Alexander's Election, he issued a Proclamation, enjoining all his Subjects to acknowledge the new Pope. It was believed, the scandalous Schism, which had now lasted thirty Years, was at length closed, but by Benedict's Obstinacy, it was some Years farther prolonged.

Alexander
V. elected.

How scandalous soever this Schism might be, it did not create in the Clergy of England, so great Uneasiness as Wickliff's Doctrine. Though, during this Reign, the Lollards were used with great Severity, their Number continually increased. There were even at Oxford, Doctors, that publicly defended the novel Opinions, as well in their Disputations, as Writings. The Bishops being extremely alarmed at it, obtained of the King an Order to the University to meet in Convocation, and examine the Books of Wickliff. As the Majority were still attached to the old Doctrine, his Books were condemned, and the University published a Decree, forbidding all her Members, upon pain of Degradation, to preach, or teach, the Doctrine therein contained.

This Year the Truce with Burgundy, was prolonged to the 1st of July 1411.

Truce with Burgundy.

Henry could not be secure of any Tranquillity, so long as France was undisturbed. From thence, proceeded the Rise of all the Motions, as well of his own Subjects, as of the Welsh and Scotts. The War, which was kindled in that Kingdom between the Houses of Orleans and Burgundy, was very beneficial to England. In the first Place, Castile and Scotland were more ready to conclude a Truce with Henry. In the next Place, the Welsh, receiving no further Assistance from thence, found at length, their pretended Prince was very far from being able to perform what he had promised, and began by degrees to desert him. Lastly, Henry reaped moreover this private Advantage, that he became more absolute at home, since he had nothing to fear from his Enemies abroad. Tho' he had caused Richard to be deposed, for usurping an arbitrary Power contrary to the Laws, yet he himself plainly showed by certain Proceedings, he would have been glad to govern with an absolute Authority. This chiefly appeared in the Elections of Members of Parliament. By the Directions of the Court, certain Attitudes were practised, to render the Freedom of voting of no use, since the Sheriffs took the Liberty to return such Representatives as had not a Majority of Votes. This is a thing of so fatal a Consequence, that it may be affirmed, the Liberty of the English will no longer subsist, than whilst the Privilege of freely electing their Representatives in Parliament stands inviolated. If once the Sovereign comes to chuse what Representatives he pleases, the Bounds of the Royal Authority will be in the end so enlarged, that nothing but the mere Shadow of Liberty will remain. Of this, we have seen a remarkable Instance in the Reign of Richard II. But it may farther be added, that all the Kings of England, who have enjoyed a more absolute Power than the rest, acquired it by this way. I mean, by procuring their Creatures to be elected. When a Parliament consists of such Members, it is no longer the King that is charged with Incroachments upon the People's Liberty, but it is the Nation itself, that voluntarily runs into Slavery. And if, afterwards, they resolved to throw off their Chains, they can only succeed by violent means; and this, by the way, is the Spring of most of the Civil Wars, so often kindled in England. The Parliament which met in January (3) 1410, considering the Consequences of the King's Proceedings to over-rule the Elections, believed the redress of that Abuse, was the most pressing Affair. Accordingly, in the beginning of the Session, they presented a Bill to the King, by which, the Sheriffs, who should be guilty of making false Returns, were to be fined a hundred Pounds Sterling, for every Offence. The King would have been glad to evade this Act, but as he could not do it, without laying himself too open, and besides intended to demand a Subsidy, he gave it the Royal Assent.

Upon passing this Act, the King demanded an Aid of the Money of the Commons, who took occasion from thence to renew their former Instances, with regard to the Clergy.

Wickliff's Doctrine had gained so much ground, that the Majority of the House of Commons leaned that way. Thus biased, the Commons presented to the King two Petitions, one against the Clergy, the other in behalf of the Lollards. In the first, they set forth, "That the Clergy made an ill use of their Riches, and "confused their Incomes, in a very different Manner "from the Donor's Intent: That their Revenues were "excessive, and consequently it was necessary to lessen them: That so many Estates might easily be seized, "as would serve to provide for a hundred and fifty "Earls (4), at the Rate of three thousand Marks a Year "each; fifteen hundred Barons, at a hundred Marks "each; six thousand two hundred Knights, at forty "Marks; and a hundred Hospitals, at a hundred Marks: "That by this means the Kingdom's safety would be "better provided for, the Poor better maintained, and "the Clergy more attached to their Duty."

If the Parliament, that first moved the lessening of the Clergy's Revenues, was filed the Unlearned, it may well be supposed, this met with no better Treatment. The Name of Lollard and Heretical was plentifully bestowed, and the Clergy conferred the Petition, as tending to undermine all Religion. This was industriously insinuated to the King, with all the aggravations, which Parties concerned, are capable of displaying on such an Occasion. It 1410. is hard to know, whether the King himself was of this Mind; but however, he declared, he had the Interest of the Church no less at Heart, than the Clergy themselves. After the Death of the Earl of Northumberland, there was never a Lord in the Kingdom, that could give him any Uneasiness; and though the People were dissatisfied, Henry was very sensible, that of themselves, they would never be induced to rebel, unless incited thereto. So, it was his Interest to please the Clergy, who alone were able to stir up the People, if they had for plausible a Pretence as the loss of their Revenues. For this reason, he answered the Commons very sharply, that he neither could, nor would, consent to their Petitions, and expressly forbade them to meddle any more with the Church's Concerns. As for the Lollards, he replied, that far from permitting the Statute against them to be repealed, he wished it more rigorous, for the utter Extirpation of Heresy out of the Land.

The Commons missing their Aim, were contented with moving, that at least Clerks convicted should not be delivered to the Bishops Prisons⁽¹⁾, alleging for reason, that daily Experience shewed, Clerks by that Means always escaped the Punishment they deserved. What the Commons demanded was no less reasonable now, than in the Reign of Henry II., when that Prince, and all the Peers of the Realm, maintained that Point so stoutly against Becket, and Pope Alexander III. But Henry fearing to be exposed to the like Troubles as Henry II. was liable to, refused also to give his Assent to this Bill. On the contrary, he affected to shew an extraordinary Zeal for the Interests of the Church, and to take such Steps as he thought most agreeable to the Clergy. Though it cannot be doubted, that Wickliff's Doctrine was the real Cause of the Motions made by the House of Commons, the King was pleased to let them see, how far he was from giving them any Countenance, by signing a Warrant for burning one Thomas Badly. The Prince of Wales had a mind to be present at the Execution, and, as the poor Wretch gave sensible Signs of the Torture he endured, ordered the Fire to be removed, and promised him a Pension for Life, provided he would recant. But Badly recovering his Spirits, refused to comply with the Offer, and suffered Death with heroic Courage.

The Commons considered this Execution as an Insult, and great Aggravation of the Refusal they had lately endured. Accordingly, when the King demanded a Power to levy every Year a certain Subsidy⁽²⁾, though the Parliament should not fit, the Demand was boldly rejected. The Commons would have even refused a Supply for his necessary Occasions, if, to force them to it, the same Method that had formerly succeeded, had not been employed: That is, he prolonged the Sessions till he obtained his desire⁽³⁾. It plainly appeared, that the Earl of Northumberland was dead; that the Troubles in Wales were almost at an end; and that France was no longer formidable; otherwise he would never have ventured to treat the Commons so haughtily.

Notwithstanding the ill Posture of Affairs in France, the Duke of Burgundy refused his Design of besieging Calais, but with his former Success. All his Preparations at St. Omer for the carrying on the Siege, being burnt to Ashes, either by Accident, or by means of an Incendiary, sent on purpose by the Governor of Calais, this Project, like the foregoing, vanished into Air. The French Historians make no mention of this Attempt. However it seems, by the King's Precaution, in sending the Prince of Wales to Calais at that very time, he had received some private Intelligence thereof. Be this as it will, the Truce with France, for Guienne and Picardy, was again prolonged for some Months.

This Year Robert de Humphreville, Vice-Admiral of England, entered the Gulf of Edinburgh, and daily landing his Men, now in one place, then in another, carried away a great Booty⁽⁴⁾.

The whole Year 1411, was spent in several Negotiations, which ended at length in prolonging the Truce with France for five Years, with Castile till February 1413, and with Bretagne for ten Years.

These Negotiations require no farther Explication, since we have already seen the Occasion of them. But the Negotiation this Year with the Duke of Burgundy, merits a more particular Notice. To that end, it will be necessary to explain as briefly as possible, the present Situation of Affairs in France, on which depends a good Part of the Occurrences of this, and the two following Reigns.

We have seen, how John Duke of Burgundy assassinated the Duke of Orleans, Brother of King Charles VI. France, and avowing the Fact, had Credit enough to procure a Pardon. He, afterwards, went into his Dominions in Flanders, with design to restore to the Bishoprick of Liege, his Dutchess's Brother, expelled by his People. Whilst he was preparing for this War, the Dutchess of Orleans, in Company with her three Sons, of whom Charles the eldest was but fifteen Years old, came, and casting herself at the Feet of the King her Brother-in-law, demanded Justice for the Death of her Husband. Though the Duke of Burgundy had obtained a Pardon, his Adversaries taking advantage of his Absence, had Interest enough to have it revoked, and to cause him to be pronounced Enemy of the State. He was then marching to the Relief of Maestricht, where the Men of Liege held their Bishop besieged. At his Approach, they raised the Siege; but, being afterwards informed, the Duke had only sixteen thousand Men, resolved to attack him. Though their Army was three times as strong as the Duke's, they were routed with the loss of thirty thousand Men. The Duke's Victory so alarmed his Enemies in France, that not thinking themselves safe at Paris, where the Duke had many Adherents, they retired to Tours, and took the King along with them. The victorious Duke preferring his Affairs in France, to the War against the Men of Liege, who were sufficiently humbled, put himself immediately at the Head of four thousand Horse, and came to Paris, where he was received in Triumph. At his Arrival he managed, that the Parisians sent Deputies to the King, praying him to return to their City. Charles, who was then in one of his Intervals, thought it not advisable in the present Juncture, to protect the Enemies of the Duke of Burgundy. He repaired to Paris as desired, and immediately appointed considerable Persons to mediate an Agreement between the Duke of Burgundy, and the Sons of the Duke of Orleans, which was accomplished, though with great Difficulty. The Dutchess of Orleans died with Grief, to see her Husband's Murderer triumphant; and the young Duke of Orleans, then but in his sixteenth Year, found himself obliged to be reconciled to his mortal Enemy. From thenceforward, the Duke of Burgundy seized the Government, the King, who frequently relapsed, being too weak to hold the Reins himself.

Mean while, Henry, who had always an Eye to a Peace with France, formed a Design to marry the Prince of Wales, with one of the Daughters of the Duke of Burgundy, whom he saw so firmly established. But whilst he was carefully thinking how to accomplish his Project, such Alterations happened in France, as made him sensible, this Alliance was not so certain a Means, as he had imagined, to attain his Ends. The Dukes of Berry, Orleans, Anjou, Bretagne, and the Earls of Clermont and Armagnac, meeting at Gen in August 1410, entered into a League against the Duke of Burgundy, and shortly after approached Paris. The Duke, having the King in his Power, opposed them with equal Forces; which convinced them, that the Execution of their Designs depended on a Battle, the Success whereof could not but be doubtful. In all appearance, France itself would be ruined by a Battle, which would have been destructive to the Kingdom, on which side soever Victory inclined, had not Means been found to make an Agreement between these Princes. It was agreed, that the Duke of Burgundy should depart from Paris, the confederate Princes should not enter there, and none of the Heads of the two Parties ever come to Court, unless sent for by Letters under the Great Seal.

The Duke of Burgundy punctually observing this Agreement, retired into the Low-Countries; but the Duke of Orleans, and the rest of his Party were not so scrupulous. After disbanding their Troops, they levied others, and approached Paris in expectation of inching themselves with the Plunder of the Metropolis, which remained firm to the Burgundian Party. The Duke finding himself thus deceived, made an Alliance with the King of England, who believing it his Interest to support him, lent him a considerable Body of Troops⁽⁵⁾. With this Assistance, the Duke marching into France, and passing through the Enemies Quarters, who were blocking up Paris, entered the City, amidst the Acclamations of the

His Affairs go to decay.
Whilst France was in Trouble and Confusion, the Parliament of England meeting about the end of this Year (1), petitioned the King for a general Pardon for his Subjects. Henry readily complied with their Request, excepting only Glendour and his Adherents (2). This shews Glendour was still living, though most Historians say, he died in 1409. It is true, after the Earl of Northumberland's Death, his Affairs were gone to decay. The Welsh, seeing he was unable to perform his Promises, had deserted him by Degrees. He was even apprehensive, they would make some attempt upon his Life, or deliver him up to the King. His fears inducing him to conceal himself, he passed the Residue of his Days in some unknown Place. So, it is no wonder the time of his Death is unknown. However, that he lived till the Year 1417, is certain.

Tom. IX. p. 255.
1412. The Affairs of France were embroiled more and more, by the mutual Hatred of the two Factions, who made no Scruple of sacrificing the Good of the Publick to their Animosity. Hitherto Henry had justly dreaded some Mischief from that Quarter. If the Diffensions of the Princes of the Blood, had not hindered those that were at the Helm, during the King's Illness, from effectually supporting the Male-contents in England, he would very probably, have been greatly distressed. But when he saw the Animosity of the two Factions carried to the highest Degree, his Fears entirely vanished. He even began to think of means, to reap some Benefit from the Troubles in France, as the French had frequently attempted to take Advantage of the Insurrections in England. Herein, the Observation of the Truce was no more regarded on one side than the other.

Henry soon found as favorable an Opportunity, offered by the French themselves, as he could desire. The Dukes of Berry, Orleans, Burbon, Alençon, the Earl of Armagnac and the Lord d'Albret, Heads of one of the Factions, seeing themselves unable to withstand the Duke of Burgundy, who had the King and all the Royal Family in his Power, came to a Resolution, to strengthen themselves with the Assistance of the King of England. But as they were not ignorant, that the Duke of Burgundy had prevented them, by making an Alliance with Henry, they thought it necessary to break that Union, by offering such Terms, as were capable of taking off Henry from his Engagements with their Enemy. To that end they met at Bourges, where they agreed upon the Conditions to be offered him, and then sent Deputies to treat with him.

Act. Pub. VIII. p. 721, 737.
Hitherto, the Duke of Burgundy had evaded Henry's Proposal, of marrying the Prince of Wales with one of his Daughters. Probably, he had entertained other Views. But, upon Information of what was contriving in England, he thought proper to press, in his turn, the conclusion of the Marriage. Henry pretended to hear with Pleasure the Proposition, but it was only to procure better Terms from the Orleans Faction, with whom he designed to make an Alliance. And indeed, the Deputies of the Princes hearing of this Negotiation, insisted no farther upon any Article, but concluded the Treaty, just as Henry desired, on the 18th of May 1412.

Treaty between Henry and the Orleans Faction.

Walling.
By this Treaty the Confederate Princes were bound, I. To give up to the King of England about fifteen hundred Towns, Castles, and Bayliwicks, which they held in Guienne, or in Poitou. II. To conquer for him what remained of these two Provinces in the Hands of the French, and restore to him Guienne, with all its Dependencies, in the same State and Extent, as enjoyed by his Predecessors. III. The King allowed, that the Duke of Berry should hold Poitou for Life, on condition he did him Homage, and delivered up Poitiers, Niort, and Lusignan: As for the rest of the fortified Towns in that Province, he should place such Governors in them, as would bind themselves by Oath to resign them after his Death to the King of England. The Duke of Orleans was to have the Duchy of Angoulême, upon the same Terms, and the Earl of Armagnac certain Castles in Guienne. IV. The King was bound on his Part, to lend the Princes an Aid of a thousand Men at Arms, and three thousand Archers, who were to go to Blais, where they should be received by the Princes, and paid before-hand according to the stipulated pay. 1412.

The Treaty being ratified, Henry gave the Command of this Aid to Thomas his second Son, created, a few Days after, Duke of Clarence. He sent with him in this Expedition the Duke of Tork, and Thomas Beaufort High-Admiral of England. These Troops departed in July, and it appears by several Pieces in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the King was preparing to go in Person to Guienne, to take Possession of what had been promised him.

But whilst these Forces had been busily raising in England, the Face of Affairs was altered in France. The Duke of Burgundy improving his Advantages over his Enemies, closely besieged them in Bourges, and had brought the King with him. Though the Besieged made a vigorous Defence, in hopes of the Supplies that were coming from England, they would have found it perhaps very difficult to hold out, if the Duke of Burgundy had not thought proper to offer them Peace. He was afraid of the Arrival of the English Troops, and the Confederates had reason to apprehend, they would not come timely enough. These different Fears rendering both Sides more tractable, the Peace offered by the Duke of Burgundy was accepted without Hesitation, and at the same time proclaimed.

Mean time, the Duke of Clarence landing in Normandy, advanced towards Blais with all possible diligence, without committing Hostilities by the way. But when he was informed, that the Confederates had accepted a Peace (3), he considered France as an Enemy's Country, and made great Ravages in his march. It was the Duke of Orleans's Business, Head of the Faction, who had drawn him into France, to content him. But as he had no Money to pay what was already due to the English (4), he was forced to give him the Earl of Angoulême his Brother in Hostage. On the other hand, the Duke of Clarence finding himself in the Heart of an Enemy's Country, with a few Troops, and not without apprehension, that the two Parties would join against him, did not think fit to stand upon Terms. He only stipulated for leave to lead his Troops into Guienne, where they served to recover some Places by the help of the Earl of Armagnac, and the Lord d'Albret, who were not pleased with the Peace.

This Affair being ended, Henry enjoyed a profound Tranquillity. He had nothing more to fear from France, which by intestine Divisions, was become unable to hurt him. The Welsh fought only to make their Peace, and the Regent of Scotland, content to see the King his Nephew in the Hands of the English, minded only his private Concerns. In fine, the Male-contents in England, being no longer supported by foreign Princes, remained quiet. Henry made use of this Calm to efface the ill Impressions, his Severity and Proceedings with respect to the Parliament, had made in the Minds of his Subjects. He affected Popularity, and endeavoured by all sorts of means to shew, he thought of nothing less than stretching the Prerogative Royal. His Endeavours were crowned with such Success, that, notwithstanding his Severity to his Enemies, and Refusals to the House of Commons, he was deemed a generous, mild, and moderate Prince. What was before considered, as an effect of his cruel and revengeful Temper, was now readily ascribed to pure Necessity, and the Circumstances of his Affairs. It was doubtless, the latter Behaviour of this Prince, which led Historians to give him such Commendations, as his former Actions no way deserve. This Example shews, how easy it is for a Sovereign to efface the disadvantageous Impressions entertained of him by his Subjects, provided he is so wise and fortunate, as to persuade the World, he sincerely intends to reform his Conduct.

Whilst Henry was endeavouring to recover his Reputation, which had suffered a little since his Accession to the Throne, the Prince of Wales was entirely destroying his own, by his daily Excesses. Though he had naturally a great and generous Heart, he suffered himself to be corrupted by Persons, who, to serve their own Ends, flattered his vicious Passions, and diverted him from the Paths of Virtue. His Court was the receptacle of Libertines, Debauchees, Buffoons, Parasites, and the like. Nothing was talked of, but the riotous and extravagant Pranks of the Prince, or his Companions. Such a Conduct in a Prince, who was one day to sit on the Throne, was very amazing to the confederate, who could not help dreading the Consequences. However, amidst these Apprehensions, a Ray of Hope was seen to shine, in a very unexpected mark of Moderation given by the Prince. One of his Favorites (1) being arraigned for Felony before the Chief Justice (2), he resolved to be present at the Trial, with design to over-awe the Judge. But his Presence not preventing the Criminal's Condemnation, he was so transported with Passion, that he struck the Judge on the Face. The Chief Justice thus affronted, considering the Consequences of such an Action, without regarding the Quality of the Offender, commanded him to be arrested on the spot, and committed to Prison (3). Then was seen, what would never have been expected, the Prince, quiet as a Lamb, submitting without murmuring, to the Judge's Orders, and suffering himself to be led to Prison without Resistance, like a private Person.

The Judge's Courage, and the Prince's Moderation, were equally pleasing to the King. Nevertheless, Henry, who was excessively jealous of his Crown, could not help giving Ear to some People's Insinuations, that his Son had ill Designs against him. This Belief troubling him extremely, he would, perhaps, have proceeded to Extremities, in order to prevent the imagined danger, had not the Prince taken timely care to remove his Suspicions. As soon as he was informed of the King's Father's Thoughts of him, he desired a private Audience, and obtaining it, cast himself at his Feet, and said, "Sir, I am told you have entertained a Suspicion of me, injurious to my Honour, and to the Reverence and Veneration I have for your Person. It is true, I freely confess, I have been guilty of some intemperate Salutes, which deserve your Indignation. But I never had the least thought of any Attempt upon your Person or Government. They that dare charge me with so monstrous a Crime, seek only to disturb your Quiet and mine. To clear my self of this Imputation, I have taken the Liberty to come and throw my self at your Feet, humbly intreating you, to cause all my Actions to be as rigorously examined, as those of your meaneft Subjects. I am ready to undergo this strict Scrutiny, knowing you will be fully convinced of my Innocence." The King seeing with what Frankness the Prince offered to vindicate himself, grew perfectly easy, and restored him to Favour.

In the beginning of the Year 1413, Henry was seized with a Distemper, which, in three Months, laid him in his Grave. Mexarai says, it was the Leprosy. Others affirm, it was a sort of Apoplexy, which had frequent Returns, and threw him into Fits that took away his Senses. However this be, his Distemper, which seized him at several times, lasted near three Months, and then brought him to his end (4). A certain Person having formerly told him, he should die at Jerusalem, he remembered the Prediction, and verily believed, God would make him his Instrument to rescue that City out of the Hands of the Infidels. Thus persuaded, he fancied his Death was not so near, and thought it his Duty to dedicate the Remainder of his Days to that glorious Expedition. Accordingly he took the Cross, and calling a great Council, communicated his Design, and ordered all things to be speedily prepared for his Voyage. But presently after, the Returns of his Distemper being more frequent than usual, he found, instead of undertaking such an Expedition, he ought to employ all his Thoughts in Preparations for Death. His continual Fear of losing his Crown, by reason of the many Attempts to wrest it from him, increased with his Years. Every time he went to Bed, he ordered it to be laid on his Pillow, lest it should be seized before he was dead. One day being fallen into so strong a Fit, that he was thought to reign his last Breath, the Prince of Wales took up the Crown and carried it away. Soon after, the King recovering his Senses, and missing the Crown, asked what was become of it. Being told the Prince had taken it, he sent for him, and asked him, whether he would rob him of his Royalty even before his Death. The Prince replied, He never had any such Thoughts, but believing him dead, he had taken the Crown as his lawful Heir, and the only Person that had a Right to pretend to it. Nevertheless, he thanked God he saw him again recovered, and heartily wished he might long live to wear it himself. At the same time he went for the Crown, and laid it in its Place.

Henry's last Fit seized him in St. Edward's Chapel, as he was worshipping at that Saint's Shrine. He was carried to the Abbot of Westminster's Lodgings, which were nearer than his own. Some time after, recovering his Speech, and finding himself in a strange Place, he asked where he was: He was told, at the Abbot of Westminster's, in a Chamber called Jerusalem. These Words putting him in mind of the forementioned Prediction, he thought only of dying. Before he expired, he sent for the Prince his eldest Son, and gave him many excellent Instructions, among which he could not forbear shewing some doubts concerning his Right to the Crown. He told him also, he was afraid his Brother, the Duke of Clarence, would disturb him in the possession of the Throne. It is not known, whether these Fears were occasioned by his second Son's restless Temper, or by some Engagement with him, when he conceived a Suspicion of his eldest Heir, he would endeavour to keep the Crown by the same Methods he had himself preferred it during his Life. As for the Duke of Clarence, if he behaved as he ought, he should always find him a kind Brother; but if he pretended to do otherwise, he knew how to make him return to his Duty. The King said nothing more, except that he recommended him to the Protection of Heaven. A few Moments after, he resigned his last Breath, on the 20th of March 1413, in the Forty-sixth Year of his Age, having reigned thirteen Years, five Months, and one and twenty days (5).

Most of the Historians have endeavoured to give, in my Opinion, a very unsuitable Idea of this Prince. They speak with Praise of his Mildness, Clemency, Generosity, Valour, and many other Virtues, which appear more in their Writings than in his Actions. If he had some Reputation, whilst a private Person, he does not seem to have increased or maintained it, after his Accession to the Throne. His distinguishing Character was an extreme Jealousy of a Crown, acquired by Ways not universally approved, and preserved by shedding a Torrent of noble Blood. The Death of Richard II will be an indelible Stain to his Memory, tho' his Usurpation of the Throne could be justified. In short, he performed nothing remarkable to afford Matter for Panegyric. His Expeditions into Scotland and Wales have nothing to distinguish him with Honour. If he happily freed himself from all the Conspiracies against him, he was chiefly indebted to the Mayor of Cirencester, the Sheriff of Yorkshire, and the Earl of Westmoreland. The Battle of Shrewsbury, wherein he vanquished young Percy, is the only notable Action in his whole Reign. His continual Fear of Insurrections, caused him to neglect several Opportunities of humbling France, and recovering the Provinces lost by his Predecessors. He even suffered many Insults from the French, Scots, Welsh and Bretons, without shewing much Resentment. In fine, he employed all his Thoughts in preserving his Crown, and avoiding all Occasions by which it might be endangered. This prudent Policy ought to be the chief, if not the sole subject of his Encomium, as it was the sole Motive of his Actions, wherein nothing appears to render him eminent. Though he had caused Richard II to be deposed, for usurping an absolute Power, he did not seem, by his Conduct, to have so great an Aversion for that Crime, as he pretended when it was his Interest to expose it. It is true, towards the end of his Life, he seemed to have formed a Design, to follow Maxims more conformable to the Nation's Liberties. But God was not pleased to allow him time to shew the Effects of this Resolution (6).

When I consider the excessive Commendations bestowed on this Prince, I cannot help suspecting, that the Glory of being the first Burner of Hereticks, and of protecting the Clergy against the Attempts of the House of Commons, were the main Springs of all these Encomiums. It is well known, the Ecclesiastics are as zealous in praising their Benefactors, as in blackening their Opponents.

March 20.

HENRY IV not having the Happiness to be beloved by the English, his Death was not much regarded. The Clergy alone lamented his Loss, because in his Reign they had met with great Favour and Protection. But the rest of the People easily forgot a Prince, who, after his Accession to the Crown, had performed nothing memorable, and shed more of his Subjects Blood than of the Enemies of the State. The very Peace enjoyed by the English during his whole Reign, was not grateful to them. War would have been thought more beneficial, since a fairer Opportunity to recover what was lost in France had never offered. So, in expectation that the Prince his Son would revive the Glory of the English Name, which seemed buried in Oblivion, since the Reign of Edward III, they joyfully beheld him succeeding a Father, from whom nothing very advantageous to the Kingdom could be expected, though his Reign had been longer. In the present Juncture, England wanted an active and warlike King, who knew how to take advantage of the Commotions in France. On the other hand, War was become necessary, to dispel the ill Humours spread over the Kingdom in the late Reign.

Kingdom of the late Kingdom of Henry of Monmouth, so called from the Place of his Birth (4) was exactly of the Temper desired by the English. He was naturally of an elevated and enterprising Genius. For this reason the King his Father had always kept him at a distance from Affairs; this elevated Spirit being too apt to breed Suspicion in so mistrustful a Prince. He had been a Student in Queen's-College in Oxford, under the Tuition of the Bishop of Winchester his Uncle (5), Chancellor of that University. Here, in his tender Years, the Principles of Honour and Virtue were so carefully imprinted in his Mind, that they could never after be effaced.

ed. In his very Childhood, he shew'd a strong Inclination to War, which increasing with his Years, the King his Father thought proper to indulge it. At eighteen Years of Age, he commanded an Army against the Welsh, and defeated them in two Battles. But his Victories did him an unpeakable Prejudice. The King his Father, exceedingly jealous of his Authority, and dreading the Consequences of so noble a beginning, confider'd his Son's Reputation, as likely one Day to prove destructive of his Quiet. Disturbed at this Thought, he removed him from all Warlike, as he had done from all Civil Offices, for fear it should be out of his Power to check his Flight, when once he should take Wing. Reduced to a State of Idleness, the Prince naturally active, sought Employment. Unhappily, by the Infatigation of some about him, and perhaps by the Direction of the King his Father, he ran into disonourable Courses, and abandoned himself to Excesses, unbecoming his Birth, and injurious to his Reputation (6). Notwithstanding all this, his good Disposition failed not to shew itself upon certain Occasions. His Moderation, in suffering himself to be led to Prison, by order of the Judge he had affronted, was a clear Evidence, that the Seeds of Virtue were not entirely destroyed in his mind by Sensuality. Accordingly, the King his Father, who was not ignorant of his Talents, was afraid of him, though a young Prince, drowned as it were in Pleasures, did not seem likely to give him Disturbance. The English themselves were not prejudiced against him. Indeed his wild Sallies might give occasion to fear, they should one Day be unhappy under his Government. But, upon certain occasions, they observed in him Tokens of Generosity, Virtue, and greatness of Soul, which inspired them with hopes of a happy Change in his Person.

no Learning, and not fit for a Bishoprick; he told the King, That what he wanted in Learning himself, he would supply with being the Founder of New-College. Accordingly he began the Building of New-College in Oxford, and laid the first Stone himself, March 1, 1529. It was finished in seven Years. In 1587, on the 26th of March, he likewise laid in Person the first Stone of his College, at Witchford, which he designed as a Nursery for that at Oxford. Upon this Foundation he settled an estate for a Warden, ten Fellows, two Schoolmasters, and twenty Scholars. He died in the fourth Year of his reign, viz. the Year, and day he lived in St. Sepulchre's Church in Witchford, in a stately Monument of his own erecting in his Lifetime.

his Herefy, and how it came to be spread in the Kingdom, and particularly in the Dioceses of London, Hereford, and Rochester. At their return, they presented their Informations to the Archbishop, who laid them before the Convocation. After several Debates, it was resolved, there was no possibility of extirpating the Lollard Herefy, unless care was taken to inflict exemplary Punishments on the principal Favourers thereof: That among these, Sir John Oldcastle Baron of Cobham, was to be deemed the most considerable and dangerous: That therefore, as a Terror to the whole Sect, their principal Protector should be first attacked, and a Process formed against him for his Herefy. But as Oldcastle was the King's Domestick, and in his Favour, it was thought, that Method might give Offence, unless the King was acquainted with it beforehand, and his leave desired to prosecute the Heretick. The Archbishop undertaking this Affair, waited on the King with complaints against Oldcastle. He tried to persuade him, that Fire and Fagot were the only means of extirpating Herefy, and that it was absolutely necessary for the Interest of Religion, to proceed against Oldcastle, according to the utmost Rigour of the Laws. The King having calmly heard him, replied, he could never approve of Force in reclaiming Hereticks, and the rather as Experience had but too frequently shown, that rigorous Methods were as effectual against Truth, as against Error: That he would trust himself with Oldcastle, and try to refore him to the right way, and if he could not succeed, would then give leave for a Process against him. Mean while, to give the Clergy some Satisfaction, he issued a Proclamation, forbidding the Lollards, to hold any Meetings, and charging his Subjects not to be present at their Preachings (7). A few Days after, he was pleased to talk with Oldcastle, and finding him unmoveable, no longer opposed the Clergy's Request.

The Archbishop having obtained the King's leave, sent 74. R. a Summons to Oldcastle, who, refusing to own the Infidelity of the Bishops, slighted the Citation. I am now going to enter upon the Relation of the Modesty of War, renewed by Henry V. against France: A War in 1415 which had lasted ever since the Breach of the Treaty in 1415 of Brétigny, though often interrupted by Truces in the late in 1419 Reigns. In order to give a just Idea of the Prince's Mo- English tives to carry his Arms into France, it will be necessary Henry.
 to represent the then State of that Kingdom: Otherwise, it would be very difficult to understand the Sequel.

Charles VI. afflicted with a Distemper, which rendered him, most part of his time, incapable of governing, had three Sons, Lewis, John, and Charles. The eldest, who bore the Title of Dauphin and Duke of Guienne, was a Prince of an indifferent Character. At sixteen Years of Age, he had taken to a debauched Life; and moreover, was strongly possessed with Principles, that led him to arbitrary Power, and carried him into many Excesses. His Favorites indulged him in this Course of Life, and could not bear, that he should be told of a Reformation, by which, they would have been so great Losers. On the contrary, to prevent the Execution of a certain Project, formed for the better governing the Kingdom, and approved by an Assembly of the chief Men, they inspired their young Master with a Desire to hold the Reins of the Government himself, during his Father's Distemper. They intimated to him, that the Duke of Burgundy had seized it without any Right, and that none could claim 1413. it to the prejudice of the King's eldest Son, since he exceeded the Age fixed by the Ordinance of Charles V. for the King's Majority. Upon this Foundation, they advised him to endeavour to supplant the Duke of Burgundy, by seizing the Bastille, in order to hinder the Parisians from assisting him. This Project was executed shortly after, by means of the Governour of that Fortrefs, whom the Dauphin had gained to his Interest. But he had not long Reason to rejoice at the Success of his Enterprize. Upon the first Rumour of it in Paris, the Citizens, privately incouraged by the Duke of Burgundy, took Arms, to the Number of ten or twelve thousand Men. One part invested the Bastille, the other, under the Conduct of a Surgeon, one John de Troye, came before the Dauphin's Palace, who, not expecting this Insurrection, found no other Remedy but to appear at the Window, to try to appease them; but nothing was able to stop them. After breaking open the Doors of the Palace, they rushed into the Apartments, and carried away above twenty Persons, whom they accused of corrupting the Prince, and threw them into Prison. On the other hand, the Governour of the Bastille, being seized with Fear, delivered up the Fortrefs to the Duke of Burgundy, who, in spite of the Dauphin's Efforts, continued Master of the Government. It was during these Troubles, which happened in March 1413; that Henry IV. died in England, and Henry V. his Son, ascended the Throne.

Whilst the new King was employed in settling his Affairs at home, the Troubles were renewed in France. At the end of April, the Seditious took it in their Heads to wear white Hoods, as a Badge of Distinction. John de Troye, at the head of an armed Mob, brought one to the Dauphin, who durst not refuse it. The King himself happening to be in the Street, as he was going to the Church of Notre-Dame, was obliged by the Seditious to take a White-Hood. But their Insolence did not stop here. Two Days after, their Leader came to the Palace of St. Pol, where the King lodged: There, in presence of the whole Court, he undertook to justify the Imprisonment of the Dauphin's Officers; and added, there were still at Court many more, that equally deserved to be punished. At the same time, without regarding the Intreaties of the Dauphin, or the King himself, he seized a great Number of Lords and Ladies, and carried them to Prison. Lewis of Bavaria himself, the Queen's Brother, was not spared. The King not being able to withstand the Torrent, was forced to consent, that some of the Prisoners should be prosecuted, and to go to Paris in a White-Hood, to inroll certain Edicts, demanded by the Seditious.

The Dauphin finding himself thus checked by the Factions, or rather by the Duke of Burgundy his Father-in-law, their private Director, could not bear to remain in a Situation so contrary to his Temper, without endeavouring to free himself. The Heads of the Orleans Faction, who had been forced to sign a Treaty, which removed them from Paris and the Court, were the only Persons, from whom he could expect any Aid. He contrived therefore a secret Negotiation with them, and, the better to hide his Design, went and conferred with them in Person, under colour of procuring an Agreement between the two Parties, concerning some Breaches of the Peace of Bourges. After making a Combination, he so managed, that a Peace was confirmed; and by the new Treaty, signed at Pontoise, the Orleans Party were allowed to come and pay their Respects to the King at Paris.

Mean while the Duke of Burgundy judging, by the Dauphin's former Attempt, what he was to expect from him, had resolved to secure Assistance, in case of Need. To that end, in June he had sent, as Earl of Flanders, an Embassy to England; whereof Ralph, Provost of St. Donas of Bruges was chief, under pretence of renewing the Treaty of Commerce, between the English and Flemings; but in reality, to propose an Alliance with Henry (1). This appears by the King's Commission, at the same time to the Bishop of St. David's, and the Earl of Warwick, to conclude a personal Alliance between him and the Duke of Burgundy. It is hardly to be doubted, that the Duke had then formed a Design to make a League with the King of England. We shall, hereafter, see much plainer Proofs of this Matter. This Design was not however so speedily executed. Probably, the Duke had no other Intent, than to secure the Assistance of the English, in case he should be pressed as he was in the Reign of Henry IV. Otherwise, he did not think it necessary to hasten the Conclusion of this Affair.

Whatever his Design was, Henry thought, he should not neglect so favorable an Opportunity, to foment Troubles in France, of which he might make an Advantage. For that purpose, he sent shortly after, Ambassadors (2) to Paris. Their publick Instructions were, to press the Court of France to observe, better than hitherto, the twenty-eight Years Truce. Secondly, to confirm the same, or make a new, Truce. Lastly, they had Power to adjust all the Differences between England and France. Very likely, one of the King's Motives, in sending this Embassy, was to be perfectly informed of the Posture of Affairs in that Kingdom. But his chief Aim, was to conclude with the Duke of Burgundy, the Alliance proposed by that Prince. This evidently appears by a fourth Commission, empowering them to sign an Alliance between him and the Duke, and between their respective Dominions. It cannot therefore be doubted, that the Provost of St. Donas, laid the Foundation of this Negotiation in his first Journey to London. This was transacted in July 1413.

The next Month produced a great Change in the Affairs of France, much to Henry's Advantage. The Orleans Party, at the Head of which, were the Duke of Orleans the King's Nephew, the Duke of Berry his Uncle, the Duke of Bourbon, the Duke of Alençon, the Earls of Eu and Vendôme, were approached Paris, pursuant to the Liberty given them. At the same time, the Dauphin, by his Intrigues, had gained great Numbers of the Citizens, who promised to assist him. Whereupon he ordered his Friends to take Arms, and marched about the Streets of Paris, at the Head of thirty thousand Men. The Conformation of the opposite Party was so great, that they quitted the Louvre, the Town-House, and the Bastille, of which they were in possession, without offering to make the least Resistance. The Duke of Burgundy perceiving, it was not in his Power to resist the Torrent, and dreading, moreover, the Arrival of the Orleans Party, who were not far off, chose to retire into Flanders.

No sooner was he gone, but the Orleans Faction became uppermost at Court, without the Dauphin's reaping any Advantage. The King, being then in one of his Intervals, assumed the Government, and entertained so strong an Affection for the Duke of Orleans his Nephew, that he suffered himself to be wholly guided by his Counsels. The young Duke improving this Advantage, caused divers Edicts to be published against the Duke of Burgundy, and the Authors of the former Sedition to be prosecuted, several of whom were put to Death.

Shortly after, the Ambassadors of France and England, meeting at Leitham in Picardy, to negotiate a Peace, agreed (3), that the Truce should be inviolably kept till the 1st of June next ensuing (4). During the Negotiation, the English Ambassadors intimated, that the King their Master expected, France should restore whatever was taken from England, since the Treaty of Bretigny. This was in effect the Cause of the War, which had subsisted, ever since the Violation of that Treaty, and this Demand contained nothing extraordinary. However, the Court of France having flattered themselves, that after the Death of Edward III. the Kings of England would think no more of prosecuting their Pretensions, were extremely alarmed at this Declaration. The Posture of their Affairs made them justly apprehensive of the renewal of the War. So, without loss of time, were dispatched to London, the Archbishop of Bourges, the Count Stable d'Albret, and Col, one of the King's Secretaries, under pretence of endeavouring to make Peace, but in reality to discover Henry's Intentions. These Ambassadors arrived at London in October, and could only obtain a Prolongation of the Truce, for what time they pleased (5).

Whilst they were in England, the Court of France continued their Proceedings against the Duke of Burgundy and his Adherents, many of whom suffered by the Hand of the Executioner. Lewis d'Anjou, King of Sicily, who had with him a Daughter of the Duke of Burgundy, affianced to his eldest Son, reproachfully sent her back to her Father. Shortly after, he gave one of his Daughters in Marriage, to Charles Earl of Ponthieu, the King's third Son, who was not yet full thirteen Years old. Nothing could prove more fatal to France, than this Marriage. The young Prince, espousing the Interest and 1412. Passion of the King his Father-in-law, became sworn Enemy to the Duke of Burgundy. At the same time, he incurred the hatred of that Duke; who, though in Exile, had still a powerful Party in the Kingdom. This mutual Animosity, which continually increased, was the occasion of many Calamities to France.

Mean while, the Dauphin receiving no Benefit from the late Revolution at Court, could not behold, without extreme concern, the Duke of Orleans at the head of Affairs, whilst himself was without Credit, and like a Prisoner in the Louvre, where he was narrowly watched. This Constraint being insupportable to a Prince of his Character, he readily listened to the Duke of Burgundy's Offer of Assistance, to place him in the Post to which he was entitled by his Birth. They entered therefore into a sort of League to expel the Duke of Orleans from Court. The Duke of Burgundy having thus secured the Dauphin, approached Paris at the head of an Army, pretending his design was to free the Dauphin his Son-in-law from Captivity. He imagined, Paris would declare in his favour, but to good order was taken, that nothing stirred. During these Transactions, the King, who for some time had been in one of his usual Fits, recovering his Senses, published against the Duke of Burgundy a thundering Edict, filing him Traitor and Enemy of the State. This Edict, joined to the small hopes that Paris would declare for him, caused the Duke to return into Flanders. Let us leave for a moment the Affairs of France, to which we shall soon have occasion to return, since they are the chief Subject of this Reign, in order to see what passed in England in the beginning of the Year 1414. (1).

1414. Mention was made in the late Reign of the two Attempts of the Commons, to strip the Clergy of good part of their Revenues, though without Success. The Clergy could not doubt that these Attempts were the fruit of the Doctrine of the Lollards. Probably, this was one of the principal Causes of their hatred to these pretended Heretics. For the same reason, in the late Convocation, they had resolved to use the most violent Means, to extirpate a Heresy, to them so detestable. Oldcastle, a Man of a good Family, and extraordinary Merit (2), was destined to be the first Victim, for a Terror to the whole Sect. But by good fortune he had escaped out of the hands of his Enemies. It was with great concern, that the Archbishop heard the King say, he did not approve of rigorous Methods. He even plainly enough showed it to be his real Opinion, since, after Oldcastle's escape, he took no care to have him pursued and apprehended. It was evident, so long as the King was in these moderate Sentiments, the Clergy would hardly be able to have their desire upon the Heretics. So, it was their Interest, that the King should have others, more agreeable to the barbarous Zeal, wherewith Ecclesiastics are generally animated. Nothing was more conducive to that end, than to make him believe, the Lollards had a design upon his Person, and were forming Conspiracies to over-turn the State. Accordingly, to this the Clergy applied themselves without loss of time. The late Proclamation against their assembling, quickly furnished them with a fair opportunity. The Lollards continued their Meetings, notwithstanding the Proclamation, though with all possible Secrecy. As they durst not assemble in Houses, for fear of being discovered, they commonly chose some unfrequented Place in the Country, to worship God after their manner. Some of them resolving to assemble, without one of the Gates of London, in a Place called St. Giles's Fields, which was then covered with Bushes, were, as it often happens on such occasions, betrayed by false Brethren. This discovery afforded their Enemies the opportunity they were eagerly seeking. The King was then at Eltham, about seven Miles from London, where he designed to keep his Christmas. He little expected a Conspiracy against his Person, when suddenly, towards Night, he was told, that Oldcastle was in St. Giles's, with twenty thousand Lollards. It was further said, that their design was to kill the King, the Princes his Brothers, and all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal who were not their Friends. Certainly it was very unlikely, that twenty thousand Men should be able to assemble at the very Gates of London, without being observed. It was still more improbable, that Oldcastle, an experienced Warrior, should chuse St. Giles's Fields, overgrown as they were with Bushes and Shrubs, for the Rendezvous of his Troops. Nevertheless, the News was confirmed by so many Circumstances, that the King could not help crediting the Report. He immediately drew together as many armed Men as was possible, and ordered the Gates of London to be shut, lest the Populace should go and assist the Rebels (3). As he was naturally very bold, he resolved to attack them before they had taken all their Measures. He arrived upon the Place about Mid-night, and finding about fourscore, or a hundred Persons, fell upon them. There were about twenty killed, and sixty taken. Unhappily, they had brought Arms with them for their Defence, in case they were attacked by their Persecutors. It was this, probably, that helped to convince the King of their ill Design. This alone, however, would not have been capable of persuading him, they had really conspired against him, if among those that were taken, there had not been some that, gained by Promises, or awed by Threats, confessed whatever their Enemies desired. They said, their Intent was to kill the King, and the Princes his Brothers, with most of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal; in the Expectation that the Confusion, which after such a Massacre, would ensue in the Kingdom, would prove favorable to their Religion. Some deplored, that, after the murder of the King and Princes, they intended to make Oldcastle Regent of the Kingdom, and that the Conspiracy was formed by the direction of that Lord. In truth, it is hardly conceivable, how a Prince so judicious as Henry, could suffer himself to be imposed upon by so gross a Fiction. Indeed, had he found twenty thousand Men in Arms in St. Giles's, as he was made to believe, it would have been very suspicious. But that fourscore or a hundred Men, among whom there was not a single Person of Rank, should have formed such a Project, is extremely improbable. Besides, he himself knew Sir John Oldcastle to be a Man of Sense, and yet nothing was more wild than the Project fathered upon him; a Project which it was supposed, he was to execute with a handful of Men, without being present himself, and without its being known where he was, or that there was any other Leader in his room. But however, the King thought him guilty, and in that belief, set a thousand Marks upon his Head, with a Promise of perpetual Exemption from Taxes, to any Town that should secure him (4). It is very likely however, that in time the King perceived the falsehood of this Imputation; and what makes me think so, is this: In the first Place, how strict Inquiry soever was made over all the Kingdom, to discover the Accomplices of this pretended Conspiracy, not a single Person could be found, besides those taken at St. Giles's. And yet it is manifest, that, to execute such a Design to any purpose, fourscore or a hundred Persons of no great Distinction, were not sufficient. In the next Place, even of those that were taken at St. Giles's, but very few were immediately executed (5), whilst the Prejudice against them was yet in its full strength. The King pardoned all the rest. Thirdly, we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, not only a general Pardon for all the Lollards, but likewise several private Pardons granted to some that were condemned, though they had constantly denied the Fact. It would not be very strange, that the King should have pardoned Criminals that confessed themselves guilty; but it is unusual with Sovereigns to forgive such a Crime, in obstinate Offenders, who render themselves unworthy of a Pardon, by denying what their Sentence supposes them convicted of. I add further, that Clemency was not Henry's favorite Virtue, on the contrary, he leaned very much to the side of Severity, as will appear by several Instances in his Reign. Is it likely therefore, that he should pardon Persons convicted of intending to murder him, with all the Royal Family, and great Men of the Kingdom, at the very time they obstinately persisted in denying the Fact, for which they were condemned, had he really believed them guilty? Lastly, the Principles of the Lollards were very far from allowing such Barbarities. It is therefore more than probable, that this Accusation was forged, to render the Lollards odious to the King, in order to obtain his License for their Persecution, and that the King himself was convinced of its falsehood, after his first Prejudice was removed. It must however be confessed, that in all these Pardons, he always supposed the Crime to be proved. But in order to a Pardon, it was necessary to take the Crime for granted.

In February 1414, Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, went to give an Account to God, for all the innocent Blood he had caused to be shed (1). He was followed by Henry Chicheley Bishop of St. David's. But the Lollard got nothing by this Change, he being no less their Enemy than his Predecessor.

I left the Archbishop of Bourges and the Constable d'Albret at London, where they quickly discovered the King's Intentions. The Commissioners who treated with them, demanded in Henry's Name, whatever had been taken from England since the Treaty of Bretigny. The French replied, They had no Instructions upon that head. They proposed however, as of themselves, a proper means, in their Opinion, to procure a Peace between the two Kings.

This was a Marriage between the King of England, and Catherine the youngest of Charles IV's Daughters. The Prince had four Sisters, of whom one was a Nun, and the other three married. So it was the alone that could be offered to Henry. This Proposal was not wholly rejected. Though Henry, should insist upon the Restitution he demanded, as being the speediest and most effectual way to a lasting Peace, what the French Ambassadors offered, not being inconsistent with the Restitution, he thought he might accept it, without any Prejudice to himself. But as the Ambassadors had not sufficient Powers to treat upon this Affair, it was only agreed, that the Truce should be prolonged to the 2d of February 1415.

Precisely after the Departure of the French Ambassadors, Henry sent five into France (2), to continue the Negotiation begun at London, concerning the Restitution and Marriage (3). The Ambassadors were empowered to promise, in the King's Name, that he would not engage in any other Marriage-Treaty till the 15th of May. Nay, they might prolong that Term, if it was thought proper.

The Court of France not thinking the Powers of these Ambassadors sufficient, Charles wrote to Henry, that if he would send Ambassadors with fuller Powers, he would readily hear them. Upon this Letter, Henry dispatched five more, all eminent for their Birth and High-Posts, namely, the Bishop of Norwich, the Earls of Derby, Warwick, Salisbury, and the Lord Grey (4).

These Ambassadors entered immediately into Conference with King Charles's Commissioners, the chief of whom was the Duke of Berry his Uncle. They demanded at first the whole Kingdom of France for their Master, by virtue of his Right, as Heir of Edward III. But after a short Pause, they added, that being very sensible their Demand might cause some Dispute, they would make a modest, with a Protestation however that it should not be prejudicial to the Rights of their Sovereign. Then they limited their Demands to the following Articles:

- I. Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, in full Sovereignty.
- II. The Right of Sovereignty over the Earldom of Flanders, and Duchy of Brabant.
- III. Whatever France held in Guienne.
- IV. All as general that was given up to Edward III, by the Treaty of Bretigny.
- V. The whole Country possessed by France between the Sonne and Gravelines.
- VI. Lastly, That all those Countries should be resigned to the King of England in full Sovereignty, to hold them as Neighbour, and not as Vassal of the Crown of France.

Before an Answer was returned to these Demands, the Duke of Berry earnestly pressed the Ambassadors to begin with the Negotiation of the Marriage, affirming it to be the proper means to settle a solid and lasting Peace between the two Kingdoms. He even offered a very considerable Dowry for the Princess Catherine, but the English would consider the Marriage only as a Consequence, and not as the Foundation of the Peace. For this reason, they insisted upon settling first the Terms of the Peace, before any mention of the Marriage. In fine, after many Disputes on both Sides, the English Ambassadors confined themselves to the three following Articles, to which they required a positive Answer, before any other Affairs should be taken in hand.

- I. They demanded whatever was given up to Eng- land by the great Peace, that is, by the Treaty of Bretigny.

II. One half of Provence, with the Earldoms of Beaufort and Niger.

III. The six hundred thousand Crowns, which remained unpaid of King John's Ransom.

As for the Marriage, they said plainly, the King their Master would never espouse the Princess Catherine, unless he was secure of a firm and lasting Peace with King Charles. That besides, as the Offers hitherto made, were very inconsiderable, they had no Power to treat upon that Affair. That therefore it would not only be fruitless to talk of the Marriage, but moreover they durst not meddle with that Article, before the rest were settled. They added however, that in hopes more reasonable Offers would be made, they were willing to speak their Thoughts; that no less could be offered with the Princess, than two Millions of Gold-Crowns.

Some days after, the Duke of Berry delivered them a Writing, containing the Offers of France, in order to a Peace, with the Answers to their Demands; namely,

I. That the King of France offered Agénais, Basleuil, Auch, in part, Perigord, Eclairre, Oléron, Bigorre, Saintonge beyond the Charente, Quercy, (Montauban excepted, with all the Country between the Tarn and the Arriens), Angoulême and Roergue.

II. That the King could not dispose of Provence, since he was not the Possessor, nor had contributed to the putting it in the hands of the present Possessors.

III. That, since for the sake of Peace, he was willing to resign so many fine and rich Provinces, which he lawfully possessed, the King of England ought to desist from any further Demand.

IV. As for the Marriage, though the Dowry of a Daughter of France was fixed to much less, than was already offered, he would for the sake of Peace, give six hundred thousand Crowns.

These Demands and Answers were the subject of several Conferences, which lasted many Days, but of which it would be tedious to relate the Particulars. It will suffice to observe, that the Ambassadors of England reduced at length all their Demands to the Treaty of Bretigny, and a million of Crowns for the Princess's Portion (5). But as the French still thought this Sum exorbitant, the English intimated, it might be lessened, on the condition, that if two Sons should come of this Marriage, the youngest should have Montreuil and Ponthieu in full Sovereignty. But the French returned no Answer to this, and the Conferences ended March 13th, 1414.

Whilst this Affair was negotiating at Paris, the Duke of Burgundy's Enemies continued to stir up King Charles his Enemy to him, so that considering him as an Enemy to his Person and Government, he resolved to make War upon him. To that end, being determined to command his Army in Person, he went and took the Oath at St. Denis (6), after which he became Master of Saiffons and Compigne, seized by the Duke. Burgundy was then unable to withstand him, because the Flemings refused to serve him against France, which gave the Duke of Bourbon Opportunity of taking Bapaume also. It was not intended to stop there, but happily for him, the King was seized with a violent Fit of Lunacy. This Accident gave the Duke time to put a strong Garrison into Arras.

King Charles being unable to act, the Dauphin his Son took possession of the Regency, as having an indisputable Right. Whether that Prince had some reason to be displeased with the Duke of Burgundy, or did not regard him, since he had no further need of him, he carried the King his Father before Arras, which he meant to besiege, but was too late. The Place had been so well provided, that it was not easy to take it. The Difficulties of the Siege, the Solicitations of the Countess of Hainault the Duke of Burgundy's Sister, and perhaps the Dauphin's private Interests, caused a Peace to be granted to the Duke about the end of September, though upon hard Terms. By the Peace the King granted the Duke a Pardon, but excepted five hundred of his Adherents. It was also a-

It was kept in the Abbey of St. Denis, and was used to be the place where the Kings of France used to be crowned. 1414. greed, that all his Friends should remove from Court, and himself not come there, unless sent for, with the Consent of the Council, and by Letters under the Great Seal. Finally, that the King's Banners should be placed on the Walls of Aras.

During the Preparations in France for the War I am going to speak of, the Duke of Burgundy being greatly embarrassed, by reason of the Obstinacy of the Flemings, sent into England the Provost of St. Donas to renew the Treaty begun with Henry. This Envoy had Power not only to conclude an Alliance between the King and Duke, but also to treat about the King's Marriage with the Princess Catherine. In all appearance, the Duke desired the King's Assistance to put him in possession of the Government of France, and then undertook to accomplish the projected Marriage to his Benefactor's Satisfaction. This discovers what were then that Prince's Designs. So that Mazures justly said, the Arms of the English were drawn into France by the Betrayers of their Country. The Peace of Aras put a stop for some time to this Negotiation.

Mean while, Henry still continued his Resolution to improve the Advantages, promised by the Situation of the Affairs of France. He perceived he should, at most, have to deal but with half the Forces of the Kingdom, and the other half would even make a diversion in his favour. Besides, he saw a near Prospect of concluding very shortly with the Duke of Burgundy an advantageous Alliance. And therefore, without further delay, he had called a Parliament at Leicester for the 30th of April, to have their Approbation of his Design, and obtain the necessary Aids to accomplish so great an Undertaking. It must be observed, that the Writs were issued in March, whilst the Provost of St. Donas was in London.

The Parliament being met, the Clergy, ever incensed against the Lollards, moved by their Emulraries to revive, and even increase, the Statutes against Heretics. But for once their Animosity had like to have injured them. The Project formed by the Commons in the late Reign against the Ecclesiastics, had twice miscarried by the excessive Desire of Wickliff's Followers, to promote that Affair. The Clergy taking advantage of this Animosity, intimated to the late King, that such a Motion could not but proceed from Heretics, with whom the House of Commons abounded, and that it was with the downfall of the Clergy, that the destruction of the Catholic Religion was to begin. For this reason, Henry IV strongly opposed it, and with that Haughtiness as gave great Offence to the Commons. Wherefore, though the Members that were no Friends to Wickliff's Doctrine, joined in the Project, yet they could not hinder the too great Zeal of the Lollards from invincibly obstructing the Execution. But notwithstanding its former ill Success, the Projectors had not entirely given it over. They had only resolved, to take another Course, to avoid the Inconvenience, which had twice rendered it unsuccessful. To that end, when a Motion was made in the House of Commons, for new Statutes against the Lollards, those who before opposed it, readily gave their Consent (1). The Clergy appeared exceedingly well pleased. The Pulpits every where re sounded the Praises of the present Parliament. It was not a lack-learning Parliament, like that of 1404, but it was the ablest, and most zealous for Religion, that was ever assembled, since the beginning of the Monarchy. The Truth is, nothing could be more conformable to the Clergy's Desires, than the Act passed on this Occasion. It was enacted, that all the Magistrates of the Kingdom, from the Lord Chancellor, down to the meanest Officer, should take an Oath to employ their Power to extirpate Heretics, and assist the Bishops, in the Execution of so good a Design (2). This Act was no sooner passed, but a violent Persecution was raised against the Lollards. Several were burnt alive. Some left the Kingdom, and others abjured their Religion, to escape the Torments prepared for them.

But shortly after, the Scene was changed, with respect to the Clergy. They did not dream that the very Persons, who lately appeared so zealous for Religion, should think of destroying it: For that was the Idea they gave, of the Project of depriving the Ecclesiastics of the Riches they enjoyed. And yet, the same Commons, who in fo authentick a Way had just secured themselves from all Suspicion of Heresy, willing to comply with the King's demand of a Subsidy, presented to him an Address, praying him to seize the Clergy's Revenues. This Address was founded upon the same Considerations, as that presented to the late King for the same purpose. It was maintained, that the Revenues of the Church would be much better employed in providing for such a Number of Nobles, Colleges, and Hospitals (3). This was a stunning Blow to the Clergy, and the more, because after the late Act now in actual Execution, there was not the least colour to represent the Commons as Heretical or Favourers of Heresy.

The King himself, who was going to begin a great War, believed, or feigned to believe, there was a necessity to do what the Commons desired. As his Revenue would of course be greatly increased, that Consideration did not a little induce him to hearken to so advantageous a Motion.

The Clergy perceiving their Ruin inevitable, unless some Remedy was found against the gathering Storm, met to consult about means to avert, or at least to weaken it as much as possible. After divers Debates upon so important a Matter, they came to these two Resolutions. The first was, to resign part of their Riches to the King, in order to save the rest. The second, to divert the King's Thoughts from domestic Affairs, by engaging him in a foreign War, which might wholly engross him. The frequent Embassies from Paris to London, and from London to Paris, making them conclude, the King was meditating some Enterprize against France, they resolved to excite him to the utmost of their Power to carry War into that Kingdom. Pursuant to these Projects, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who undertook to be Spokesman, told him, "That the Motion of the House of Commons, which seemed advantageous to the Crown, was not so in reality: That, in case their Project was executed, the Church's Revenues would be put to Uses, unprofitable to the King in particular, and which in time might be extremely prejudicial to the Sovereign: That by augmenting the Number and Riches of the Nobility, as was intended, at the same time would be increased a Power which, ever since the Foundation of the Monarchy, had all along opposed the Sovereigns, and even brought some to destruction: That the founding of Hospitals would serve only to encourage People in Idleness, when they should see so many Houses ready to receive them, without being obliged to work: But that the Clergy, more sincerely well-affected to the King than the Commons, were very willing to give him, upon this occasion, a sensible Proof of their Zeal and Attachment for his Person, by delivering up the Allien Priories, which being in Number one hundred and ten, were possessed of Lands that would considerably increase the Revenue of the Crown: That the Estates of these Houses would be all his own, whereas, if the Project of the Commons took effect, he would reap no advantage." Whether the King suffered himself to be persuaded by these Arguments, or thought it always advisable to take what the Clergy voluntarily offered, he accepted of the Proposal. Whereupon the Lands of these Priories were given him by Act of Parliament, without the Clergy's opposing it (4).

Mean while, the Clergy being apprehensive, that, sooner or later, the King would have what the Commons offered him, seriously thought of executing the other part of their Project. For that purpose, the Archbishop took upon him to endeavour to persuade the King to make War upon France. The King's Character, his late Motions with regard to the Affairs of France, and the universal Desire of the whole Kingdom, put him in hopes, that his Design would be crowned with Success. Having therefore prepared a proper Speech, he took occasion to speak it in Parliament, before the King himself.

He began with insinuating Encomiums of the King's Valour and Virtues, saying, he was worthy to wear not the Crown of England only, but that of the whole World. Then addressing himself to the King, he represented to him, "That it was not for his Glory, to leave the King of France in the peaceable Enjoyment of Normandy, Au-

1414. *jeu, Touraine, Maine, and part of Guimne, all these Provinces having been wrested from the Kings of England by pure Violence, and on frivolous Pretences. That it was not only to these Countries that he had an indisputable Right, but he might also very justly lay Claim to the whole Kingdom of France, as Heir and Successor of Edward III. Then he largely urged the Reasons which have been related in the Reign of Edward. He talked of the Salic Law as a Chimera, which was built upon no good Foundation, and which, being repugnant to the Law of Nature, could not be admitted, though it was as real as imaginary. He asserted, that Pepin the Short, who dispossessed the Family of Meroving, claimed the Crown, as Heir to Blithilda, Daughter of Clothaire I., and that Hugh Capet, founded his Title upon his being descended from a Daughter of Lewis le Debonnaire. He added, that these Claims, which would have been ridiculous, if the Salic Law had been in force ever since Pharamond, were clear Evidences of its being then unknown. That besides, such a Law would be contrary to the Law of God himself, who disposed in a very different manner of the Inheritance of Zelusphabad, in favour of his Daughters. That the famous French Civilians had confessed, that the Salic Law was a contradiction, both to the Law of God and Nature (1). In fine, that the glorious Success with which God had crowned the Arms of Edward III. plainly shewed, that God approved not this pretended Law. That if afterwards he permitted that Monarch, and the Prince of Wales his Son, to end their days before they could repair their Losses in France, nothing can be inferred from thence against the Justice of their Rights. That by his Judgments, he was pleased to punish the Sins of the English Nation, but never intended to deprive the Heirs and Successors of Edward, of their just Rights to the Crown of France. That the Interruption of the Prosecution of these Rights, occasioned by the Slothfulness of Richard II., and the Troubles of the late Reign, could not be considered as an entire desisting. That England enjoying at present a happy Tranquillity, under the Government of a Prince endowed with so many excellent Qualities, the relinquishing of these just Pretensions, would be renouncing all the Rules of Prudence and Politics. That moreover, the Posture of Affairs in France presented an opportunity, which would in vain be sought hereafter. Finally, he exhorted the King to exercise the Talents Heaven had blessed him with, and not remain in an ignoble repose, but prepare, without dreading the difficulties, for so just and glorious a Conquest, which would render him the most powerful Prince in Europe. He closed his Speech with saying, that if the King would be pleased to take in hand so noble an Enterprize, the Clergy would give him a larger Subsidy than was ever granted to any of his Ancestors, and he did not question but the Laity would be of the same Mind."*

Most Historians pretend, this Speech made such a sudden and wonderful Impression, that Henry immediately resolved to prosecute his Title to the Crown of France. But the forementioned Negotiations upon this subject, plainly shew, this Resolution was already taken, and that the Business at present was, only to obtain the Parliament's Approbation. To this the Archbishop's Speech perhaps greatly conducted. At least, it is certain, the Commons, before they broke up, approved the design, and granted the King a Subsidy of three hundred thousand Marks (2) to begin the Execution thereof. Nay, it is likely, the Archbishop, on this occasion, acted in concert with the King, either to found the Inclination of the Commons, or to excite them to a War. Be this as it will, this Resolution perfectly corresponding with the Clergy's Project, it is no wonder, the Archbishop to strongly urged the Necessity of a War. And indeed, this Affair was no sooner resolved in Parliament, but the Bill intended against the Clergy fell of its self, People's Minds being otherwise employed (3).

All the rest of this Year was spent in continual Embassies to London or Paris. The French would fain have had Henry's Marriage with the Princess Catharine, to be an equivalent for the greatest part of the Demands of England. This was the Project they had formed, imagining, Henry might be decoyed by the hopes of the Marriage. Henry, on his part, did not reject the Proposal, provided the Marriage was considered only as a Consequence of the Peace, or at least, such Conditions were annexed to it, as should procure him the Restitution of the Provinces lost since the Treaty of Breigny. He feigned to suffer himself to be amused to a certain degree. He sent Power upon Power to his Ambassadors, to prolong the time of his Engagement. But when the Match was proposed, the same Ambassadors refused to treat, till the Terms of the Peace were agreed upon. This was the subject of all the Negotiations. Mean while, it is certain, both Sides had no other view than to gain time. Henry was too wife, not to perceive that France would never comply with his Demands, before she had received some considerable loss. On the other hand, as there had not been a good while, any great Alteration in England, besides the Accession of a new King to the Crown, the Court of France could not believe, the English were able to support the threatened War. So their sole View was to amuse Henry, till time should cause some Revolution in the Affairs of either Kingdom. Henry proceeded gradually, without being diverted, as there was nothing in his Kingdom capable of giving him any Disturbance. France, on the contrary, was full of Dissensions. Those at the Helm, were more careful to support themselves against the opposite Party, than to prevent the King of England's Designs. Nay, it was almost impossible for them to take just Measures at such a Juncture. The Dauphin, who had the management of Affairs, was a Prince more hot than able. But though his Capacity had been greater, what could he have done, engaged as he was between two Factions, which divided the Kingdom, and whereof neither was really attached to his Interest? Besides, neither the Dauphin, nor the Orleans Faction, could imagine, that, after an Intermission for two whole Reigns, the King of England would seriously think of asserting his Right to the Crown of France. We find in the English History, that after Henry had sent the first time to demand the Crown of France, the Dauphin, in derision of his Youth, sent him for a Present a Tun of Tennis-Balls, intimating no doubt, that he thought him fitter for Play, than for War (4); but he was soon of another Opinion. Such was the Disposition of the Court of France, whilst Henry was wholly employed in Preparations to accomplish his designs.

The Resolution taken by the Parliament of Leicester, opened the Eyes of those who governed France. They were sensible at length, that Henry was in earnest, and perceived, not without Confusion, that he had made use, to over-reach them, of the same means practised by themselves to amuse him. The Negotiations concerning the Marriage, and the frequent Prolongation of his voluntary Engagement, were only a decoy, to hinder France from preparing for her Defence. This plainly enough appeared in the Parliament's Resolution. Then it was that Charles, or the Dauphin's Council, thought it time to think seriously of giving Henry some Satisfaction. To that end, Secretary Cal was dispatched with fresh Officers, but which were very short of his Pretensions. Before the Parliament of Leicester, Henry had, as one may say, demanded the whole Kingdom of France, but slightly, and to serve as Foundation for his other Demands. But when he found himself supported by his Parliament, he talked at a much higher rate, and seemed unwilling to be satisfied with what he had demanded at first. However, to amuse France, he still pretended to desire the Affair might be determined by a Negotiation. To that end, he readily consented, the Marriage should be treated of, and the Term of his Engagement prolonged to the 15th of August, empowering his Ambassadors, to extend it as much farther as they should judge proper. But all this made him not delay or interrupt his Preparations for War.

Mean while, the Negotiation with the Duke of Burgundy still continued, whilst that Prince was most pressed by his Enemies. In the Month of June, Henry sent to him Philip Morgan, a Person of great Abilities, whom he always employed in the most important Negotiations. Morgan's publick Instruction, were, only to renew the Truce with the French. But the Choice of this Ambassador, and the Manner of Cepin - la fin into England, from the Duke (5), with the Circumstances of the time, are plain Evidences, these games and coming, 1414. were not to prolong only a Truce of Commerce, where there was no great difficulty. Besides, the discovery hereafter, will shew, what the Duke of Burgundy was then meditating. The gaining of that Prince to his Interest was very material to Henry. A fair opportunity could not offer, since it was at a time when the Court of France shewed no regard for him. But he demurred, it seems, upon making so extraordinary a Step, and was unwilling to have recourse to Henry, without an absolute Necessity. In all these Negotiations, were spent the Year 1414.

1415. In the beginning of the next Year, Henry consented to a Prolongation of the Truce, to the first of May. Meanwhile, the Court of France, alarmed at the great Preparations in England, sent again the Archbishop of Bourges, with eleven more Ambassadors. Probably the Archbishop made some new Offer to Henry, but which was not considerable enough to content him. All he could obtain was, a farther prolongation of the Truce, to the 8th of June.

Henry II. While these Ambassadors were at London, the King assembled (1) the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, at least as many as were within distance. When they were met, he acquainted them, by the Bishop of Winchester his Uncle, and Lord Chancellor, with his Resolution, of going in Person, and carrying War into France, in order to recover the Inheritance of his Ancestors. This Declaration seemed needless, since the great Men had been sufficiently informed of his design. But probably, his Intent was, to oblige the French Ambassadors to discover at once what they had to propose, he imagining they still kept back part of their Instructions. The present Posture of Affairs in France made him hope, they would offer to put Things upon the foot of the Treaty of Bretigny. If so, he would doubtless have been satisfied with so considerable an Advantage, tho' he had, for some time, laid claim to the whole Kingdom of France. The Archbishop of Bourges, no longer questioning the King's designs, told him, he wanted to go to France for fresh Instructions; upon which Henry consented the Truce should be again prolonged to the 15th of July. The same Prelate being returned to England, a few Days before the Expiration of the Truce, added something more to the former Offers; but it was to no purpose. Nothing was capable of satisfying Henry, but the Treaty of Bretigny. The Archbishop demanded his Answer in writing, and the King ordered it to be given him immediately. Some add, that the Archbishop seeing all Ceremony was at end, upbraided the King, that, not content with a Crown unjustly wrested from Richard II, by his Father, he would invade that of France too; but he should find it more difficult than he imagined.

Henry ordered all his Troops to repair immediately to Southampton, where they were to embark, and went thither himself to give orders, as the Troops and Transports arrived. Whilst he was thus employed, he gave fresh Powers to Philip Morgan, to conclude a Treaty of Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy. This shews, that the Duke, who was still at the Court of France, held private Intelligence with Henry, and had, probably, conducted very much to engage him in this Undertaking. Their Treaty however was not concluded till two Years after.

Henry was preparing to depart about the end of July, or beginning of August (2). Most part of his Troops were now embarked, when he had notice of the Conspiracy against his Person, formed by those, whom he thought to have had least reason to suspect. If we believe the English Historians, the Court of France dreading the Success of the War, had employed a vast Sum of Money to bribe Men to kill the King. They mount this Sum to a Million of Livres, which is no wonder, considering the Quality of the Persons concerned in the Plot; namely, Richard Earl of Cambridge, Brother of the Duke of York, Henry Scroppe Lord Treasurer, who commonly lay in the same Room with the King, and Thomas Grey a Knight of Northumberland, and Privy-Councillor (3). It is not very certain however, that they had a design upon the King's Life; at least the Earl of Cambridge's Conspiracy, is extant in the Collection of the publick Acts, containing something like it. It only appears, that they had conspired to fetter the Earl of March at their Head, and conduct him where they hoped to raise an Army, by means of the Name of Richard II, as if he were still alive. That, if they could not deceive the People by a Means so frequently practised, their Intent was to publish a Manifesto in the Name of the Earl of March, inviting the People to restore that Prince to his Rights, usurped by the House of Lancaster. As they could not make use of the Earl of March's Name, without having him in their Power, or at least in their Party, they could not help informing him of the Plot. The Earl was greatly embarrassed, when the Secret was told him. A Crown, which he believed to be his lawful Right, was with the Pains of running some risk to obtain it. But on the other hand, he was satisfied, the Conspirators acted not from a Motive of Justice or Affection for his Person. Besides, the Uncertainty of the Issue could not but discourage him. Mean while, he was pressed very earnestly to enter into the Conspiracy. In short, not being able to resolve immediately, he desired time to consider of so important an Affair; and it was with great Difficulty, that he obtained the rest of that Day. During this Interval, he made such Reflections, as induced him to acquiesce in the King with the whole. Henry, surprized at the News, immediately ordered the Conspirators to be seized, who, confessing their Guilt, were condemned and executed. The Earl of Cambridge and Sir Thomas Grey were beheaded; but the Lord Scroppe suffered the usual Punishment of Traitors. This was as it were the first Spark of that Flame, which consumed, in process of time, the two Houses of Lancaster and York. As the Earl of Cambridge had married a Sister of the Earl of March, very likely, he had engaged in the Plot, with a View to procure the Crown for Richard his Son, presumptive Heir of that Earl, who had no Children.

This Affair detaining Henry at Southampton longer than he imagined, he could not sail till the 18th, or 19th, of August. His Fleet consisted of fifteen hundred Transport-Ships, on which were embarked six thousand Men at Arms, and twenty thousand Archers (4) making in all, an Army of about fifty thousand Men. He was attended by the Earls of Dorset, Kent, Cornwall, Salisbury, Huntingdon, with many other Nobles. On the 21st of August, he landed his Troops (5) at Havre de Grace in Normandy, and without loss of time, marched to Harfleur, about nine Miles distant. That Place was strong and well-fortified. A little before, four hundred Men at Arms were sent thither, besides a great number of neighbouring Nobles, who voluntarily came there. The Garrison made a vigorous Defence, but however, in a short time were forced to capitulate, and promise to surrender the Place, unless relieved within three Days. The Term being expired, and no Relief come, Henry took possession of the Town (6), and expelling the Inhabitants, planted an English Colony in their room, as Edward III had formerly done at Calais (7).

This Place being of the utmost Importance, Henry would not depart, till it was entirely repaired, and put in a good State of Defence. In the mean while, he sent a written Challenge to the Dauphin, offering to decide all their Differences by a single Combat between their two Persons. These differences, according to the King's Notion, concerned no less than the whole Kingdom of France. If he directed himself to the Dauphin, it was because of his Father's Dilemper, which rendered him incapable of accepting such a Challenge. But as it was not in the Dauphin's Power, to hazard, in a single Combat, the Crown of France, which did not belong to him, Henry offered, in case he was Conqueror, to let King Charles enjoy it during his Life. Moreover, he protested, this Proposal came wholly from himself, without any Suggestion from his Council, or Family; and therefore, he pretended, it could not be prejudicial to his Rights, or those of his Successors. This Challenge was dated at his Town of Harfleur, September 16, 1415. It does not

The Conquest of Harfleur might have rendered Henry satisfied with the Success of his first Campaign, begun a little too late, if, on the other hand, the ill State of his Army had not exceedingly troubled him. The Flux, which was got amongst his Troops, had made, and still did make, such Ravage, that not above the fourth Part of his Army were able to bear Arms. This Distemper had not seized the common Soldiers only, but even the most considerable Persons were not free from it. The Bishop of Norwich, and the Earl of Suffolk (1), were already dead of it. The Duke of Clarence the King's Brother, the Earl of Arundel (2), and several other Officers of Distinction, were so dangerously ill, that they were obliged to return to England, in hopes of a Cure.

At the same time, Henry learned from all Parts, that the French were assembling their Forces with great Diligence, to give him Battle. Till the taking of Harfleur, the King of France seems not to have believed, the King of England seriously intended to wage War, since they had made no Preparations for their Defence. But after the loss of so important a Place, King Charles's Council easily perceived, it was necessary to assemble all the Forces of the Kingdom, to stop the Progress of an Enemy, who began to be very formidable. The great Armament France was preparing, the ill State of the English Army, and the Approach of Winter, obliged Henry to think of retreating. He might, it seems, have re-embarked at Harfleur; but, whether he thought it would look too much like a Flight, or forelaw not all the Obstacles he afterwards encountered, or for some other unknown Reason, he resolved to retire by Land to Calais.

The March he undertook was difficult, at a Season when the Rains began to spoil the Roads. But it became much more so by unexpected Accidents. The French having foreseen, or heard of his Design, speedily broke down the Bridges, and Causeways in his Rout, and destroyed, or removed into the fortified Towns, the Provisions and Forage that he might have found in the Country. On the other hand, the Constable d'Albret, with a Body of Troops drawn together, whilst the rest were preparing, continually harassed the English, and constrained them to march very close, and to be always upon their Guard. All these Difficulties hindered their advancing so speedily as was necessary, to free themselves from their ill Situation.

Amidst all these obstacles to his March, Henry proceeded along the Somme, in expectation of passing that River at the Ford of Blanchetaque, as Edward III had done the Day before the Battle of Crécy. But when he came there, he found that Pass rendered impracticable by sharp Stakes fixed in the River, and defended moreover by a Body of Troops (3), posted on the opposite Bank. He was extremely concerned to find his Project could not be executed. It was necessary however, either to pass the Somme, or resolve to return to Harfleur, through the same Difficulties he had already been exposed to, and even without knowing, when he came there, how to subvert his Army. In this Extremity, he determined to march higher up the River, even to its Source, though it was much out of his way. As he advanced, he every where found the Bridges broken down, and the Fords guarded by Troops, intrenched on the other Side.

122. The Army first march to the March.
T. Liv.

As in so ill a Situation, there was no other Remedy but Patience, Henry took all possible Care to infill it into his Troops, by taking his share of the Wants and Hardships they laboured under. It is easy to perceive, these Hardships were not proper to stop the Course of their Distemper, and that on the contrary, great numbers fell sick in the March. At last, to complete his Misfortune, Henry heard, that the King of France was come to Roan, and had sent to the Constable fourteen thousand Men at Arms, with all the Princes and great Lords of the Kingdom, except the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy. The Dauphin was desirous of commanding the Army, but the King would not give him leave. The Constable, who had also drawn together many other Troops, receiving so strong a Reinforcement, called a Council of War, where it was unanimously resolved to give the English Battle. But as the French Generals thought themselves sure of Victory, considering the Superiority of their Forces, they judged it proper, instead of continuing to guard the Somme, to let the English Army pass, and to post themselves on the Road to Calais. This Resolution being taken, they went and expected their Enemies in the Earlom of St. Pol, in order to draw them over the Somme, into a Place where they should not be able to turn back.

It is certain, that by passing the River, Henry ran into manifest Danger, since there was no Mean between conquering and perishing. It is true, he might have returned to Harfleur, but I cannot tell whether that was less hazardous, considering the Difficulties he must have encountered, and which he had not, without infinite Trouble, surmounted. Wherefore, it is a Question, in my opinion, hard to be decided, whether a Battle was more dangerous than a Retreat. Be this as it will, it is to be presumed, he chose what to him seemed least disadvantageous, in continuing his March along the Somme (4), with a Resolution to face the danger that waited on the other Side. As the Passages were no longer defended, he found one between St. Quintin and Peronne, where he caused his Army to pass (5). But though this Obstacle, which had hitherto seemed the greatest, was removed, the English Army found themselves in no better Condition. That of their Enemies, six times more numerous, expected them upon their Passage; whom there was a necessity of vanquishing, in order to open a way to Calais. The French Historians affirm, that Henry seeing himself in this sad Situation, offered to restore Harfleur, and repair all the Damages he had caused in France since his Landing, if he might be suffered to proceed unmolested; but this offer was rejected. On the contrary, the Constable and Princes that were in the French Army, sent three Heralds to offer him Battle, leaving him to chuse the Time and Place. Henry replied, "As he had long been upon his March to Calais, they might have fought him when they pleased, and if they intended it, there was no occasion to appoint the Time, or Place; for he was resolved to pursue his March, and they should always find him ready to receive them."

The French Army being posted on his Rout, it was not possible to pass without fighting. He resolved therefore to prepare for a Battle. On the 22d of October, the French Generals sent him word by a Herald, that on Friday following (6), they would give him Battle. Henry, who had already taken his Resolution, accepted the Challenge, and presented the Herald with a Robe worth two hundred Crowns (7). During the three Days before the Battle, Henry never ceased to inspire his Troops with Courage, by the promise of Rewards and Honours, and by all other Means most conducive to that end. He represented to them the Glory of their Ancestors, who obtained the famous Victories of Crécy and Poitiers, and demonstrated to them the Necessity of conquering, in order to free themselves from their present, and avoid still greater, Miseries. His Exhortations wrought so wonderful an Effect, that the Officers and Soldiers, far from dreading the great Number of their Enemies, were extremely eager to engage. The Day before the Battle, Henry having sent David Gam, a Welsh Captain, to view the strength of the Enemy, this brave Officer gallantly reported, there are enough to be killed, enough to be taken Prisoners, and enough to run away. This Assurance pleased the King, as being a Sign, that his Troops were firmly resolved to do their Duty. Mean while, the French presuming on their Numbers, and confident of Victory, were making rejoicings in their Camp. Monsrai owns, that they were four times Superior to the English (8). Monfretet says, six times (9). This Diversity may partly proceed from Monsrai's reckoning all the Soldiers, sick and well, of the English Army, and

And, according to Alenrai, of a hundred and fifty thousand; the third part whereof were Nobles, and one thousand of them Nobles and Gentlemen. See G. de la Haye's Henry V. p. 81. In a Letter from Sir W. Barrell, Deputy-Governor of Calais, to the Duke of Borlough, it is said, That the Duke of Lorraine had gathered about fifty thousand Men together, and that all the French Forces, past and present, would amount to above a hundred thousand Men. Royce's Feds. Tom. 1415. from Monstrelet's meaning only such as were able to fight. The English Historians make the Difference between the two Armies much greater, affirming, the French amounted to one hundred and fifty thousand, and the English but to nine thousand. Be this as it will, it is certain the Superiority of the French was very great. But what Inequality soever there was between the two Armies, as to Number, there was another, which was no less considerable, with regard to the different State they were in. The English sick, for the most part, of a Flux, with which they had been troubled, ever since their Departure from Harfleur, were moreover harassed with a tedious march of a Month, in very bad Weather, and through an Enemy's Country. They had all along been in want of Provisions, and would doubtless have been all starved, if the exact Discipline, the King caused to be observed, had not engaged the Country-People to supply them with Victuals, for the sake of selling them at an extravagant Rate. The French, on the contrary, were fresh and healthy, abounding with Provisions, and labouring under no Inconvenience. If we may believe the English Historians, so confident of Success were the French Leaders, that they sent to the King to know what he would give for his Ransom. Henry despising this Bravado, replied, according to the same Authors, that a few Hours would shew whole care it would be to provide Ransom.

On the 25th of October, the Day appointed for the Battle, the two Armies were drawn up as soon as it was Light. The Confable D'Albret committed on this occasion an unpardonable Fault, in chusing for the Field of Battle a narrow Ground, flanked on one Side by a Rivulet, and on the other by a large Wood. He thereby lost all the Advantage, which the Superiority of Number, and especially in Horse, could give him. It is most certain, this General ought to have posted himself in a large and open Place, where he might have had it in his Power to surround the English, who were but a handful of Men, in comparison of his Army. But by drawing up on so narrow a Ground, he was forced to make a Front no larger than that of the Enemies, and thereby deprived himself of a very manifest Advantage. Neither can it be said, that the Choice of the Field of Battle was not entirely in his Breast. As the English were marching for Calais, it was his Business to expect them on a spacious Plain, capable of containing his whole Army, and where they might have all fought at once. His Blindness therefore is astonishing, and can be ascribed only to his Presumption. He seems to have intended to stop up that narrow Passage, that the English might not proceed, without considering such a Precaution can be only advantageous to the Weakest. I have dwelt a little upon this Error, as it was, probably, the principal Cause of the unfortunate Success of the French in this Action. The Confable, blinded by the Number of his Troops, drew them up, as I said, on this narrow Ground, but so close, that it was easy to foresee, Confusion would ensue during the Battle. He divided his Army into three Bodies, the first of which he commanded himself, with the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Eu, Vendôme, Richemont, the famous Marshal Boucicaut Grand Master of the Cross-Bow-Men, the Lord Dampier Admiral of France, the Dauphin of Auvergne, and several other Officers of the greatest Distinction. All these Princes and Lords thought themselves happy in being in the first Line, persuaded as they were, that the other two would have nothing to do. The Duke of Alençon commanded the second Body, with the Duke of Bar, the Earls of Vendôme, Nevers, Salines, Rouff, and Grand-Pré. At the Head of the third Line, were the Earls of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauquenbergh, and the Lord de Lauroi.

Whilst the French were drawing up, Henry detached a Body of four hundred Lances, to go and post themselves out of Sight of the Enemy, behind the Wood, on the Left of the Field of Battle. He lodged, moreover, two hundred Archers in a low Meadow, fenced with Bushes on the Right. In drawing up his Army, he could make but two Lines, by reason of the small Number of his Troops. Edward Duke of York commanded the first, assisted by the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope (1). The King put himself at the Head of the Second (2), with a Gold Crown (3) on his Helmet for a Crest, and near him was the Standard of England (4). In this Posture he expected the French would advance to attack him (5). Mean time, riding along the Front of his Battalions, he exhorted his Troops not to fear a Multitude of raw and undisciplined Soldiers. He represented to them, that Victories depended not on Numbers, but on Bravery, and above all, on the Assistance of God, in whom he admonished them to place their whole Trust. In fine, perceiving the French did not move, he sent for some of his principal Officers, and said to them with a cheerful Countenance, "Since our Enemies have intercepted our way, let us proceed, and break through them in the Name of the Holy Trinity." Upon these words, he gave the Signal of Battle (6). Immediately the Soldiers of the foremost Ranks, removing the Stakes, which had been set in the Front, to resist the Fury of the Cavalry (7), the whole Army, with a mighty Shout, moved forward. After advancing a little, they made a halt, expecting their Enemies, but finding they did not stir, continued their March in good Order. When they came within Bow-Shot, the foremost Ranks fixed the Stakes, interweaving, and bending them a little towards their Enemy. At the same time, a Body of chosen Archers advancing some Paces, began, very near, to let fly upon the Enemy a shower of Arrows a Yard long, which being shot by Men of Dexterity and Strength, did the greater Execution among the French, as they stood extremely close, and had scarce room to move. The French Cavalry advancing at length to repulse the Archers, these last nimbly retreated behind the Stakes with a wonderful Discipline, in which the King had exercised them himself for some Days. Mean while, the two hundred Bow-men, concealed in the Meadow, rising up on a sudden, plied the Horse with their Arrows, who were put in the greater Disorder, as the Horses sunk up to their Knees in the Ground sown with the Rains. The English seeing this Confusion, threw away their Bows, and fell upon their Enemies Sword in Hand. The English, it is said, were, for the most part, forced to fight naked from the Waste downwards, by reason of their Distemper. However, as the first Line of the French consisted of all the best Troops in their Army, this Charge, though very vigorous, was repulsed with some Loss on the Side of the English. But, that was not capable of disheartening Men, determined to conquer or die. After breathing a while, they charged again with such Resolution, that it was not possible for their Enemies to stand the Shock. This second Attack was the more difficult to be repulsed, as at the same time the French felt them selves set upon in the Flank by the English Horse, ambushed behind the Wood. Then it was, that the utmost Disorder ensued among the Troops, so vigorously pressed by their Enemies, who flew without Mercy, whoever came in their way. The first Line of the French at length taking to Flight, (after seeing the Confable killed, with a great Number of other Officers, and most of the Princes and Generals made Prisoners,) the English found themselves stopped by the second Line, which came to repair the Disorder.

Mean while, Henry advancing with his second Line, as the first gained Ground, stood ready to support his Men, who would have been in danger of being routed, if he had been farther off. Whilst the first Body, after so gallant a Fight, were retiring to the Right and Left, to make way for the King, and to rally in his Rear, Henry alighting from his Horse, presented himself to the Enemy with an undaunted Countenance. The Duke of Alençon, Prince of the Blood-Royal of France, advanced at the Head of his Body with great Intrepidity, hoping Henry, for his Part, marching with a Fierceness heightened by the Success of his first Troops, charged the second Line, with a Valour equal to that of the most renowned Heroes in History. He fought on foot at the Head of his Men, rushing among the Thickest of the Enemies, as forgetting that upon his Fate, depended that of his Army.

Mean time the eighteen Cavaliers, who had undertaken to kill him, charged up so close to him, that one of them fo struck him with a Battle-Ax on the Head, that he was stunned for a while, though the Goodness of his Helmet resisted the Violence of the Blow. At the same time, the rest were striving to approach him. Probably, he would hardly have escaped these desperate Men, had not the Valiant David Gam, the Welsh Captain, with two other Officers of the same Nation, saved him, at the Expence of their Lives. The King, who was a little recovered, seeing them extended at his Feet, and still breathing, knighted them all three, being unable in their present Condition, to reward their Loyalty any other way. At the same time the eighteen Frenchmen, who still made prodigious Efforts to execute their Design, were all killed upon the Spot.

The Heat of the Battle increasing, Henry still more animated by his past Dangers, gave signal proofs of his Valour, and drew upon him the bravest of the Enemies. The Duke of Gloucester, his Brother, who fought by his Side, being knocked down, he long covered him with his own Body, to prevent his being killed. By this bold Action he was so exposed, that at length he received so great a blow on the Head, that he fell on his Knees. But his Guard, immediately advancing, repulsed the Enemy, and gave him time to rise. The King's Danger, and the Wonders he performed, inspired his Troops with a sort of Fury. On a sudden, as it were by Consent, the English Soldiers encouraging one another, rushed upon their Enemies, and by this violent and unexpected Attack, put them in such Disorder, that their Leaders could never repair it. Henry improving this Advantage, pressed them vigorously, to hinder them from recovering out of their Surprise; knowing this was the Moment by which the Victory was to be decided. Their Disorder increasing, by reason of their great Numbers, and want of room, they began at length to fight only in retreat, in such a manner, as shewed they would quickly take to Flight.

The Duke of Alençon, enraged to see the Battle lost by the Defeat of the second Line, and despairing that the third would be able to restore the Fight, generously resolved to die honourably, rather than turn his Back, and survive his Country's Disgrace. So, regardless of a Life, he was determined to lose, with a small Number of brave and resolute Persons, he furiously made way with his Sword through the English Troops, and every where fought the King of England, in expectation of revenging, by one single Blow, the Loss of France had that Day sustained. It was not difficult to find Henry, who thought of nothing less than concealing himself. The moment the Duke saw him, he ran at him, and crying out that he was the Duke of Alençon, discharged so violent a Blow on his Head, that it cleaved off one half of the Gold Crown on his Helmet. Henry not being able to parry this Blow, was not slow to revenge. In return, he struck the Duke to the Ground, and with repeated Blows flew two of his brave Attendants. In an Instant, the Duke was surrounded by a Crowd of Enemies, who put an end to his Life, notwithstanding the King's Endeavours to save him. The Death of the Duke of Alençon, entirely discouraging his Troops, they openly took to Flight.

The third Line of the French, being still fresh and in good order, might have renewed the Battle. But their Hearts failing at the Sight of the present and past Slaughter (2), it was not in the Power of the Leaders to make them advance. So, finding themselves reduced to a Necessity of retreating without fighting, they left the flying Troops of the second Line, exposed to the Fury of their Enemies who closely pursued them. Then it was that the English, having nothing to do, but to kill, and take Prisoners, exercised Pity or Cruelty, according as every one was naturally inclined: As it was impossible for the French in their present disorder, to rally, and as their Numbers were an Obstacle to their Flight, they voluntarily offered themselves to Death or Captivity, as their victorious Enemies pleased. Mean while, the Troops, that retired without fighting, still appeared at some Distance, and seemed resolved to stand against Enemies harassed with so long a Battle. But the King perceiving they were still more numerous than his Army, commanded them by a Herald to leave the Field, or he would give them no Quarter. This Menace succeeded according to expectation. Whether these Troops were not fully resolved of their Course, or were apprehensive of falling into the hands of an implacable Enemy, in case they should prove unsuccessful, they retired, and left Henry Master of the Field of Battle.

Finding himself thus secure of the Victory, Henry thought, he had nothing more to do, when suddenly a word was brought him, that the Enemies were in his Rear, and had already plundered his Camp. Surprized at this unexpected Accident, he hastily ran to the Top of a Hillock, between the Army and the Camp, to review these new Enemies. He really saw great disorder among his Baggage, and saw the Troops left to guard the Camp, dispersed about the Field, and endeavouring to save themselves by Flight. Imagining, by this Sight, that the Enemies had rallied to renew the Fight, he proclaimed, that the Prisoners should be slain, except the most eminent. This Order being immediately executed, he speedily rallied his Troops, and marched directly to the Enemies, who took care not to expect him. They were only a Company of Run-aways, headed by Robert de Bournoville (3), who retiring betimes out of the Battle, and knowing the English Camp was but weakly guarded, pillaged it, whilst the two Armies were engaged. The Duke of Burgundy afterwards would have severely punished the Captain of these Plunderers, who was his Subject, for being the occasion of so great a Disaster, but the Earl of Charolais his Son found means to save his Life. It is said, the Earl was presented with a Sword set with Diamonds, found among the King's Baggage. It is pity so glorious a Victory was sullied by this rash Massacre. It may however be excused, by the impossibility of the English being able to guard their Prisoners (4), and by the King's just Fears, that these same Prisoners would turn against him, during the Fight, which he saw himself upon the point of renewing.

Nothing more opposing the King's victorious Arms (5), his first care, was to return God Thanks for so signal and unexpected a Victory, and publicly to acknowledge, it was entirely owing to him. After the discharge of this just Duty, he sent for a French Herald, who was in the Army (6), and required him to declare to whom the Victory was to be ascribed. The Herald answered, the Victory was undoubtedly his. Then the King asked him the Name of a Castle in fight, near the Field of Battle, and being told it was called Azincourt, he said, Let this Battle be hereafter called the Battle of Azincourt. As the Fight began not till ten in the Morning, and lasted till almost five in the Afternoon, Henry not thinking proper to continue his March, for fear of fatiguing his Army too much, returned to Maisoncelles, where he had encamped the foregoing Night.

In this memorable Battle, so fatal to France, the French lost the Constable D'Albray, the Duke of Alençon Prince of the Blood, the Duke of Brabant, and the Earl of Nevers, Brothers of the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Bar, the Earls of Vendôme, Marle, Rouff, Fauquenbergh, and many more Officers of Note, besides ten thousand private Soldiers (7). An English Historian says, that among the slain were one Archbishop (8), three Dukes, six Earls, ninety Barons, fifteen hundred Knights, and seven thousand Esquires or Gentlemen. Among the Prisoners, who would have been very numerous, without the Massacre 1415. after the Battle, the most eminent were, the Dukes of Orléans (1), and Bourbon, the Earl of Bu, Vendôme, Richmont, Estouteville, and Marshall Baucourt (2). On the Side of the English, there were slain only the Duke of York, the young Earl of Suffolk, and, if we believe certain English Historians, not above four Knights, one Squire, and twenty-eight common Soldiers. Some however with more probability affirm, the English lost four hundred Men (3). Mazarin mounts the number to sixteen hundred, and lowers the Loss of the French to six thousand. It is very common, on these occasions, to see the like Diversity in the Historians of two opposite Sides.

On the morning, the King pursued his March towards Calais. In passing over the Field of Battle, he took occasion to commend the Valour of his Troops; but withal exhorted those near him, not to be vainly proud of a Victory, gained purely by the miraculous Assistance of the Lord of Hosts. During his March, he was extremely civil to the French Prisoners, his Prisoners. He told them, "he had not obtained the Victory by the Superiority of his Merit, but because God was pleased to make him his Instrument, to punish the Sins of the French Nation: That the Advantages he might expect from his Victory, were so far from making him averse to a Peace, that he was even more inclined to it than the day before the Battle."

Some days after the Duke of Burgundy sent him a Cartel of Defiance, and told him by a Herald, that he intended to revenge the Death of his Brothers. Probably, the Duke of Brabant, and the Earl of Nevers were killed in the Massacre of the Prisoners after the Battle. Henry willing to keep fair with that Prince, whom he still hoped to gain to his Interest, answered with great Moderation. He told the Herald, in delivering the Ganilet, received from his hand, that the French themselves could witness he was not guilty of the death of the Duke's Brothers; but his own Subjects were answerable for their Blood (4). This he said, because Baurenville, who occasioned the Slaughter of the Prisoners, was a Burgundian.

About the middle of November (5), Henry embarked for England, taking with him the principal Prisoners. He met in his Passage with a violent Storm, which put him in extreme danger, and even sunk some of his Ships. At last, after great Fatigue, he arrived on the 16th of November. He was received in England with the usual Acclamations on such occasions. The People were never tired with praising a Prince, that had rendered the English Name so formidable and glorious (6). His first Care was to appoint a Day of publick Thanksgiving for the happy Success of his Arms. Then he caused the Bodies of the Duke of York, and the Earl of Suffolk, who lost their Lives in the Battle, to be honorably interred (7). The Duke of York leaving no Issue, Richard his Nephew, Son of the Earl of Cambridge beheaded at Southampton, was his Heir.

The Wound France had received, was not so great, on account of the Advantages reaped by the King of England from his Victory, which gained him not a single Foot of Land, as for being the Occasion of the Civil Wars rekindling with more Fury than ever. The Duke of Burgundy resolving to improve the present Juncture, claimed the Administration of Affairs, from which he had been long excluded, and particularly, by the Peace of Arras. He alleged, that when the Kingdom was threatened with utter Ruin, a Prince of the Blood, first Peer, and doubly Peer of the Realm, was indispensably bound to aid the King with his Councils, and could not be debarred the Court, without Injustice and Danger. But as he well knew his Reasons would be ineffectual, unless supported by force, he approached Paris with an Army, and seized some Posts about the City. The Dauphin, not being able to bear the Thoughts of admitting to Court the Duke of Burgundy, though his Father-in-law, sent for the Earl of Armagnac, and gave him the Constable's Sword. This Earl, sworn Enemy of the Duke of Burgundy, did not spare the Duke's Adherents, commonly called the Burgundians. He ordered some to be hanged, and great Numbers to be imprisoned, and thereby so heightened the Animosity of the two Factions, that from thenceforward nothing was capable of uniting them against the common Enemy. The Dauphin seconded the Constable's Revenge, and never thought of restoring the ruinous Affairs of the Kingdom, the Government whereof was in his hands. Shortly after, namely, on the 24th of December, this Prince was poisoned.

By the Death of Lewis, the new Constable remained sole Master of the King's Person, and of the Government of the Kingdom, till the return of John Duke of Toucy, to whom the Title of Dauphin was devolved, and who was then in Hainault with the Earl his Father-in-law. This young Prince resolving to espouse neither Side, sent Orders to both Factions to lay down their Arms. The Duke of Burgundy, who was losing his Time before Lagny, obeyed, out of deference, as he pretended, to the Dauphin's Orders, and retired into his Dominions. But the Constable was not so tractable. As he had the King's Person in his Power, he did not think the Dauphin had any Right to command him, till actually possessed of the Regency, which he was bent to oppose, unless he would declare against the Burgundians. It was this that hindered the Dauphin's return to Court.

All this while, it was next to impossible for France, to take just Measures for her Defence against the Attacks, by threatened from England. The Duke of Burgundy was privately treating with Henry. The Earl of Hainault was likewise courting that Monarch, to put the Dauphin, his Son-in-law, in possession of the Regency. On the other hand, Lewis of Anjou, King of Sicily, then head of the Orléans Faction, was projecting to deprive the Dauphin of his Birth-right, by procuring the Crown for Charles Earl of Ponthieu his Son-in-law. To compass his Ends, he thought he could take no certainer Method, than to secure the Assistance of England. Thus all France, as it were, with one Consent, though with different Views, earnestly sought the Alliance of the English, against whom the whole Nation should have firmly united, if private Interest had not prevailed above the Good of the Publick. In this manner passed the Year 1415, which the Battle of Azincourt has rendered memorable for ever.

The Consternation France was under, and the Discord between the Duke of Burgundy and the Constable, seemed to promise Henry fresh Laurels, if he had continued the War. Nevertheless, that Prince, whose Widow equalled his Valour, very prudently steered a quite different Course. He judged, that by fomenting the Troubles of France, and inspiring the two Factions with Jealousy, he should procure more certain and lasting Advantages, than by means of his Arms. The truth is, by pushing the French too vigorously, he ran the risk of uniting them all against him. In which case, his Advantages, probably, would have been inconsiderable. But by granting them some Respite, he gave them opportunity to destroy one another. Wherefore, contrary to every one's Expectation, he laid aside his Military Affairs for near eighteen Months, and betook himself entirely to Negotiation, which afforded him the Prospect of less doubtful Advantages. He continued not however in a State of Idleness. The Particulars of what passed in 1416, and part of the Year following, will shew, how attentive he was to the Execution of his Projects.

Henry's chief Aim was to gain the Duke of Burgundy, who had now shewn an Inclination to make an Alliance with him. The succeeding in this design, he perceived, would be more advantageous, than another Assinquet-Victory. To this therefore all his Endeavours tended, as to his principal Affair. To attain his Ends, it was necessary, that the Affairs of France should remain in their present Situation. It was requisite, the Constable, and the other Heads of that Faction, should still have it in their Power to persecute the Duke of Burgundy. This alone was capable of throwing that Prince into a desperate Resolution, which he beheld not without dread, and which the sole desire of Revenge could induce him to take. If by the Continuance of the War, France had lost Towns and Battles, the Constable, who held the Reins of the Government, would, doubtless, have forfeited all his Credit. By that means, the Duke of Burgundy would have infallibly obtained the Regency again, and no longer stood in need of the English. This is the true reason of Henry's consenting to all the Proposals for concluding a Truce, or for renewing the Negotiations of Peace. Mean while, his, and the Duke of Burgundy's Envoys, passed from London to Flanders, and from Flanders to London, ever un-

It was not without reason, that this Negotiation was kept secret by both Sides. The Duke, whom nothing but Necessity would have forced to an Alliance with the Kings, was afraid, the discovery of this Project would alienate the Affections of the French, and especially of the Parisians. Henry had reason to fear, on his part, that if the Court of France came to know of this Negotiation, they would find means to break his Measures. However, his desisting entirely from War, since the Battle of Azincourt, might well cause his designs to be suspected. But the Arrival of the Emperor Sigismund freed him from this trouble, as it gave him occasion to pretend, he discontinued the War, at the Instance of that Prince.

In the beginning of the Year, Sigismund came to Paris (2). He gave out himself, that the sole End of his Journey was, to mediate Peace between the two Crowns of France and England (3). This Design was noble and charitable, and worthy a Christian Monarch, supposing it to have been entirely disinterested. But several Circumstances gave occasion to believe, he undertook this Voyage to favour Henry rather than France, and in hopes of some Advantage for himself. At his arrival in France, he proposed a four Years Truce between the two Kings, but the Court rejected this Proposal. The French Historians charge the Constable with refusing this Truce, for his own private Interest, but without shewing wherein the War could be for his Advantage. I suppose, he was then projecting the Siege of Harfleur, which he began the next June. It may be, he perceived, the Emperor was not an impartial Mediator. However this be Sigismund, finding he could not prevail at Paris, came into England (4) in the Month of March (5). The English Historians take notice, that being about to land, he was met by the Duke of Gloucester, and some other Lords, who stepping into the Water with their drawn Swords, stopped the Boat. Surprised at this Reception, he asked the Reason: The Duke told him, if he was come to challenge any Authority in England, they had Orders to forbid his landing; but if he came only as a Mediator of Peace, he should meet with all the respect due to the Imperial Dignity. This was to warn him not to take the Liberty of exercising Authority in England, as he had done in France during his stay (6).

The arrival of Sigismund at London, was preceded by that of William of Bavaria, Earl of Holland and Zealand, who was come upon the same Errand. These two Princes quickly saw, they should find it difficult to procure a Peace. Henry added to his former demands, the Town of Harfleur, with part of the adjacent Territory, for the maintenance of the Garrison. On the other hand, France persisting in her first Offers, would not hear of Peace, unless Henry restored Harfleur. So the two Mediators perceiving a Peace almost impossible, were satisfied with obtaining the two Kings consent to a Truce for three Years, during which Harfleur should remain in Trust in their Hands, for certain Securities, promised by the French Prisoners in England. But just as the Treaty was going to be signed, the Prisoners fell from their word. The Constable, who was resolved to besiege Harfleur, had agreed to this Negotiation only to amuse Henry, and hinder him from discovering his Design.

Shortly after, under some pretence, he carried King Charles to Roan. His Aim was, to be ready against the arrival of some Genoese Ships, which were to join the French Fleet, in order to invest Harfleur by Sea. He managed Matters so privately, that Henry, not having the least Suspicion of his design, neglected to reinforce the Garrison. During the French Court's stay at Roan, the Earl of Dorset, Governor of Harfleur, made an Incurtion over to the Gates of that City, and carried away a great Booty. In his return, he was pursued and overtaken by the Constable, who gained some Advantage over him.

On the morrow, the Constable still pressing the English, who were hastily retreating, forced them to halt, and stand upon their defence. In this second Skirmish, the Earl of Dorset, though inferior in number of Troops (7), had his Revenge, and compelled his Enemy to retire with precipitation to Roan.

This ill Success prevented not the Constable from continuing his Preparations for the Siege of Harfleur. Immediately after the arrival of the Genoese Ships, he ordered his Troops, whom he had purposely dispersed, to re-join, at a certain Place, where he came and headed them in Person (8). Then he marched directly to Harfleur, where he was not expected; so unable were the French thought by the English to make any Attempt. Whilst the Constable besieged the Town by Land, the Viscount of Narbonne blocked it up by Sea, so that nothing could go in or out. Henry was extremely mortified to be thus over-reached by the Constable. He was sensible then, that the Negotiation was intended only to amuse him, and therefore was the more provoked to use his utmost Endeavours to break his Enemies Measures. He had a mind, in his turn, to use Stratagem, and circumvent the Constable. To that end, he feigned a strong Inclination to Peace, and desired an Interview with his Cousin, for so he then called the King of France, whereas before he filled him his Adversary. He was in hopes, that if an Interview was granted, a Truce would ensue, which would give him time to relieve Harfleur; but his Proposal was rejected. After this, he commissioned Morgan directly to demand a Truce. But the Court of France took care, not to give him such an Advantage in the present Juncture. In fine, perceiving the Constable was not to be amused, he commanded a Fleet (9) to be equipped, resolving to go himself and relieve the Place. He depended upon the Valour and Experience of the Earl of Dorset, the Governor, knowing he would do his utmost to give him time to prepare for his Relief. In this he was not mistaken, for though the Siege was begun about the middle of June, it was not much advanced at the end of July. So, Henry having had leisure to prepare his Fleet, was ready to embark. But the Emperor dissuaded him from venturing his Person in an Expedition of this Nature, where, notwithstanding all his Prudence, he might receive some disgrace, by the Accidents of the Sea. The King yielding to the Emperor's Influences, gave the Command to the Duke of Bedford his Brother, who failed about the end of July (10). It soon met with the Enemy's Fleet lying before Harfleur. The Viscount de Narbonne preparing for his Defence, withstood for some time the Efforts of the English, but at length was forced to yield the Victory, after seeing five Genoese Caracks taken, and several of his own Ships sunk. Nothing more preventing the Duke of Bedford from throwing the Succours into the Town, the Constable raised the Siege and retired.

Whilst these Things passed, the Duke of Burgundy continued, under diverse Pretences, his secret Negotiations with Henry. One while, it was to renew the Truce between England and Flanders; another while, for Affairs concerning the Church, depending before the Council of Constance. In May (11), the Truce I just mentioned, which was to expire the 15th of June, was renewed for a Year, and yet the Duke of Burgundy sent four Ambassadors more to England. In the beginning of August, the King appointed Commissioners to treat with them concerning some Ecclesiastical Affairs. This public Commission served for pretence to the private Conferences. But by another of the same date, these Commissioners were empowered to agree with the Ambassadors upon an Interview between the King and the Duke of Burgundy. This Negotiation must have been now very forward, since, two days after, the King dispatched Orders to several Officers, to be ready to attend him beyond Sea, where he was to have an Interview with some of his Enemies. This plainly shews, the Duke's frequent Em-

1416. battles were not wholly designed for treating about Trade, or Church Affairs. That Prince had now long demurred upon concluding his Treaty with Henry. As he was of the Blood-Royal of France, and first Peer of the Realm, he was sensible, an Alliance of that Nature was directly contrary to his Honour and Duty. Besides, such a Step could not but be prejudicial to him in France, among his own Party. For these Reasons, he had hitherto been fatigued with keeping the Negotiation on foot, in order to conclude it, only in case of Necessity. The Earl of Armagnac's Revenge, at length threw the Duke upon this Action, which doubtless, he would have longer delayed, or, it may be, never done, had he not been as it were forced to it by the Persecutions of his Enemies.

I have already said, that the Constable d'Armagnac, had, under divers Pretences, prevented John the Dauphin, then in Hainault, from returning to Court. The young Prince, impatient of being thus controlled by that proud Minister, longed to be at the Head of Affairs, and to observe a Neutrality between the two Factions, which would gain him the Esteem and Regard of both Parties. But this was not possible, since he had no Forces at his disposal, but the Earl of Hainault's his Father-in-law, which were not sufficient to enable him to execute such a Project against the Constable's Will. Mean time, the Duke of Burgundy, perceiving there was no likelihood of his acquiring the Government, so long as the Constable had the King's Person in his Power, thought it advisable, to strengthen himself with the new Dauphin's Affluence. For that purpose, he had conferred, in the beginning of the Year, at Valenciennes, with him and the Earl of Hainault; and it was agreed, that the Dauphin should once more try by fair means to be admitted to Court, in order to take the Place due to his Birth: That in case he succeeded, he should carry the Duke with him: But if he could not prevail, they should take other Measures to dispossess the Constable, and free the King. Pursuant to this Resolution, the Dauphin and the Earl of Hainault, repaired to Compiègne, from whence the Earl proceeded alone to Paris, to mediate the return of his Son-in-law. Upon the first mention of recalling the Duke of Burgundy, the Constable interrupting him, said plainly, the Dauphin should never be admitted to the King his Father's Court, unless he openly declared himself an Enemy of the Burgundian Faction. The Earl of Hainault seeing this Obstinacy, could not forbear uttering some Threats, which discovered to the Constable, and his Party, that the Dauphin intended to rely on the Assistance of the Duke. This was the Reason, that, in order to prevent the Mischief this Union might do them, they resolved to dispatch him out of the way. A few days after, the Dauphin was poisoned at Compiègne, the 16th of April 1416, and not in 1417, as we find it in the Abridgement of Mezerai. The King of Sicily was suspected of this deed, to make way for Prince Charles his Son-in-law. If he was guilty, his Death, which happened presently after, hindered him from repeating any Advantage.

By the Death of John the Dauphin, Charles his Brother, Earl of Pembroke, became Dauphin, and Heir-apparent to the Crown. This young Prince immediately espoused the Party of the Armagnacs, for so the Orleans Faction was now called. By that means, the Duke of Burgundy was more out of hopes than ever, and the Earl of Armagnac maintained himself in the Government, where nothing was done without his Orders. His hatred to the Duke of Burgundy, caused him to lose no opportunity of persecuting the Burgundians, who were very numerous at Paris. His severe and tyrannical Behaviour, joined to an extreme greediness, induced at length the Parisians of the Burgundian Party, to lay a Plot to introduce their Head into the City. The Conspiracy being discovered, the Constable took occasion, so to exercise his Rage upon the whole Party, that the Duke of Burgundy did not think himself any longer obliged to regard the Court. Immediately, to let the World see his Resentment, he concluded with the King of England a Truce for all their respective Dominions, not excepting his Possessions in France. But his Revenge did not stop here. His Ambassadors, as I said before, agreed, that the King and he should meet at Calais, and the Duke acknowledge Henry for the true King of France, and do him Liege-Homage. This Interview was fixed to the beginning of October.

Mean while, the Emperor Sigismund having no farther Business in England, departed about the middle of August. In his way to Canterbury, he signed a Treaty of perpetual Alliance with Henry, and, at the same time, a League against France. He promised to assist the King in the Recovery of the Kingdom of France, and Henry engaged to aid him in confining King Charles, and some other Princes, to do him Homage, for certain Territories not specified in the Treaty. Probably, this concerned the Kingdom of Arles, and the Dauphin, to which the Emperors had some stale Pretensions. By the way, this Treaty discovers one of the Motives of Sigismund's Journey to France and England. Very likely, by procuring a Peace between the two Kings, he hoped to obtain for himself some one of those Countries, to which he laid Claim. Be this as it will, it may be conjectured, that he expected some private Advantage from the Peace. Great Princes are seldom seen to spend whole Years out of their Dominions, with the sole View to mediate a Peace, in which they have no manner of concern. Sigismund was, of all other, the farthest from this Character. I do not know, whether, before his Journey to England, he had contracted a Friendship with Henry; but after his departure, it appears by several Records, that there was between them a strict Correspondence and mutual Confidence, very uncommon among Princes (1).

The Emperor being arrived at Calais, staid there for Henry, who could not come till about the end of September (2). Mean while, the Court of France, alarmed at the report of the Duke of Burgundy's Interview with Henry at Calais, and wanting to know what should pass at the Conference, sent thither the Archbishop of Rheims, with some other Ambassadors. The Pretence was, to treat of a Peace with the King, but, in all appearance, the chief Aim of this Embassy, was to discover what should pass at the Interview. Henry was not sorry, the Ambassadors of France would be witnesses of the Duke of Burgundy's Arrival at Calais, and therefore readily dispatched their Safe-Conducts, and presently after their coming (3), appointed Commissioners to treat with them. But he took such Precautions, that the French could never discover the real Motive of his Journey to Calais, at least, with any Certainty. It did not appear he had any other design, than to confirm the late Truce between the King and the Duke, which was already published at London. It is true, that, afterwards, the Duke's Proceedings made him suspected of being in Friendship with the English, but this was only a bare Suspicion. The French Historians speak of it very uncertainly, and we had properly nothing fixed, till the Publick Records, printed in England, discovered the Secret. There we find what follows upon this Subject.

The 1st of October, the King dispatched a Safe-Conduct for the Duke of Burgundy, and eight hundred Attendants, and sent him the Duke of Gloucester his Brother in Hostage. Next day, he appointed Commissioners, to receive, in his Name, the Oaths of John Duke of Burgundy, and of Philip Earl of Charolais his Son, pursuant to the Articles agreed upon, which were in form as follows. The Articles ran, word for word, thus.

"The King having acquainted the Duke of Burgundy with his just Claim to the Crown of France, and his Adversary's Refusal to give him Satisfaction, told him, That by the help of God and St. George, he was resolved to obtain it by Force of Arms. Upon this Declaration, the Duke perceiving the Justice of the King's Title, and considering the great Victories Heaven had blessed him with, promises to send him his Letters Patents, containing what follows:

"That though heretofore, for want of Information, he had espoused the contrary Party, believing it just; now that he is better informed, he promises firmly to adhere to the King of England, and his Heirs and Successors, as to those who are, and ever will be the true and lawful Kings of France, as much as if they were in actual possession of the Crown.

"Though for the present the King has not desired the Duke's Homage, yet, as the Duke owns it to be due, he promises, that as soon as the King of England shall be possessed of a considerable part of the Realm of France, to pay him Liege Homage, and swear Fealty to him, as every Vassal of the Crown of France ought to do to the King of France his Sovereign.

"Item, The Duke of Burgundy promises to endeavour, by all known and unknown Ways, to place the King of England on the Throne of France.

"Item, Whilst the King shall be employed in pursuing his Rights, the Duke of Burgundy will make War

"Item, In all the Alliances and Letters Patents, made, or to be made, between the King and Duke, wherein the Duke should except, or have excepted the King's Adversary, or the Son of his Adversary, it is not his Intention, to do any thing contrary to what he promises by these Presents, which he is to give the King, but will punctually perform it.

In p. 395. All these Articles were drawn up in form of Letters Patents, written and subscribed by the Duke of Burgundy's own hand, and sealed with his Privy-Seal.

Mezerai, in his Abridgement of the History of France, says, That the Duke of Burgundy, that he went and conferred with the King of England at Calais, and renewed the Truces for his Dominions only, whereby he tied himself in some measure from assisting the King of France. What would that Historian have said, had he known all? It is further to be remarked, that the Earl of Charolais, afterwards Duke of Burgundy, entered into the same Engagements with the Duke his Father. After this, there is no questioning the ill designs of these two Princes, against France their native Country. They chose rather to see it under a foreign Dominion, than governed by their Enemies.

Before Henry left Calais, he concluded a Truce with France, till the 2d of February; and then he returned into England about the middle of October, in order to hold a Parliament, called for the 19th of the same Month. During this Session, the Parliament granted a Subsidy (1) for carrying on the War. But this Aid was so little proportioned to his Wants and Projects, that he was forced to pawn his Crown to the Bishop of Winchester his Uncle, for a hundred thousand Marks, and part of his Jewels to the City of London, for ten thousand Pounds Sterling. This is a clear Evidence, how many difficulties he would have met with, in the Conquest of France with his own Forces, if the intestine Troubles of that Kingdom had not paved the way for him. Mean while, notwithstanding his pressing Necessities, he assigned the Earl of Dorset, who defended Harfleur, a Pension of a thousand Pounds, upon creating him Duke of Exeter (2).

Henry having bound the Duke of Burgundy, by their late private Treaty, thought it time to renew the War. He knew, not only that, one half of France would not oppose him, but moreover the Burgundian Party would make a diversion in his favour, which could not but procure him great Advantages. In this Resolution, he made all the necessary Preparations to accomplish his Enterprize. Mean while, as the Supply granted him by Parliament was not sufficient for his purpose, and as the Money came slowly into the Exchequer, he was quickly in great Want. To remedy this Inconvenience, he made use of the following Means. After he had settled the Pay of each Soldier, Horse and Foot, and of each Officer, according to every one's Rank and Character, he made private Contracts with several Lords and Gentlemen, whereby they were obliged to find him a certain Number of Horsemen or Footmen, for such a yearly Sum to be paid quarterly. The first Quarteridge was advanced, but when the second came to be paid, the King had no Money. To supply the present Occasion, he pawned to them the rest of the Jewels, with Letters under the Great Seal, empowering them to sell them, if the Money was not paid within such a time. The Term allowed, was twelve or eighteen Months, according as the Creditors were more or less tractable. By this Means he gained time for the Payment of his Troops, which was a great Conveniency, as he could reimburse his Creditors according as the Money came into the Treasury, without being obliged to pay all at once. People were so well satisfied of his Sincerity, that they made no scruple to serve him, or lend him Money, upon such Securities, as would have been little worth under a Prince of less Probity.

The Preparations carrying on in England, very justly alarmed the Court of France, who were little able to make the like. The Duke of Burgundy's late Truce, publicly made with Henry, was a demonstration there was no Assistance to be expected, either from the Duke or his Adherents. Nay the Court was apprehensive, the Duke had gone farther, at the Conference held with the Enemy of the Kingdom: At least, he was very much suspected of having ill Designs. So, the Confiable who sat at the Helm was not a little embarrassed. He enjoyed a great Authority; but it was not without Uneasiness. Besides, since the Death of John the Dauphin, he was forced to have a regard for the new Dauphin, least the young Prince should think of governing without his Assistance. To all these Difficulties was added, the War, the English were preparing to carry into France. As the Kingdom was in an ill Situation, and the Enemy like to make a great Progress, he considered, he should be answerable for all the ill Successes. In this State of Perplexity, he thought he should try to put a Stop to the King of England's Arms, by an extraordinary Negotiation, which should give that Prince room to believe, the Court of France would be forced to make Peace, though never so unwilling. He was aware, that if he should himself treat of a Peace, it would be lost Labour, because it was generally believed to be for his Interest, that Affairs should remain embroiled, in order to preserve his Authority. It was therefore unlikely, that the King of England should suffer himself to be amused by any Proposal from him. For this reason, he thought proper to make use of the Prisoners in England, and particularly of the Duke of Bourbon. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, several Safe-Conducts dated about this time, for the Duke of Bourbon's Domesticks going to and coming from France, under divers Pretences. It may therefore be presumed, that the Plot was then formed, and that the Duke of Bourbon did nothing in the Affair, of which I am going to relate the Particulars, but in concert with the Court of France.

This Plot was so artfully framed, that if the King had not been in a continual Mistrust, he would doubtless have been deceived. But his firm Resolution, not to interrupt the Execution of his Designs for any Officers, that should be short of his Demands, caused him to escape the Snare. The Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Eu and Vendôme, and some other Prisoners, feigning to despair of the Affairs of France, intimated to Henry, that they were willing to treat with him, for themselves in particular. This was told him, not positively, but as what they might possibly be brought to. But the King, fearing that, under this Pretence, they designed to retard his Voyage, gave no great Attention to the Overture.

Some time after, these same Princes, who had hitherto endeavoured to make the Proposal come from the King, finding they could not succeed, began first. At an Audience which they demanded, they expressed their Inclination, and prayed him to acquaint them with his Pretensions; adding, they did not question, but they should return him a satisfactory Answer, without any Prejudice to their Honour. The King, who would not be amused, roundly told them, he had no other Proposal to make, except only, that they should acknowledge him for King of France and their lawful Sovereign. The Duke of Orleans exclaimed against this Proposal, and plainly told him, they had no Answer to return to such a Demand. Matters went no farther for this time.

But a few Weeks after, the Duke of Bourbon resumed the Affair. He told the King, that since they had the Honour to talk with him, several of the Prisoners had sent Persons into France, to make inquiry concerning his Title to that Kingdom, and had received better Information than ever before. He added, for his part, he was fully convinced of the Justice of his Rights. Then he said, he was told, that, notwithstanding his just Claim to the whole Kingdom, he had offered to resign it, if certain Provinces were delivered to him; and, in his opinion, that Offer ought not to be refused: That the other Prisoners were of his Mind, and had resolved to do all that lay in their Power to procure him what he desired. That therefore, he begged leave to go into France, and declare to King Charles, in the Name of all the Prisoners, that, as faithful Subjects, they could not but advise him, to close with this Expedient for Peace, and pray him to accept of reasonable an Offer. In short, the Duke added, that if the Court of France consented to the Offer, Henry might this very Year take possession of the Provinces, which should be resigned. But if, on the contrary, it was rejected, the Princes would account themselves acquitted from the Oath they had taken to their King. The Duke engaged, for his own part, to put to be levied on the Laity; and the Clergy gave two Tenths to be raised from their own Baily. Cotton's Abridg. p. 550. Wells p. 395.

He promised to return into England, by the time which should be appointed him, and own Henry for King of France, and pay him Homage as his lawful Sovereign. Moreover, he added, that he would so evidently demonstrate the Justice of Henry's Right to the Crown of France, that all the World should be satisfied, he could not dispense with doing him Homage, without acting contrary to his Honour. In fine, he entreated the King to be silent till his Return, by reason of the Danger he should be exposed to, if the thing was divulged, during his Stay in France.

Henry could not tell what to think of such a Proposal. He knew France was not governed either by the Duke of Orleans, or the Duke of Bourbon; and that it was not the Earl of Armagnac's Interest to make a Peace upon these Terms. But, at the same time, the hopes of recovering the Provinces of France, lost since the Treaty of Brétigny, without being obliged to renew the War, were very agreeable. On the other hand, the Alternative proposed by the Duke, could not but be advantageous to him. All he had to do, was to be upon his Guard, and not be perverted, on this pretence, to interrupt the Execution of his Projects. Wherefore, resolving not to suspend his Expedition one single Day, upon any account whatever, he believed there was no Danger in granting the Duke of Bourbon the Leave he desired. But first, he had one of the Duke's Sons given him in Hoftage, with Security for the Sum of two hundred thousand Crowns. These Particulars are in the Collection of the Publick Acts. We find there a Letter, written, with the King's own Hand, to Sir John Tiptot, his Ambassador to the Emperor, ordering him to acquaint Sigismund with the Secret, ask his Opinion upon it, and assure him that the Negotiation shall not retard his Expedition into France. At the same time, he enjoys him not to make the least Discovery to any other Person, on pain of his heavy Displeasure. Probably, his firm Resolution not to be amused by any Proposal, was the reason, this Stratagem was carried no farther. The Duke of Bourbon returned into England; but performed not his other Engagements. It was, doubtless, Henry's Indignation against the Prisoners, for endeavouring to deceive him, that caused him to order them to be confined in Pontfract Castle; whereas before, they were upon their Parole. Though there are no positive Proofs, that this Plot was contrived by the Constable, it is visible however, by several Conjectures, which all together amount to a sort of Demonstration. It would be too long to give the Particulars here. But if the French Prisoners are supposed to have acted sincerely, without the Direction of the Constable, it must be inferred, that France was then in a very deplorable State. King Charles, frequently seized with a Frenzy, was incapable of taking care of his Affairs. The Duke of Burgundy, first Peer of the Realm, and Head of a powerful Party, had made a secret Alliance with the Enemy of the State. The Princes of the Blood were about to acknowledge Henry for King of France. In fine, the Kingdom was governed by a young Prince of fourteen Years, and by the Earl of Armagnac, a violent Man, who fought only to be revenged of his Enemies, and openly sacrificed the publick Good to his Ambition.

Though the Constable had already been the Cause of much Mischief to France, by persecuting the Duke of Burgundy, and forcing him, as it were, to throw himself into the Arms of the King of England, he did not think it sufficient to secure his Quiet. Isabella of Bavaria, Wife of Charles VI., appeared so displeased to be ruled by a Subject, that he could not help fearing, she would in the end find means to deprive him of his Authority. This was not impossible. The King being of an easy Temper, it would not have been difficult to gain him, in one of his Intervals. Neither was it impracticable, to persuade the Dauphin to rid himself of a troublesome Governour, in order to rule as he pleased, without fear of being controlled. Thus the Constable's Destiny hanging by so weak a Thread, whilst he had such an Enemy at Court, he believed, that, to secure himself, it was absolutely necessary to remove her. The Queen gave him a sufficient Handle by her Behaviour, which was not altogether conformable to the Rules of Decency. The Constable taking this Advantage, inspired the King and Dauphin, with such strong Suspicions of her, that she was sent away to Tours, where she remained as a Prisoner, not knowing on whom to rely, to free herself out of Captivity. This fatal Policy of the Constable was a fresh Source of Calamities to France. The injured Mother could never forgive her Son the Affront she had received, and, unfortunately for the Kingdom, it was but too much in her Power to glut her Revenge.

The Constable's violent Conduct, the Death of the two Dauphins laid to his Charge, the Queen's Banishment, with numberless other Occasions, furnished the Duke of Burgundy with a pretence to make a Diversion, in favour of the King of England. He published a Manifesto against the Constable, aggravating his Faults and Oppressions, with all the Rementment of an injured Enemy. Then he wrote to the King, that, as first Peer of France, it was incumbent upon him, to endeavour to prevent the utter Ruin of the Kingdom, which was infallibly going to Destruction, unless timely relieved. By the same reasons, he tried to stir up the Cities of the Kingdom, and win them to his Interest. In fine, perceiving that some of the Towns had already declared for him, he approached Paris at the Head of an Army, when the King of England was ready to sail for France. His Aim was, to lay the Dauphin and Constable under a Necessity, either of quitting Paris, in order to oppose the King of England, or of suffering the English to act without Opposition, if they intended to save Paris. They thought fit to take this last Course, chusing rather, that Part of the Kingdom should fall into the Hands of the English, than to see themselves dispossessed of the Government, by their private Enemies.

Henry willing to improve so favorable a Juncture, sailed Henry lands about the end of July (1), and landed at Tenque in Normandy. His Army consisted but of twenty-five thousand five hundred effective Men, too inconsiderable a Number for the Conquest of France, had he not been secure of meeting little Opposition. Upon his Arrival, he besieged the Castle of Tenque, and became Master of it the 9th of August. Then, after the Conquest of some other small Places (2), he laid Siege to Caen, which surrendered the 9th of September.

The Court of France was then in great Perplexity. The Duke of Burgundy, at the Gates of Paris, hindered their regulating the Affairs of the Kingdom. They should have had two Armies in the Field, one to oppose the Burgundians, and another to defend Normandy against the English. But they had scarce Troops enough to defend Paris, where the King, Dauphin, and Constable, were shut up. Their only Refuge was to renew the Negotiations with Henry. To that end, they demanded a Conference between Ambassadors of the two Crowns to consult about Means to conclude a Peace. Henry agreed to the Proposal, but without discontinuing the War, being unwilling to lose so precious an Opportunity. The Court of France chusing the Archbishop of Reims for first Plenipotentiary, he appointed, on his Part, the Earl of Warwick and some others (3), who were to meet with the French, at Bernville, in Normandy. This Congress, for what Reason I know not, was deferred to the end of November. Mean while, Henry became Master of Bayeux, Argentan, Chateau de l'Aigle, Alençon, and some other Places.

Whilst the King was continuing his Conquests, the Duke of Burgundy did him great Service, not only by the Diversion he made about Paris, but chiefly by increasing the Troubles in France, so as never more to be appeased. Queen Isabella, banished to Tours, had been hitherto an Enemy to the Duke of Burgundy, but the desire of being revenged on the Dauphin and Constable, made her overlook all the Causes of Disgust at the Duke. As she had no other Refuge, she dispatched trusty Messengers to tell him, she was ready to join with him against their common Enemies. The Duke immediately accepted the Offer, and privately concerted measures with her, to free her from Confinement. Then, he suddenly departed from Corbeil, where he was encamped, with only a small Body of chosen Horsemen. He made such speed, that before his Design could be known, he was her off to the Abbey of Marmoutier near Tours, where he found the Queen, who was come thither under Colour of Devotion. As she was not suspected of attempting to escape, he easily carried her away, and conducted her to Troie in Champagne. When she saw herself in safety, she assumed the Title of Regent, pretending, the King her Husband was Captive in the hands of the Dauphin and Earl of Armagnac.

In the mean time, Henry made several Conquests in Normandy, without any Opposition. The Constable chose rather to see the State perish, than resign his Authority, and the Duke of Burgundy favoured Henry to the utmost of his Power.

The Conference between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Crowns, was held at Bernville, on the 28th of November. As Henry suspected, the Court of France fought only to make him lose time, he resolved to deprive them of that Expectation. Immediately upon the opening of the Conference, his Ambassadors set forth his Pretensions, assuring withal, there would be no Abatement. The Substance of his Offers was, That he would marry the Princess Catherine: That King Charles should enjoy the Crown for his Life, but after his Death, it should come to the King of England: That during Charles's Life, Henry should be Regent of France, by reason of the King's Infirmary. Moreover he demanded such Securities, as should render the Performance of these Articles unquestionable.

But as the French Ambassadors were not sufficiently empowered to treat upon these Articles, and it was not Henry's Interest vainly to prolong this Negotiation, the Conference immediately broke up. He was justly apprehensive, the Court of France would have made use of this occasion, to raise a Jealousy in his Allies, and particularly in the Duke of Burgundy. Mean while Henry, intent upon the Siege of Falaise, took the Town on the 20th of December, but the Castle held out till February.

Some time before the Congress of Bernville, the Duke of Bretagne came and made a Truce with Henry for a Year (1), and another in the Name of the Queen of Sicily, as Guardian of Lewis her Son, for Anjou and Maine. Thus by degrees, Henry greatly weakened France, by depriving her of the Assistance she might have received from her Vassals.

Whilst the King was employed in France, Oldcastle, of whom I have spoken elsewhere, was seized (2) and brought to London, to the great Satisfaction of the Clergy, who were extremely incensed against him. They were determined to sacrifice him, for a Terror to all the rest of the Lollards. Notwithstanding his Birth and Merit, he was sentenced to be hung up by the middle with a Chain, and burnt alive. By the way, his being burnt, is a clear Evidence, that he was condemned for Heresy, rather than for conspiring against the King. Be this as it will, his Sentence was executed amidst the Curses and Imprecations of the Priests and Monks, who even laboured to prevent the People from praying for him. Thus died Sir John Oldcastle Baron of Cobham, with a wonderful Constancy, perfectly answerable to the Firmness, wherewith he had all along maintained the Doctrine of Wickliffe, which he professed. He was the first Nobleman, that suffered on the account of Religion (3). After the Execution, the Parliament enacted fresh Statutes, in order to the utter Extirpation of the Lollards; the Clergy never ceasing to require their Blood, with all the eagerness imaginable.

In some Histories it is said, this Year, Queen Joanna of Navarre, Widow of Henry IV., and Mother-in-law of the reigning King, was accused of conspiring, with her Confessor, against the King. Some add, she was condemned to a ten-years Imprisonment, and that her Confessor was killed by the Chaplain of the Tower, in a Dispute upon that Occasion. This is all that can be said concerning this Accusation, of which Historians speak very confusedly.

As for the Scotch Invasion, placed by some in this Year, and, as they say, repulsed by the Duke of Bedford, with a hundred thousand Men, I dare venture to affirm, it is all a Mistake (4), since it is not mentioned, either in the public Records, or in the Histories of Scotland. All we find with relation to the Scots, is, that they threatened to invade England in the Year 1415, about the time of the King's first Expedition into France (5).

The Situation of Affairs in France was extremely advantageous to Henry. Accordingly, he did not fail to improve it. The Campaign, begun in August, lasted all the Winter, without any Interruption, so that his Troops had no time to rest. The Castle of Falaise, surrendering on the 16th of February, Henry divided his Army into several Bodies, of which he gave the Command to the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester his Brothers, to the Duke of Exeter and the Earl of Salisbury, with Orders to attack several Places at once; being resolved not to neglect so favorable an Opportunity. In the Months of March and April, he became master of St. Lo, Carentan, St. Sauveur le Vicomte, and many other Places in Normandy; so that of all the strong Towns, he only wanted Cherbourg and Roan, to complete the Conquest of that Province. Breux surrendered in May, and presently after, he laid Siege to Cherbourg, which cost him three Months.

During the Siege, the Court of France suffered a new Revolution, which was not favorable to Henry, though, at first, it seemed to procure him great Advantages. The Council of Constance, which had been opened ever since the Year 1414, having deposed the three Popes (6), IX, who contended for the Papacy, had elected on the 10th of November 1417, Cardinal Colonna, who assumed the Name of Martin V. The new Pope, upon his mounting the Papal Throne, sent two Legates into France, to try to appease the Troubles, and unite the two Factions. The Solicitations of these Legates were so powerful, that the two Parties sent their Deputies to Montreuil-Faut-Tonne, where it was agreed, that the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy should jointly govern the Kingdom, during the King's Infirmary. If this Agreement had taken Place, and the two Parties been sincerely reconciled, probably, Henry's Affairs would have received a notable Prejudice. But the Constable, and the Chancellor his Creature, could never bear to see the Duke of Burgundy in the Administration again. So, preferring their own private Interests to the Good of the Publick, they so managed, that the Agreement remained ineffectual.

This Proceeding drew the publick hatred on the Constable, and strengthened the Burgundian Faction in Paris, which, from thenceforth, became much more powerful. At length, May the 18th at Night, they found means to introduce into Paris, Lisle-Adam Governor of Pontaise, and a zealous Adherent for the Duke of Burgundy. They entered only with eight hundred Horse, but at his Arrival, the Burgundians being under Arms, made a terrible Slaughter of the Armagnacs. Tanneguy du Chatel, Governor of the Bastille, not being able to remedy the disorder, ran to the Louvre, and carried away the Dauphin in his Shirt, in order to secure him in his Fortrefs. Next Morning, the Dauphin fled to Melun, not thinking himself safe in the Bastille, but the King remained in the Power of the Burgundians. The same day the Constable being hid in a Mason's House, was discovered, and thrown into Prison.

But this was only a Prelude to a much greater Commotion, in the same City, some days after. Upon News first of what had passed, the Exiles being returned to Paris from all Quarters, the Massacre was renewed June the 12th. The Constable was taken out of Prison, murdered, and shamefully dragged through the Streets. The Chancellor, several Bishops, and other Persons, to the Number of two thousand, underwent the same barbarous Treatment. The Massacre being ended, the Queen and the Duke of Burgundy came to Paris, and entered the City in Triumph, on the 14th of July. The Plague, which afterwards broke out at Paris, and which, in three Months, swept away above forty thousand Persons, added fresh Calamities to those I have mentioned. Mean while the Queen and Duke having the King in their Power, issued, in his Name, what Orders they judged most conducive to their own Interests. On the other hand, the Dauphin, assuming the Title of Regent, threatened all that should obey the Duke of Burgundy. Thus which ever Side the French espoused, they could not avoid being called Rebels by one or other of the Factions. Neutrality it self was accounted a Crime.

Mean while, notwithstanding the Animosity of the two Parties, the Troubles seemed for some time to be going to end. As there was not yet any Cause of personal Enmity between the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Bretagne had so managed, that each of these Princes had consented to an Agreement. Every thing

(4) And yet, that it is far from being improbable, appears by one of King Henry's Letters, wherein he says, "I am accented, inform me by a Man of right notable Estate in this Land, that there hath been a Man of the Duke of Clarence in Scotland, who accords with the Duke at Albany, that this next Summer he shall bring in the Marquis of Scotland to fight what he may, and also that there should be sundry ways to the having away specially of the Duke of Orkney; and also of the King, as well as of the Remnant of my forlorn Prisoners." 1418. was settled, but some Persons about the Dauphin, persuaded him not to sign. This was attended with fatal Consequences. Thus the Diffension which prevailed between the two Factions, caused each to have two Enemies to oppose, the contrary Party on one hand, and the English on the other. But Henry was far from looking upon both Parties with the same Eye. He was sworn Enemy of the Armagnacs, whilst he was only a feigned Enemy of the Burgundians.

Henry had now begun to reap some Advantage from the late Revolution in the Court of France. The new Earl of Armagnac, the Lord D'Albret, and the other Gascon Lords of the same Party, who were waging in Guienne fierce War with the English, thought proper to conclude a Truce with him, which freed him from a troublesome Diversion. These Lords considering, that, since the death of the Constable, the Government of France was in the Duke of Burgundy's Hands, believed it repugnant to their Interest, to continue a War, of which their Enemy would reap all the Benefit. By this Truce, instead of being obliged to fend Succours into Guienne, Henry drew from thence some Troops, with which he reinforced his Army in Normandy.

Chebourg having at length capitulated (1), after a three Months Siege, France had nothing left in Normandy but Roan, the loss whereof would deprive her of all hopes of recovering that Province. And therefore, without delay, Henry laid Siege to that City, about the latter end of August, or the beginning of September. Mazarin says, the Siege began in June, which is a mistake. However that be, it was very remarkable for the vigorous Defence of the Besieged (2), who held out five Months, and endured the greatest Miseries, before they capitulated. They applied to the Duke of Burgundy for Succours, but it was to no purpose (3). France, in changing Governor, had not acquired new Strength. Besides, the Duke of Burgundy, following the Earl of Armagnac's Maxims, was more careful to disappoint the Practices of his Enemies, than oppose the Progress of the King of England. He put however the Pope's Legates upon trying, whether, by a Negotiation, he could interrupt the Siege of Roan. This Method not succeeding, he assembled all the Forces in his Power, and feigned a design to give the English Battle. He even carried the King as far as Beauvais, but all this ended in nothing. Perhaps he did not much care to obstruct the King of England's Progress. It is uncertain, whether, after his being at the head of the Government, he preserved the same Sentiments for that Monarch, as when banished from Court. It may at least be affirmed, he had not the same Interest to promote his Affairs. He could not however but shew some regard for a Prince, who had in his possession a Writing, capable of ruining him, with all the French, of what Party soever. For this reason, since the Revolution at the Court of France, his Conduct had been very ambiguous. He had resolved, it seems, to do neither good nor hurt to the King of England, till he should be determined by the Events.

The Duke of Burgundy not relieving the Besieged, they applied to the Dauphin, who was as little able to raise the Siege by force. The way of Negotiation seemed to him more proper to produce that Effect. It is hard to know for certain, whether he really intended to make a Peace and an Alliance with Henry, as he expressed a desire, or designed only to amuse him. Be this as it will, he sent him word, that he desired to treat with him upon three Articles. First, concerning the means of restoring a Peace to France. Secondly, about the Marriage already projected. Lastly, about an Alliance between them two, against the Duke of Burgundy. Henry rejected not these Proposals. Perhaps he did not much rely on the Duke of Burgundy, or else had a mind to raise the Jealousy of the Court of France, in order to procure more advantageous Offers than had yet been proposed. He appointed for his Ambassadors, at the Congress desired by the Dauphin, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, Philip Morgan, and some others. Their Instructions, dated at the Camp before Roan, October the 26th, were in Substance as follow:

I. That they should use their utmost Endeavours, to induce the Dauphin's Ambassadors to declare all their Proposals, and absolutely reject all offers of the Countries he was already possessed of.

II. If the French should offer at length to put all things upon the foot of the Treaty of Bretigny, they were to demand, how the King should be assured of the Performance, since the Dauphin was not authorized for that purpose.

III. He judged, they would for that reason insist only on a Truce, in which case, he ordered his Ambassadors to require, what Dominions should be given him for making the same.

IV. He expressly forbid them to treat of an Alliance with the Dauphin, till the Peace or Truce was settled. He did not leave them however at Liberty to conclude either, but ordered notice to be sent him, when Matters should be upon the Point of Conclusion, in case they proceeded too far.

V. As to the Alliance with the Dauphin, he said, that Prince's Aim was, probably, to obtain his Assistance against the Duke of Burgundy. If so, he forbade them to agree upon an inconsiderable Aid; but commanded them to offer Forces sufficient to restore the Kingdom of France to a State of Tranquillity.

VI. But withal, he expected, in consideration of these Forces, that the Earldoms of Artois, Boulgne, and Flanders, should be given him. But if this was refused, the Ambassadors were to lower their Demands to the Earldom of Flanders only, provided the Dauphin would assist in conquering it. He offered, on his Part, to give up to the Dauphin whatever should be conquered elsewhere upon the Duke of Burgundy.

It is easy to see, by these Instructions, that the King did not believe the Congress would end in a Peace; nor even intended to conclude with the Dauphin, who had not Power to resign to the King, what had been taken from his Predecessor, since the Treaty of Bretigny. It may therefore be presumed, his sole Aim was to stir up the Jealousy of the Duke of Burgundy, who being Master of the King's Person, was alone able to make a solid Peace. This appears moreover by the King's writing, the very day he signed these Instructions, to the Duke of Burgundy, that if the Negotiation for a Peace was renewed, he would do his utmost to render it successful. Upon this Letter, Charles sent him word, he had nominated the Bishop of Arras and Beauvais, the first President of Morvillers, and some others, for his Plenipotentiaries. Thus Henry was in hopes, by treating with the two Parties at once, he should raise such a Jealousy in both, that from thence would result a happy Conclusion to his Affairs.

The Congress between the King's and the Dauphin's Ambassadors, was held at Alençon, the 10th of November. The English, pursuant to their Instructions, absolutely refused to treat about the Alliance, before the Terms of the Peace was agreed upon. At length, after evading all the captious Proposals made by the French, they obliged them to come to their last Offers; namely, the Towns and Provinces contained in the Treaty of Bretigny, on Condition of Homage to the Crown of France. But the English rejected these Offers, unless the Sovereignty of the Provinces was added, according to the Tenor of the Treaty of Bretigny. They demanded moreover, Normandy; raised difficulties about the Dauphin's Inability to perform these Conditions; and required, in what manner he intended to accomplish them, supposing their Master should be satisfied therewith. The French answered, it was needless to talk of the manner of Performance, since the Offers themselves did not please. Whereupon they broke up the Conference.

Hardly was this Congress ended, before another was held at Pont de l'Arche, between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings; or rather the Ambassadors of the two Crowns met to confer together, in Presence of the Pope's Legates. But in the first Meeting, King Charles's Ambassadors insisted, that the Conference should be managed in French, to which the English refused to agree. In short, at the Instance of the Legates, who were very urgent, Henry was willing there should be two Protocols, one in French, and another in Latin, of which the last only should be accounted authentick. But the French rejecting this Expedient, the Conference about the Peace was not so much as opened. Probably, the Duke of Burgundy did not seriously intend to enter into Negotiation. He was still unresolved of his Course, or rather, was then framing a design, which we shall see come to light the next Year.

This Conference however alarmed the Dauphin, who, doubtless, was ignorant of what passed. He was afraid of being prevented by the Duke of Burgundy, well knowing, if a Peace was made between the two Kings, it must tend to his Prejudice. In this belief, he sent to Henry, intreating him to appoint the Place where the Negotiation, begun at Alençon, might be renewed. Henry readily consented to his Request, as he could desire nothing more advantageous, than the mutual Jealousy of the two 1419. Factions. It was agreed therefore, that the Ambassadors should meet again at Louviers, the beginning of February.

During all these Negotiations, Henry had not discontinued one moment the Siege of Rouen, though his Army suffered much by the Harpness of the Season. But the Besieged were in no better Condition. Reduced to eat Horse-Flesh, and all kinds of Animals, and even this sort of Food failing them, they could hold out no longer. Wherefore, seeing no remedy, they capitulated on the 13th of January, to surrender on the 19th, in case they were not relieved by that time. Henry continued to them all their Privileges, for the Sum of three hundred thousand Crowns. By the surrender of Rouen, all Normandy, a few Castles excepted, fell again under the Dominion of the Kings of England, two hundred and fifteen Years after it was taken from them by Philip Augustus, in the Reign of John Lack-land. After the taking of Rouen, Henry sent part of his Army into Picardy, under the Command of the Duke of Exeter, who became Master of Dieppe and Montreuil (1).

Affairs were then at a Crisis, which could not fail of producing some great change. As the Duke of Burgundy had fought the King of England's Alliance, only to dispossess the Dauphin and Earl of Armagnac, he no longer stood in need of his Protection, since he was Master of Paris, and the King's Person. On the contrary, his Station should have induced him to wish, that Henry might not grow too powerful in France, and consequently it was his Interest to oppose the Progress of the English Arms.
 But on the other hand, he had in the Dauphin a sworn Enemy, against whom it was chiefly necessary to be secured. Besides that Prince's natural Right to govern the Kingdom during his Father's Infirmary, he was moreover at the head of a powerful Party. Besides, it was not impossible, either by the King's Death, or some other way, he might recover the Advantage he had lost. In that case, the Duke would rather have had Henry Master of all France, than fee the Dauphin triumphant. Mean while, whatever turn Affairs should take, he plainly perceived, it would not be possible to preserve his Authority, though Henry succeeded in his designs. And indeed it was not likely, that Henry would trust him with the Government, when he was once in possession. Thus standing as it were between two Precipices, he remained some time undetermined, without knowing what to resolve. Probably it was this that prevented his more effectual Endeavours to relieve Roan. He durst not break with the King of England, for fear he should want his farther Assistance against the Dauphin. After continuing some time in this State of Perplexity, he determined at length to do all that lay in his Power to be reconciled with his Enemy, in order to break safely with the King of England. This Course seemed to him both advantageous and honorable. By a hearty Reconciliation with the Dauphin, he might hope to have some lasting Share in the Government, and hold the second Rank. Besides, France being his native Country, he could not openly forsake her Interests, without rendering himself odious to all true Frenchmen. If he had privately relinquished her, it would not without Remorse. He had been led to it by the sole Thirst of Revenge. The Execution of the Design he had formed, was not however without Difficulties. The Dauphin had conceived an inveterate Hatred of him, which was continually fomented by the Friends and Adherents of the late Duke of Orleans, who were always about him, and carefully watching all Opportunities to revenge the Death of that Prince.
 Notwithstanding these Obstacles, the Duke of Burgundy became more and more confirmed in his Resolution, not seeing any other way to save himself, and the Kingdom. He undertook therefore to accomplish this Reconciliation by all sorts of means, even to the forcing the Dauphin to it, by the Fear of seeing France otherwise lost. In fine, if the Dauphin's Hatred and Obstinacy should render it impracticable, he was determined to take the desperate Course of rendering Henry Master of France.

rendering Henry's time that the Duke of Burgundy came to his last Refolution, the Conference between the Ambassadors of Henry and the Dauphin was held at Louviers. The same Difficulties which occurred at the Congress of Alençon, rendered this fruitless. It was only agreed, that the King and the Dauphin should meet and confer together. But this Interview, the time whereof was too much prolonged, did not take effect, because the Dauphin took other Measures. However, to continue the Duke of Burgundy's Jealousy, Henry granted the Dauphin a Truce, from the 12th of February till Easter, for all the Country 1419, between the Loire and the Seine, Normandy excepted.

Purſuant to the Duke of Burgundy's Project, he ſent and ſuſed for the Dauphin's Friendſhip, offering, on his part, to deſerve and cultivate it, to the utmoſt of his Power; <sup>The Dauphreſt is to be reconciled

Burgundy.</sup> intimating wiſh, that it would be proper to have a Conference together, as well mutually to confirm their Recon- ciliation, as to concert Meaſures for the Welfare of the Kingdom. But the Dauphin ſcornfully rejected this Propoſal. He was too apprehenſive of ſharing the Authority with the Queen his Mother, and the Duke of Burgundy, or rather of ſeeing himſelf ſubject to them. The ſole Command of the Province, that owned him for Regent, ſeemed to him preferable to the Advantage propoſed, from a Reconciliation, which could not be made without leaving the Queen his Mother, and the Duke, a ſhare in the Adminiſtration. So, the Duke of Burgundy ſaw himſelf reduced to a neceſſity, of ſeriously endeavouring to make a Peace with England, in caſe the Dauphin perſiſted in his Obſtinacy. The Congreſs at Leuvers having alarmed him, he was afraid of being prevented, and of not being afterwards ſtrong enough to reſiſt the King of England and the Dauphin, if they ſhould join in a League againſt him. He reſolved therefore, in order to free himſelf from this Fear, to unravel Affairs ſome way or other. To <sup>The Duke pre-ſents a Peace to Henry.</sup> that end, he ſent Henry word, that King Charles was inclin- ed to a Peace, and, to ſucceed the more eaſily, he propoſed an Interview, where the two Kings, aſſiſſed by their Councils, might ſettle the Terms, and conclude the intended Marriage. Henry readily cloſed with the Propoſal, and even granted a three Months Truce; that during the Interval, the Time, Place and Manner of the Conference might be agreed on.

All France was justly alarmed at this Resolution. It ^{From the} ^{At length the} ^{Dauphin} ^{was the} ^{Duke of} ^{Burgundy,} ^{St. Louis} ^{Elisabeth} was easily perceived, that the Peace and Marriage could not be made in such a Juncture, without the Kingdom's being delivered to the King of England. Matters standing thus, the Duke of Burgundy, who had the Welfare and Interest of their Country at heart, used all possible Endeavours to procure a Peace, or at least a Truce between the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy. The Dauphin would have contented to a three Years Truce, but the Duke would have it only for two Months. His Aim was to conclude a Peace with England, if by that time he could not agree with the Dauphin. The pains taken to persuade them to so necessary an Union proving fruitless, the Project of the interview between the two Kings was at length accomplished, after several Prolongations, till the 30th of May. It was agreed, it should be near Moulant, in a Field chosen for that purpose, where a magnificent Pavilion was ordered to be erected. As King Charles's Infirmary hindered him from being present in Person, it was agreed, that his Queen and the Duke of Burgundy should act as his Procurators, and that the Duke of Bretagne should be there. Mean time, to avoid the Heats, which might arise from the discussion of Affairs, Commissioners were appointed on both Sides to settle the Particulars. Henry was pleased to give the Dukes of Clarence and Gloicester the Honour of being Heads of this Commission. The Court of France being Heads of this Commission. The Court of France brought the Princess Catherine her Daughter, with whom Henry was charmed. The Effect of this first Sight being very visible, the Queen believed, she should inflame the Delires of that Prince, by not letting her Daughter appear any more. Henry soon perceived her Design. He found the Princess was to serve for a Decoy to ensnare him. But, to frustrate the Queen's expectation, he told the Duke of Burgundy, it might be depended upon, he would never quit his Arms, till he had the King and the Princess his Daughter in his Power, and had expelled him the Kingdom, in case he opposed it. At any other Juncture, the Duke, who was as high-spirited as the King, would doubtless have returned him a sharp Answer. But not to exasperate too much a Prince, of whom he might soon stand in need, he was content with saying, he did not question but he would have reason to be tired of the War.

The Conference of Meuland (3) ran upon three Articles, required by Henry, as previous to the Peace and Marriage.

I. That he should be put in possession of whatever was granted to Edward III by the Treaty of Bretigny.

[illegible]

(5) Rennece en France. Rymer's Fed. Tom. IX. p. 762.

II. That

1419. II. That moreover all Normandy should be delivered to him.

III. The full and independent Sovereignty, of whatever should be resigned to him by the present Treaty.

As Henry would not recede from these Articles, the Duke of Burgundy plainly saw, if he directly opposed them, he should occasion the breaking up of the Conference, which it was his Interest to continue, as the only way left to bring the Dauphin to a Reconciliation. So, without disputing, or granting the King's Pretensions, he delivered to the King the Counter-Demands of France. They were so drawn as to be liable to great Objections, which he might either urge or relinquish, according as he saw what Course the Dauphin would take. In a word, the Duke of Burgundy's Aim, was to give the Dauphin a little more time, before any thing was concluded with the King of England. These were the Demands of France, with the King's Answers annexed.

I. That the King of England renounce the Crown of France.

The King consents to it, provided this Clause be added, [except what is granted to him by the present Treaty.]

II. That he quit Claim to Touraine, Anjou, Maine, and the Sovereignty of Bretagne.

The King is not pleased with this Article.

Probably, because of the Sovereignty of Bretagne, which he claimed as Duke of Normandy.

III. The King of England shall swear, that neither he, nor his Successors, shall receive at any time hereafter, upon any account whatever, the Cession of the Crown of France, from any Person, who hath, or pretends to have a Right.

The King agrees to this, provided his Adversary will also swear the same, &c.

IV. The King of England shall cause the Renunciations, Promises, and Engagements to be recorded, as the King of France and his Council shall think most advisable.

The King likes not this Article.

V. Instead of Ponthieu and Montreuil, the King of France shall have Liberty to give an Equivalent in some other part of his Kingdom, as he shall judge proper.

The King disapproves of this Article.

VI. As there are still in Normandy several Places unconquered by the King of England, which however are to be given up by the Treaty, he shall resign upon that account, all his other Conquests elsewhere. Every one shall be restored to the Possession of his Estate, in what place soever it lies. There shall be an Alliance concluded between the two Kings.

The King approves of this, on condition the Scots and the Rebels be not included in the Alliance.

VII. The King of England shall repay the six hundred thousand Crowns given to Richard II. in part of the eight hundred thousand promised with Queen Isabella, and moreover four hundred thousand for that Princess's Jewels detained in England.

The King is willing that this Article be allowed out of the Arrears due for King John's Ransom. However, he is surprized at the Demand of four hundred thousand Crowns for Queen Isabella's Jewels, when they were not worth a Quarter of that Sum.

It is easy to perceive, by the Nature of these Demands, that the Difficulties were not considerable enough to hinder the Conclusion of a Peace, if both Parties had been equally willing. But, on the other hand, they were sufficient to keep the Treaty depending, as long as the Court of France pleased (1). In the Duke of Burgundy's Situation, he insisted upon the Articles, disapproved by the King, no farther than was necessary for his purpose. He was very glad to let the King believe, the Peace was going to be concluded; as indeed it would have been, had the Dauphin persisted in his Obstinacy. Henry a little questioned it, that on the 5th of July, that is, about a Month after the opening of the Congress, he gave full Power to the Archbishop of Canterbury to go to Paris, and conclude the Peace in his Name, with King Charles.

But whilst Henry was pleasing himself with this Expectation, endeavours were using, on the other side, to break all his measures. As he had made use of Negotiations now with the Dauphin, then with the Duke of Burgundy, in order to stir up the Jealousy of both, and attain his ends, he was himself over-reached in his own Way. The Congress of Meulant, where the Duke of Burgundy's chief Aim was to frighten the Dauphin, produced the desired Effect. The young Prince, alarmed at seeing so near a Conclusion, a Peace so very disadvantageous to France and himself, believed, he ought not to refuse any longer, to be reconciled with the Duke of Burgundy; since their Reconciliation was the only means to prevent so great a Misfortune. Wherefore, after several private Conferences between some trusty Friends of the two Princes, a Reconciliation, so earnestly desired by all true Frenchmen, was at length brought about. On the 11th of July, they met about three Miles from Meulant, in the Road to Paris, and embraced one another. After that, they signed a Treaty, mutually promising, to love one another like Brothers, and jointly to oppose the damnable Enterprize of the English, the ancient Enemies of the Kingdom.

This Step being made, the Duke of Burgundy took new measures. As he no longer desired the Conclusion of the Peace, he strenuously insisted, in the Conferences which were still continued at Meulant, upon the Demands of France. But for fear Henry should desist from his Objections, he added some fresh Articles. In explaining the third Demand of France, he clogged it with so many Conditions, that in all future Cases whatever, neither Henry, nor his Successors, Kings of England, could ever claim or acquire any part of that Kingdom. But Henry, who was very willing to quit his Pretensions to France, as descended from Edward III., thought it very unreasonable to be obliged to extend this Renunciation, for himself and Successors, to all cases that might happen, and could not possibly be foreseen. He complained more over, that the Duke of Burgundy required things which could not be granted, without offending God, and breaking his Oaths. I do not know what this was. In fine, to render the Conclusion of the Peace impracticable, the Duke attacked the King's Demands, against which he had taken care to alledge nothing, before his Reconciliation with the Dauphin. He affirmed, that, in general, they were extravagant, obscure, ambiguous, and unreasonable, without mentioning particulars. At the same time, he expected Henry should accept the Offers of France, absolutely and simply, without any Explanation. For fear, however, of being taken at his word, he refused to consent that the Articles already agreed, should be committed to writing.

Hitherto Henry had imagined, for what reason I know not, that the Duke of Burgundy's Reconciliation with the Dauphin, would be no Obstacle to the Peace. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that on the 18th of July, that is, seven Days after their Interview, Henry empowered the Archbishop of Canterbury to conclude his Marriage with the Princess Catherine. It might be thought he knew nothing yet of what passed on the 11th, between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy, if it did not appear by a Letter in the same Collection, that some of his Courtiers had received Intelligence of it on the 14th. He was so prejudiced on this Occasion, that on the 19th he empowered Commissioners to prolong the Truce. But the Duke of Burgundy's new Demands, or rather his Cavils at the Treaty, broke off the Conferences, and all went and prepared for the War.

July the 28th, Henry ordered a Detachment, headed by the Duke of Gloucester, to storm Pontoise. This Enterprize was attended with the expected success. L'Isle Adam, the Governor, little thinking of being attacked, was surprised and forced to fly with part of the Garrison (2). As the Court of France resided in this Town, during the Congress of Meulant, and were gone but a few Days, the English Soldiers found it still full of the Baggage of the Courtiers. The Booty is said to amount to above two Millions of Crowns.

The taking of Pontoise opened the King a way to the very Gates of Paris. But, however, the Posture of his Affairs was not changed for the better, since the Union of the two Factions by which France was divided. Whilst they were destroying one another, an Army of twenty-five thousand Men was sufficient for the Conquest of Normandy. No Enemy had appeared to force him to raise his Sieges. Moreover, he had been all along, publicly or privately, favoured by one of the Factions. But after their Reconciliation, he could hardly expect, with his own Forces alone, to accomplish his Enterprize. He aimed at no less than the Conquest of the whole Kingdom, or at least of what England had lost since the 1419. Treaty of Bretigny. And yet, after a six years War, and in so favorable Junctures, he was Master but of one single Province. He knew also, that in England, his obstinate continuation of so hazardous a War, was not universally approved; and that it was openly said, the Conquest of France would be the Ruin of England. But this was not the only thing that gave him uneasiness. He had just received a Letter from Bayonne, of the 22d of July, informing him, that a powerful Fleet (1) was equipping in Casfile, for the Dauphin's Assistance. Shortly after, he received another from the Mayor of the same Town, acquainting him, that Arregon had declared for the Dauphin; that the Cossilians and Arregonians were now entered Bearn, were ravaging the Country about Bayonne, and seemed to have a design to besiege the Town. The Letter added further, that the Cossilian Fleet was ordered to sail for Scotland, and transport from thence a Body of Troops into France, to serve under the Dauphin. On the other hand, he could not doubt but the Flemings, who had refused to serve the Duke of Burgundy against France, would be ready to obey him, in Defence of that Kingdom. Notwithstanding these sudden accumulated Difficulties, he persisted in his first Resolution. He had even the Assurance, to offer King Charles, as a sort of Favour, that he would be contented with what he had demanded at Meulan, on condition Pontaise, which he had just taken, were confirmed to him. It is however undeniable, he should have been greatly embarrassed. When he undertook the War, he depended upon the Diffensions of the French. And to these Diffensions was owing the Ease, wherewith he had hitherto conquered. Mean while, he saw himself obliged to undertake, with an inconsiderable Army, the Conquest of a Kingdom, of which he yet possessed but a small Part. However, his good Fortune, or rather the Dauphin's Animosity against the Duke of Burgundy, happily freed him from this Embarrassment.

In the Interview between the Dauphin and the Duke of Burgundy, they agreed to meet again on the Bridge of Montercau-Faut-Tonne, the 18th of August, to consider how to prosecute the War against the English. The Duke was extremely unwilling to go to the Place appointed. He seemed to have a Surmise of what was to happen. However, as a too great Mistrust might have broke his Measures, and rendered what had been done ineffectual, he resolved to perform his Engagement. Not to enter into the Particulars, mentioned in all the French Histories, I shall only say, the Dauphin caused the Duke to be assassinated, on the very Bridge chosen for their Conference. I say, the Dauphin, whatever pains some Historians have taken to clear him. The Deed was done before his Eyes, and at his Feet, and he still kept the Murderers in his Service, who were the chief Officers of his Household. This would be a sufficient proof of his Guilt, though there were no Historians faithful enough freely to own it.

This Accident suddenly changed the Face of Affairs. Probably the Duke of Burgundy, at the time of his Death, was well-affected to France. But Philip his Son and Successor, suffering himself to be transported with the desire of revenging his Father's Death, did not scruple to ruin the Kingdom, in order to gratify his Passion. The speediest and most effectual Means to attain his Ends, was to make a League with the King of England, and Queen Isabella, mortal Enemy of the Dauphin her Son. Accordingly, all the rest of the Year was spent in secret Negotiations, which ended at last in putting the Kingdom into the Hands of the English. Mean while, the new Duke of Burgundy held the Post enjoyed by the Duke his Father. That is, being Master of the King's Person, he was considered as Regent, by those who were not in obedience to the Dauphin.

Since the taking of Pontaise, the Court of France was removed, by reason of the continual Inroads of the English to the very Gates of Paris. Mean while, the Parisians saw themselves in manifest Danger. The Duke of Burgundy being wholly engrossed by Revenge, provided not for the Defence of Paris. Whereupon, the Inhabitants, justly alarmed at so dangerous a Neighbourhood, thought it their duty to try to prevent their Ruin, by an Agreement with Henry. There were several Negotiations, which ended in a separate Truce for Paris, from the 20th, to the 25th, of November (2). This was but small comfort to the Parisians: but as the Treaty between the King and the Duke of Burgundy was going to be concluded, they had no occasion for a longer Truce, since they were to be included in the Treaty. Besides, Henry did not mean to deprive himself of the Advantage, which the Neighbourhood of Pontaise gave him upon the Parisians, in case the Treaty was negotiating with the Duke of Burgundy, should be broken by some unforeseen Accident. After the Duke of Burgundy's Death, Couriers and Envoys continually passed between the King and the new Duke. Henry refused not to make the same Alliance with him, as with the deceased. But having been deceived by the Father, he would not run the hazard of being deceived by the Son. So, before he joined with him against the Dauphin, he resolved to secure a Peace with King Charles (3).

At the Congress of Meulan, Henry had limited his Pretensions to the Articles of the Treaty of Bretigny, with the addition of Normandy. But though, after the breaking up of the Conference, he had made a shew of keeping to these Terms without Relaxation, it is to be supposed, if the Duke of Burgundy's Murder had not, very seasonably, happened, he would have considerably lowered his Demands. At least, the Posture of Affairs would have left him no room, to expect to compel France ever to grant him so great Advantages. After the Death of that Duke, the Scene was changed in his favour. So, finding he was earnestly courted by Queen Isabella, and the new Duke of Burgundy, he did not question but it was in his Power, to impose upon France what Terms he pleased. He forgot therefore his Offers at Meulan, and resumed his former Pretensions to the Crown of France, with the condition that Charles IV. should be King during Life. There are the Articles, he proposed as a Foundation for Peace.

I. That he should espouse the Princess Catherine, without any Charge to her Relations, or the Kingdom.

II. That he would not disturb King Charles in the Enjoyment of the Crown, or Possession of the Revenues of the Kingdom, during her Life. That his Queen Isabella should likewise enjoy, during her Life, the Rights annexed to her Dignity.

III. That after the Death of King Charles, the Crown of France should descend to the King of England and his Heirs for ever.

IV. That by reason of King Charles's Infirmary, which rendered him incapable to reign, the King of England should take upon him the Administration of Affairs, as Regent, during the Life of the King his Father-in-law.

V. That the Princes, Nobles, Corporations, Burgesses, &c. should take an Oath to the King of England as Regent, and bind themselves by the same Oath to own him for Sovereign, after the Death of King Charles.

VI. That for Security of the Performance of these Articles, the King of France should give the King of England his Letters Patents under his Great Seal. That he should cause the like Letters of Approbation to be given him by the Queen, the Duke of Burgundy, the Nobles, &c. in clear and plain Terms, as should be agreed by the Parties.

VII. That the King of England would give and cause to be given the like Letters.

Henry's Pretensions being thus settled in these few fundamental Articles, the Duke of Burgundy signed Letters Patents (4), whereby he approved of these Articles as good, beneficial, reasonable, and tending to the Welfare of France and all Christendom. This done, a general Truce was published from the 24th of December to the 1st of March next. As soon as the Affair concerning the Peace was ended, the Plenipotentiaries of the King and the Duke of Burgundy signed a private Treaty of Alliance, containing these six Articles:

I. That one of the King's Brothers should marry a Sister (5) of the Duke of Burgundy.

II. That the King and Duke should love and assist one another like Brothers.

III. That they should jointly endeavour to punish the Dauphin, and his Accomplices in the late Duke of Bur-gundy's Murder.

IV. That if the Dauphin, or any of the Murderers, were taken Prisoners, they should not be released without the Duke of Burgundy's Consent.

V. That the King of England should cause to be affigned to the Duke, and his Dutches, Daughter of King Charles, Lands adjoining to his Demains in France, of

VI. That if any Person hereafter, under colour of his Marriage with a Daughter of France, should claim the like Assignment of Lands; the Duke should assist the King to the utmost of his Power to prevent it.

1420. This Treaty was ratified by the two Princes in the beginning of January (2) 1420.

Though the Peace was not yet signed, it was looked upon as concluded, since the Terms were agreed. Henry was so secure of it, that January the 24th, that is, four Months before the signing of the Treaty, he promised by his Letters Patents, to maintain the Parisians in their Privileges when King of France.

Mean while, as it was necessary to draw the Articles agreed in the most exact Form, and to avoid all obscure and ambiguous Expressions, it required some time; this occasioned the Truce to be frequently prolonged. During that time, Henry had Ambassadors at Troye, to draw up the Treaty of Peace jointly with the Duke of Burgundy.

For the greater Precaution, it was first digested like Preliminary Articles, that every one might examine what was to be added, retrenched, or explained. This done, Charles confirmed all the Articles by his Letters Patents, dated April the 9th. It is remarkable, that by the XXI, Henry was to swear, that upon no occasion whatever, during the Life of King Charles, he would take upon him the Title of King of France. And yet we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, one of his Ordinances, dated April 18, for coining new Money in Normandy, with an H on one Side, and these Words round it: Sit Nomen Domini Benedictum; and on the other, Henricus Francorum Rex (3).

After the Preliminaries were approved, an Interview between the two Kings was agreed, for swearing and signing the Treaty. This Interview was to be somewhere near Troye: But afterwards Henry consented it should be in Troye itself. As King Charles was not fit to appear in publick, the Queen and the Duke of Burgundy were empowered to swear the Peace in his Name. Henry being come to Troye (4), May the 20th, found there the King of France, the Queen and the Princess Catherine, to whom he presented a Ring of great Value. On the morrow, the Treaty was signed and sworn with the usual Formalities; and the same Day Henry was affianced to the Princess, but the Marriage was not consummated till the 2d of June. The Substance of this famous Treaty was as follows:

TREATY of TROYE.

Treaty of Troye. p. 846.

"I. THE King of England being now Son of the King of France, by his Marriage with the Princess Catherine, shall honour the King and Queen of France, as his Father and Mother, &c.

"II. He shall not disturb the King of France during his Life, in the quiet possession of the Royal Dignity, and Revenues of the Crown. In like manner, Queen Isabella, whilst the lives, shall enjoy the Royal Dignity, with the Rents, Revenues, Honours and Prerogatives belonging to the Queen of France.

"III. Queen Catherine shall have for her Dowry in England, forty thousand Crowns a Year, as the Queens of that Nation usually had.

"VI. After the Death of King Charles, the Crown of France, with all its Rights and Dominions shall remain to the King of England and his Heirs.

"VIII. The Parliament of Paris shall be maintained in their Jurisdiction over the Places subject to the King.

"IX. The King of England shall preserve the Privileges, Rights, Liberties, Immunities and Customs of the Peers, Nobles, Communities, and of all the King's Subjects in general.

"X. Justice shall be administered according to the Laws, Customs and Usages of the Realm.

"XI. All the Offices, as well civil as military, shall be filled with Persons duly qualified, according to the Laws of the Realm.

"XII. The King of England shall endeavour to the utmost of his Power, to reduce to the Obedience of the King, all the Provinces, Cities, and Towns, which have withdrawn their Allegiance, and joined the Party, commonly called the Dauphin's or Armagnac's.

"XIII. All the Princes, Peers, Barons, Nobles, States, as well Spiritual as Temporal, Cities, Communities, Burghers, &c. shall swear, 1. Punctually to observe what shall be enjoined by the two Kings and the present Queen. 2. To obey the King of England as Regent. 3. To recognize him after the Death of King Charles for their lawful Sovereign, and to obey none but him. 4. Not to assist, with their Counsel or Consent, any Plot against his Person, and to discover to him all such Conspiracies as shall come to their Knowledge.

"XIV. All the Conquests which shall be made hereafter, in the Kingdom of France, Normandy excepted, shall be to the use of the present King. Item, All the Lands and Lordships, which shall be conquered, shall be restored to their true Proprietors, being in Obedience to the King, and having sworn to observe the present Treaty.

"XV. All the Ecclesiasticks of Normandy, subject to the King of England, and paying Obedience to King Charles, or that are of the Burgundian Party, upon swearing the present Treaty, shall enjoy their Benefices, as well in Normandy, as elsewhere.

"XVI. All the Norman Ecclesiasticks holding Benefices in France, shall be continued in them upon the same Terms.

"XVII. The Universities and Colleges, as well in Normandy, as in France, shall be preserved in their Rights and Privileges, on the fore-mentioned Conditions, saving to the Crown of France its Prerogatives.

"XVIII. When the King of England shall come to the Crown of France, Normandy and all his other Conquests shall be united to the Crown.

"XIX. If the King of England has already disposed in Normandy of any Lands, Revenues, or Possessions, belonging to any of the Burgundian Party, they shall have an Equivalent in France, out of the Lands of the Rebels. And if they receive not this Equivalent, before the said King is in possession of the Crown of France, he promises to give it, when he ascends the Throne. But what he has not disposed of, shall be restored to the Proprietors, according to Article XIV.

"XX. All the publick Acts shall run in King Charles's Name. However, as some unforeseen Cases may occur, where the King of England may be obliged to dispatch Orders, then it shall be lawful for him to join his Name, as Regent, with the present King's.

"XXI. The King of England shall forebear, on all occasions, during the Life of King Charles, to assume the Title of King of France.

"XXII. In the publick Acts, the King of France, speaking of the King of England, shall use this Form, Our most dear Son, Henry King of England, Heir of France (5).

"XXIII. The King of England shall lay no Taxes on the French, but such as are reasonable, and for the good of the publick, according to the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom.

"XXIV. When he himself, or any of his Heirs, shall come to the Crown of France, the two Kingdoms of France and England shall be for ever united, under one Prince. There shall not be a King in each Kingdom; but one and the same King shall be Sovereign of both the Realms, without however subjecting one to the other: But the Laws and Liberties of each Kingdom shall be preserved distinct and inviolable.

"XXV. Henceforward, Friendship and a good Understanding shall be established between France and Eng-

"XXXI. The King of England shall likewise give the same for himself, for the Princes his Brothers, the rest of the Princes of the Blood, and others, as the King of France shall require.

Given at Troye, May the 21st, in the Year of our Lord 1420, and of King Charles the 40th.

The Marriage being consummated (3) June the 2d, the two Courts set out together next Morning for Sens, which was now invested. This Place holding out but ten or twelve days, the Army marched to Montreux, where the Duke of Burgundy was murdered, and took the Town in a short time. The Duke of Burgundy found there the Body of his Father, very indecently buried in his Douillet, and ordered it to be removed to Dijon.

About the middle of July, the Lord De Barbazan, the Governor, four Months. The King of England, with his Army, was lodged on the Side of the Town, towards Galiesti, and the Duke of Burgundy, with his Troops, on the Side next La Brie. This Siege became famous by the stout defence of the Belieged (4), who repulsed several Assaults, and whom Famine compelled at last to capitulate, about the middle of November. A French Historian says, the Capitulation was not observed, by which the Garrison were to have their Lives without Ranfom, except such as were concerned in the murder of the Duke of Burgundy; but instead of being suffered to depart, they were thrown into Prison at Paris, and starved to death.

To judge of the Truth of this Fact, it is necessary to see the Articles of Surrender, and to know, whether those that were carried to Paris, were not such as were expressly excepted. It is the more likely, they were really of this Number, because the same Author says, the King, and the Duke of Burgundy, demanded four and twenty Hostages by Name, and that these Hostages were conveyed to Paris, with as many more as could be seized. This seems to argue, that the Garrison were released, and none but private Persons seized, who might be suspected, as well as the Hostages, of being concerned in the Duke of Burgundy's Death. Be this as it will, as Henry ought not to be excused in case of Breach of Faith, so neither ought a too hasty Credit to be given to a single Historian, who agrees, in other respects, exceeding partial against Henry, and even refrains not from abusive Language.

After the Surrender of Melun, the two Courts returned to Paris, where the two Kings made their Entry together, on the first Sunday in Advent, and the Queens, the next Day.

In the beginning of December, the States General met at Paris. King Charles going to the Affirmity on the 6th, told them, that of his own free Will, he had made a Peace with the King of England, was persuaded it would be beneficial to France, and desired them to confirm it by their Authority. The King's Declaration in his present Condition, was not a sufficient Reason to induce the States to ratify a Peace, which, according to their Principles, violated the most sacred Rights of the Kingdom, in order to set the Crown on the Head of a foreign Prince. But in the State they themselves were in, it was scarce in their Power to examine the Consequences, or freely to speak their Minds. So it was unanimously resolved, that the Peace of Troye should be observed, and held as a public Law, and that all the French should be obliged to take the Oaths mentioned in the Treaty. This is not a proper Place to examine Henry's Pretensions to the Crown of France. They were the same as were formerly urged by Edward III, and of which I have amply spoken in the History of his Reign. But however, it may be said, that when the French swore to this Peace, they thought it very unjust, and consequently there could be but little Reliance on Oaths, which they considered as involuntary. Accordingly, they plainly showed afterwards, they valued them not. And yet Henry, with all his Policy, depended upon these extorted Promises, as if the French then living, had been more scrupulous, than those who had sworn to the Peace of Brétigny.

On the 23d of the same Month, King Charles's Council being summoned for the Purpose, the Duke of Burgundy appeared in a Mourning Habit, and demanded Justice against the Murderers of the Duke his Father. Mezerei says, the Dauphin was solemnly called to the Marble-Table (5), and not appearing, was attainted and convicted of causing the Duke of Burgundy to be killed; pronounced unworthy of all Inheritance, particularly of the Succession to the Crown (6); and banished the Realm for ever. It is hard to believe, such a Historian would advance such a Fact, without good Authority. And yet this Sentence, which is extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts, mentions neither the Succession to the Crown, nor the Banishment of the Dauphin. The Sentence is general, against all the Murderers of the Duke of Burgundy, without naming the Dauphin, or his Accomplices, at least in the Preamble. It is true, that in the Preamble, there is mention of the Treaty between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy, and that afterwards it is said, the Duke of Burgundy was killed by him; which Words, by him, manifestly relate to the Dauphin, named a few Lines before. It appears however, that the Sentence was so worded, that the Dauphin was included only in the general Notion of the Murderers of the Duke of Burgundy (7), and that it does not seem to point particularly at him. Consequently, it was not natural to speak of the Succession to the Crown. Probably therefore, Mezerei had more regard to the Intent of the Decree, than to the Words themselves.

The Dauphin finding all sorts of means were used to deprive him of the Crown, appealed to God and his Sword, from whatever had been hitherto, or should be for the future, transacted against him, in the Name of the King his Father, and continued still to assume the Title of Regent. As such, he removed the Parliament and University of Paris, to Poitiers, where some of the Members of these two Bodies repaired. Thus were seen at the same time in France, two Kings, two Queens, two Regents, all the Officers of the Crown double, seven or eight Marshals of France on each Side, two Parliaments, and two Universities of Paris (8).

Though Henry was declared Regent, and Heir of France, it was however only by the Burgundian Party, who having the King in their Power, thought they had a Right to dispose of the Affairs of the Kingdom. The Dauphin had still a strong Party, who, far from submitting to the Peace of Troye, maintained, that though the King had been free, and in perfect health, he could not dispose of the Crown as he had done, much less, being disarmed, and a Captive. The Provinces distant from Paris, not being awed by the English Arms, adhered for the most part to the Dauphin. Even the Country about the Metropolis was divided. In the same Province, there were some Places for the English, and others for the lawful Heir of the King. So, notwithstanding the Peace, the War was not yet ended, since the two Kings were under a necessity of driving the Dauphin out of all the Towns 1421. and Provinces, he possessed. This was no easy Task, though the Union of the English Forces, with the Burgundian Party, gave them a great Superiority.

Guienne, part of which was subject to Henry, was moreover a very considerable Advantage, as it served to keep in Awe the Provinces beyond the Loire. Till the death of Armagnac the Countable, this Province had rather been a Charge, than a Benefit to the English. There was a constant occasion for a standing Army, to defend it against the continual Attempts of the Party, which had declared for France, about the end of the Reign of Edward III. The Houses of Armagnac and Albret, who were at the head of this Party, had created the King of England great Trouble, particularly after the Earl of Armagnac came to have the Management of the publick Affairs. But after the death of that Earl, the Heads of the Party thought fit, as I said, to make a Truce with Henry, in order not to favour the Duke of Burgundy by their Diversion. After the Treaty of Troyes, they used for Peace, as believing they could no longer resist. Henry hoping to reap great Advantages by the quiet possession of Guienne, readily received them into Favour, and ordered Letters of Pardon to be given them (1), upon their re-nouncing, by a publick Instrument, the Appeal of their Ancestors, to the Court of the Peers of France, in the Time of Edward III. Some say, that by the Peace of Troyes, Guienne was to be united to the Crown of France, after the death of Charles VI. But, besides that in the Treaty of Troyes, there is no mention of Guienne, it plainly appears, by what has been related, that Henry had no such Intention. It is rather evident, that he grounded on the Treaty of Bratigny, his preferring as King of England, the Sovereignty of Guienne, independent on the Crown of France.

Henry having settled his Affairs in France, in so glorious a manner, for himself and his Nation, resolved to return into England, where three Things required his Presence. First, his Queen's Coronation. Secondly, the Confirmation of the Peace of Troyes by the Parliament, and the Demand of a Supply of Money, to enable him vigorously to carry on the War against the Dauphin. Lastly, the Necessity of taking some Measures against the Scots, who had sent Succours to his Enemy, under the Command of the Earl of Buchan, the Regent's Son. Upon leaving France, Henry gave the Command of his Troops to the Duke of Clarence his Brother (2). Then he set sail with his Queen, and safely arrived in England about the end of February. A few days after, the Queen was crowned (3), and a Parliament summoned to meet at Leicester the 2d of May.

Whilst the People were busy in chusing their Representatives, the King took a Progress into several Counties, and stayed some Weeks at York. His Aim was, under colour of showing the Queen the Country, to procure by his Presence, Elections of Members that should be favourable to him. He was sensible of the Nation's discontent, at being obliged to bear the Expences of the Conquest of France. Some say, it was during this Progress, that the King issued a Proclamation, prohibiting the Admission of Ecclesiastics into Benefices, by the Pope's Provisions, contrary to the Rights of the Patrons. But it is more likely, this Proclamation was not issued till after the Parliament of Leicester, pursuant to an Act made for that purpose. Be this as it will, it was a mortal Blow to the Court of Rome, to whom the Clause of Non-oblante, so frequently used by the Pope, became fruitless, at least, with regard to the Collation of Benefices.

Before the meeting of the Parliament, Henry received the bad News, that the Duke of Clarence his Brother, was slain, April the 3d, in a Battle in Anjou. The Duke had led ten thousand Men into that Province, to reduce it to the Obedience of the King. Whilst he was employed in this Expedition, he heard, that the Earl of Buchan, with seven thousand Scots, had entered the Province, and was encamped at Baugé. At the same time, he had false Intelligence, that the Vanguard of the Scotch Army was so far from the main Body, that it would be easy to put them to rout, provided they were speedily attacked. Upon this Information, he hastily headed his Horse, leaving the Earl of Salisbury Orders to follow him, with the rest of the Army. When he came to Baugé, he found indeed some Scotch Troops intrenched in the Church-yard. He charged them immediately, and dismounted in order to head his Troops. But he was so long in forcing the Scots from this Post, that the Earl of Buchan had time to come to their Relief. Then the Duke remounting his Horse, furiously attacked the newcomers, notwithstanding the inequality of his Forces. He gave, on this occasion, Proofs of an uncommon Valour; but at length, being over-powered by Numbers, and unable to bear the thoughts of flying, he was wounded in the Face by a Scotch Knight (4), and killed by the Earl of Buchan himself. His death caused an entire defeat of the English Horse, whereof fifteen hundred were slain (5), and many taken Prisoners (6). Among the slain were, the Earl of Kent, the Lords Grey and Rofs, and several other Officers of Distinction. The Earl of Salisbury, not being able to advance in time to assist the Duke of Clarence, had however the Comfort to recover from the Enemy, the Body of that Prince, which he sent to the King his Brother (7).

The Advantage gained by the Scots, rendered the King's Preference necessary in France. But he had still in England some Affairs, which were no less urgent. The Parliament meeting the 2d of May, readily confirmed the Peace of Troyes so glorious to England. A Subsidy was also granted (8) for prosecuting the War against the Dauphin; but at the same time was presented to him a Petition, wherein he was told, it was but too true, that the Conquest of France proved the ruin of England. To obtain this Subsidy, the King had laid before the Parliament, a State of the Revenues and Expences of the Crown. By this Account, a Fragment whereof is inserted in the Collection of the Publick Acts, it appears, that the King's Revenue, amounted but to fifty five thousand seven hundred and forty-three Pounds Sterling; and that the ordinary Expences ran away with fifty two thousand two hundred and thirty-five Pounds; so there remained but three thousand five hundred and eight Pounds, to provide for a Dozen extraordinary Articles, mentioned in the Account. The Parliament's Petition could not but be very displeasing to the King. One half of France was still unconquered, and the Provinces subject to the King were so drained, that there was no Prospect of drawing from thence, the necessary Supplies for continuing the War. Wherefore, the Burden was still to fall upon England. But the Parliament grew weary of furnishing Money, at a time, when it was more necessary than ever, by reason of the Diversion, the Kingdom was threatened with from the Scots.

I have deferred till now, to speak of the Affairs of Scotland, because since the Accession of Henry V. to the Crown of England, nothing had passed in Scotland, remarkable enough to break the Thread of the History. But at present, it will be necessary briefly to mention them, for the understanding of the Sequel. It was seen in the late Reign, that in 1406, James Stuart, then Prince of Scotland, was detained in England, and shortly after became King of Scotland, by the Death of his Father. This new Dignity was so far from turning to his Advantage, that it rather served to cause him to be more strictly guarded. The Duke of Albany his Uncle, who had assumed the Regency, liked it too well, to endeavour effectually to procure his Liberty. Not a Year passed, but he sent Ambassadors into England (9), under colour of soliciting the Freedom of the King's Nephew; but his real Intention was far from what he seemed to desire.

The chief Motive of these frequent Embassies, was to negotiate the Exchange of the Earl of Fife, his Son for young Percy, Son of the Earl of Northumberland. The Earl had been Prisoner in England, ever since the Battle of Halidon: Percy was seized in Scotland by way of Ransom for the King. This Exchange was effectual, and yet the Embassies were no less frequent. It was ever on pretence of treating about the young King's Release, but in reality to influence the King of England, to detain him in Prison. Buchanan affirms, it was on condition the Regent would engage not to disturb Henry, by Diversions in favour of France. Otherwise, the Scots would never have so peaceably seen France attacked by the English. Mean while, as to induce the Scots to remain quiet contrary to their Interest, it was necessary to give

AD. Pub. IX p. 299; 302, 303, 307, 310. In 1415, whilst Henry was preparing to pass into France, he received Advice from the Northern Frontiers; that the Scots were resolved to besiege Berwick, with sixty thousand Men; whereupon the Duke of Bedford, had Orders to levy an Army. But it does not appear, either that the Scots did then besiege Berwick; or the Duke of Bedford marched against them. The English Historians say, the King, upon the above-mentioned Advice, called a Council, to deliberate, whether it was proper to relinquish the intended Project against France, and heartily apply to the Conquest of Scotland; and that it was resolved the first design should be pursued (1). This may be; but, very probably, the King was then agreed with the Duke of Albany; and the Rumour of the Invasion; and the Meeting of the Council in England, was only to make the People of Scotland believe, the Regent acted with Sincerity. And indeed, we do not find in the History of Scotland any Signs of so considerable an Armament, in the Year 1415, or of a Resolution to besiege Berwick. Besides, that very Year a Truce was concluded between the two Kingdoms, whilst all Henry's Forces were employed in France. In short, Buchanan affirms, it cannot be said, that during the whole Reign of Henry V, there was any War between England and Scotland; all the Hostilities being nothing else but mere Robberies. He alleges as a Reason, that the Duke of Albany took care not to disoblige the King of England, for fear the King of Scotland should be released. Henry was however afraid; it would not always be in the Regent's Power to keep the Scots quiet, who were so much concerned to prevent the Ruin of France. It was doubtless from this Consideration, that in 1416, he gave King James leave to pass some time in his own Kingdom, having taken Security for his Return. He hoped this Journey would create between the Uncle and Nephew such Diffentions, as would divert the Scots from all Thoughts of assisting France.

14 p. 341, 417. The Affairs of Scotland, continued in this Posture till 1419, when the Dauphin sent thither the Duke of Vendôme to desire Assistance. The States being met upon this Occasion, the Regent could not hinder the decreeing a Levy of seven thousand Men, which were sent into France under the Command of the Earl of Buchan. The Victory that General gained over the Duke of Clarence at Baugé, procured him the Sword of Constable of France.

AD. Pub. X. p. 125. Henry could not without concern see the Scots declare so openly for the Dauphin. He perceived, either that the Duke of Albany had not the same Credit as formerly, or had altered his Maxims. Wherefore, to break the measures of the Dauphin's Adherents in Scotland, he believed it necessary to gain the King of Scotland to his Interest, and make him his Instrument. This was partly his design in returning to England. Upon his Arrival, he intimated to that Prince, that it was his own Fault if he was not at Liberty, on condition he would use his Authority to recall his Subjects, who were in the Service of France, and join with him against the Dauphin. James passionately longing to be free, after a fifteen Years Captivity, very readily complied with Henry's desires. A private Agreement therefore was made between these two Princes, the Articles whereof are unknown, except one, which was, that James should go into France, and stay with Henry, until the end of the War. Henry's Aim was to interpose the King of Scotland's Authority, to oblige the seven thousand Scots in the Dauphin's Service to return Home. Accordingly, James attended him into France for that Purpose. But when he commanded the Earl of Buchan to return into Scotland, the Earl replied, he did not think himself bound to obey him, so long as he was in the Power of others. For that reason, Henry from thenceforward treated as Rebels, all the Scots that fell into his Hands.

AD. Pub. X. p. 108, 116, 127, 129. Henry having finished the Affairs which called him into England, left his Queen there, great with Child; and appointing the Duke of Bedford, his Brother, Regent in his Absence, returned into France, where his Presence was necessary. He sailed the 10th of June with a new-raised Army (2); amounting, as some say, to four thousand Men at Arms, and twenty-four thousand Archers. When he arrived at Calais, he sent several Detachments to take some Castles, the Dauphin still held in Picardy. At the same time, he ordered a considerable Body to march to the Duke of Exeter's Relief, who was almost blocked up in Paris. Then marching himself with the rest of the Army, he came to Bois de Vincennes, from whence he went and joined his Father-in-law at Paris.

A few days after, he heard the Dauphin was before Chartres, and began to batter the Town. As he desired nothing so earnestly as to decide the Quarrel by a Battle, he immediately assembled his Troops, and marched directly to Chartres. But his Forces were so superior, that the Dauphin did not think fit to expect him. Henry pursued him with all possible Speed; but finding he could not overtake him, attacked Dreux, which surrendered upon Terms (3). It is said, that during this Siege, a Hermit came and boldly reproached him with the Calamities brought on France by his Ambition, and threatened him with the Judgements of God. Some add, that Henry's Death; which happened the next Year, showed the Hermit to be inspired. But such Consequences are not always just.

After the Siege of Dreux, the Army being seized with the Flux, Henry sent his Troops into Summer-Quarters, and refreshed himself at Paris. He re-embarked the Sea in October, in order to Besiege Meaux, though the Season was not very proper for such an Undertaking. Meaux, and some others, are mistaken in saying, this Siege was laid before the King went to England. It is certain, it was not begun till four Months after his Return (4). The same Historians say further, this Place held out three Months, but he should have said seven; since the Siege began the 6th of October 1421, and ended not till the 2d of May 1422. It is true; as the Town was divided into two Parts; namely, the Town and the Market-Place (5), the first was taken by Storm during the Winter; but the Market-Place held out till May (6).

Whilst the King was employed in the Siege of Meaux, he received the agreeable News of his Queen's being safely delivered at Windsor, of a Prince (7), who was named Henry. The Duke of Bedford, and the Bishop of Winchester stood Godfathers, and Jaqueline Countess of Hainault, Godmother. This Prince, who had undertaken under her Dominion, Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Frisland, was married first to John Duke of Touraine, second Son of the King of France. This Prince dying in 1416, she espoused John Duke of Brabant, Cousin-German to the Duke of Burgundy. She soon grew weary of her second Husband, and under colour of their being too nearly related, formed a design to have the Marriage annulled. For that purpose, she procured some Knights to carry her away, and convey her into England, in order to act more freely. This pretended Rape, was no secret to the King, since we find in the Collection of the Public Acts, a safe Conduct for this Princess. Besides, at her Arrival in England, the King assigned her a monthly Pension of a hundred Pounds Sterling. His intent, was to marry her to the Duke of Gloucester, and by that means, put his Brother in possession of four of the noblest Provinces of the Low-Countries. The Duke of Burgundy, was extremely offended at the King's disregard for the Duke of Brabant his Cousin, in giving Jaqueline a Refuge in his Dominions. This affront in his Opinion, reflected upon himself. Besides, it was his Interest, that Jaqueline's Marriage with the Duke of Brabant, should not be annulled. Mean while, Henry preferring the Duke of Gloucester's Interest, to the Duke of Burgundy's, did not seem much to mind the occasion of Complaint given that Prince.

Henry was exceeding desirous of advancing his two Brothers, who were both Princes of great Merit, and with whom he was well pleased. In 1419, there was a secret Negotiation between him, and Joan Queen of Naples, who being pressed by her Enemies, promised to adopt the Duke of Bedford, and declare him her sole Heir. This Project failing, upon Queen Joan's Affairs taking a new Turn, Henry would have obtained for the Duke of Bedford, the only Daughter of Frederic Burgrave of Nuremberg, and afterwards, a Daughter of the Duke of

In fine, an opportunity offering to procure for this Prince, Jaqueline Countess of Hainault, he readily embraced it, as this Marriage could not but be advantageous to England. But, as her Marriage with the Duke of Burgundy, was first to be annulled, this Affair could not be accomplished before the King's Death.

It was not till the beginning of May (1) 1422, that the Be sieged of the Market-Place of Meaux, desired to capitulate, but they could obtain no other Capitulation, than to be Prisoners of War. The King even excepted all the English, Irish, and Scotts, who were in the Place, and all that were concerned in the Death of the Duke of Burgundy; and moreover, all those who had any Towns or Castles in their Power, till they were surrendered. In fine, he relieved four Officers of the Garrison, namely, Lewis du Guast, Dennis de Vaurus, the Bastard of Vaurus, and another, to be proceeded against according to the Justice of the Laws. They were all four executed. Du Guast was beheaded, and the other three suffered a more ignominious Death. The Bastard of Vaurus, was hanged on a certain Tree, from him called the Tree of Vaurus, because he had hanged on it many Burgundians, in revenge for the Death of the Earl of Armagnac. This was a severe Capitulation, which gave the Be sieged Cause to repent of their Obstinacy, when probably, they had no prospect of being relieved (2).

About the time of the surrender of Meaux (3), Queen Catherine arrived from England, attended by the Duke of Bedford, who had left the Regency to the Duke of Gloucester his Brother. The two Courts joining at Bais de Vincennes, went from thence soon after, to keep the Whitsun Holidays at Paris. Henry lodged in the Louvre, and Charles in the Palace of St. Pal, where he had but a small Court, whilst the Regent-King's was numerous and splendid. On Whitsunday, they dined together in public, the two Kings and the two Queens, with Crowns on their Heads. Those of the French, who had any Regard left for their Country, could not without Grief behold the King of England, though paying an outward Deference to the King his Father-in-law, ruling France with an absolute Power. Their Discontent was still increased by a Tax (4), imposed by Henry, for coining a new sort of Money. The Parisians loudly murmured, but to no purpose. Their Condition was very different, from what it was a few Years before, when their Adherence to one of the Parties decided the Fate of both.

Whilst Henry was preparing to renew the Campaign, interrupted by the Queen's Arrival, News came, that the Dauphin had taken La Charité, which opened him a Passage over the Loire. Shortly after, Advice was brought, that he was besieging Cogné upon the same River, and the Be sieged had capitulated to surrender, unless relieved by the Duke of Burgundy before the 18th of August. The Duke finding his Honour engaged to relieve that Place, desired the King to send him a Re-inforcement; to which the King answered, he would come himself, and accordingly soon immediately to march at the Head of his Army. But whilst he was plying himself with the hopes of a Victory, that would render him Master of all France, he was seized with a Flux (5), which obliged him to stay at Senlis. However, for fear his Illness should hinder Cogné from being relieved, he ordered the Duke of Burgundy, with the best Part of his Troops (6), to join the Duke of Burgundy. The Dauphin hearing of their Junction, and being too weak to give them Battle, retired, and the two Dukes, having nothing more to do there, marched towards Troye. Mean time Henry, hoping his Distemper would wear off, after resting a little at Senlis, had taken Litter in order to go and head the Army. But his Illness still increasing, he resolved at length to return to Paris.

The Duke of Bedford, Learning of the State the King was in, departed immediately from Troye, to come to him. He found him at the Point of Death, but expecting his approaching Dissolution with great Pain. Before he resigned his last Breath, he sent for the Dukes of Bedford and Exeter, the Earl of Warwick, with seven or eight English Lords, to give them his last Instructions. He told them, "His Reign had been short, but glorious, though his Pretensions to France, had cost a great effusion of Blood, it could not be less to his Charge, since nothing but Force could have induced the French to a reasonable Peace. For his part, he beheld the approach of Death without Concern; but could not help lamenting the Fate of the Prince his Son, who, by reason of his Age, was incapable of finishing a Work so happily begun: Wherefore he conjured them, for God's Sake, to remain in strict Union, for the Service of the Infant-Prince, who was going to be their King; to take Care of his Education, and to give the Queen all the Consolation that lay in their Power, and for which she had too great Occasion. He added, his last Advice to them was, to cultivate diligently the Duke of Burgundy's Friendship, and to take care not to release the Prisoners of Aincourt, till his Son was of Age to hold the Reins of the Government himself. In case they thought proper to conclude a Peace, it should not be, without securing the Sovereignty of Normandy to the Crown of England. He concluded with saying, it was his desire, the Duke of Bedford should take upon him the Administration of the Affairs of France, and the Duke of Gloucester be Protector of England, during his Son's Minority.

Having spoken these Words, he asked his Physicians how long they thought he had to live. Upon which, one of them said, kneeling, with Tears in his Eyes, that without a Miracle, he could not live above two Hours. This terrible Sentence giving him no manner of Concern, he sent for his Confessor, and having made his Confession, ordered his Chaplains to read the seven penitential Psalms. When they came to these Words of the 51st, Build thou the Walls of Jerusalem, he interrupted them, and declared, "upon the Truth of a dying Prince, that, after having settled a firm Peace in France, he really intended to wage War upon the Infidels, for the recovery of Jerusalem out of their Hands." The Moment they had finished their Devotion, this great Prince expired on the 31st of August, in the thirty fourth Year of his Age, after a triumphant Reign of nine Years, five Months and eleven Days. His Body was brought into England, and buried at Windsor, among his Ancestors, with a Funeral Pomp suitable to the Grandeur he enjoyed whilst alive, and to the Esteem conceived of him by his Subjects. His Queen, to honour, in a particular manner, the Memory of so illustrious a spouse, caused to be laid on his Tomb, a Statue of Silver gilt, as large as the Life, and extremely like him (7).

If, to know this Monarch's Character, we follow, without Examination, the Praises bestowed on him by the Authors of his Nation, we must imagine him the most accomplished Prince, that ever appeared in the World before him. Not an English Historian ascribes to him the least Defect, but all unanimously speak of him as a perfect Hero. On the other hand, the French have endeavoured to shade his Portraiture with certain strokes, that sully the Luster. It will be necessary therefore, in order to form a just Idea of him, to consider his Actions with their Circumstances, independently of the Admiration of the one, and the Envy of the other.

1422. the Good and Happiness of his People. Nevertheless, in this very Thing, he was guilty of Excess, since, contrary to his own Inclination, and the dictates of his Reason, he consented to the Persecution of the Lollards, out of pure Condescension to the Clergy. Indeed, it was almost impossible, that, being endued with an excellent Judgment, he should not perceive the groundlessness of the Accusations against them, in the beginning of his Reign. And yet, rather than publicly retract, he still feigned to believe it true, at the very time when he pardoned some condemned Persons, who persisted in a denial of the pretended Crime.

But it is not chiefly for what he acted in England, that Historians have been so lavish of their Praises: his warlike Exploits are the principal Subject of his Panegyrick. And yet, to speak without Aggravation, he was, perhaps, in no respect less remarkable, notwithstanding the glorious Success that attended his Arms. The Conquest of France, considered in it self, has something grand and marvellous. But the Description of the Affairs of that Kingdom, renders it, doubtless, not so wonderful, as it appears, when abstracted from all its Circumstances. Lewis VIII., Father of St. Lewis, conquered England in a like Juncture, and yet no one ever thought solely to ascribe the Conquest to his Wisdom or Valour. Henry projected his Enterprize, at a time when the Civil Difficulties of the French, rendered them unable to defend themselves. The Towns he took, were defended only by the Besieged themselves, without any Army ever appearing to relieve them. However, some of these Places stopped him several Months, and were surrendered only by Famine.

The Battle of Azincourt, is then the great, and almost sole warlike Exploit, which can justly afford Matter for Panegyrick. In this famous Action, he gave Proofs of an uncommon Conduct, Resolution, and Bravery. But this very Battle, the Success whereof was so glorious, gives likewise occasion to tax him with Imprudence. It may be said, that if he was victorious, it was, because he had reduced himself to an absolute Necessity, of vanquishing or dying, to which a General never exposes himself, whatever the Event may be, without causing his Conduct to be severely censured. His undertaking to retire to Calais, without foreseeing the difficulties of the March, and without being secure of a Passage over the Somme; his Willfulness in resolving to pass that River, in order to force his way through an Army, so superior in Number to his own, seem excusable, only by the Success of the Battle of Azincourt, which was a sort of Miracle. Had he been vanquished, as he should naturally have been, he would have been infallibly charged with Indiscretion or Rashness. The Necessity he was reduced to, during his March, if we may believe the French Historians, of offering to restore Harfleur, and repair the Damages he had caused to France, shows, how much he himself was convinced of his Error. This Battle therefore was more glorious for him, on account of his personal Valour, than with regard to his military Capacity. It must be confessed, never did Prince expose himself more in a Battle, and give more signal Proofs of true Valour, than did Henry in that Action.

As for his other Conquests in France, I do not know, whether his greatest Admirers have reason to wish he had met with more opposition. What might have happened in that case, is beyond humane Knowledge. It cannot however be denied, that the Victory of Azincourt prepossessed us in his favour. But what may be extolled in him, without danger of being deceived, is the Excellency of his Genius, and the Solidity of his Judgment. He knew how to manage the great Undertaking he had formed, with wonderful Address, wisely improving the several Revolutions in France, and making them all turn to his Advantage. Few Princes would have stopped like him, after so glorious a Victory as that of Azincourt, and preferred a repose, which, though seemingly less glorious than the Continuation of the War, was in reality to him more advantageous. This Policy, in my Opinion, is one of the brightest Passages of his Life, and best shows the soundness of his Judgment. His Negotiations with the Dauphin, and the Duke of Burgundy at the same time, and his Instructions to his Ambassadors, are plain Indications of his Abilities, and how difficult it was to deceive him.

It is not very strange, that the prosperous Success of his Undertakings, should gain him extraordinary Praises from the Nation, especially, as it cannot be denied, that this Success was no less owing to his prudent Conduct, than to favorable Junctures. In general, he forced the French to own him for Regent and Heir of their Kingdom. And this is one of those Actions, which seldom fail of being praised beyond Measure. Accordingly, Historians have not been satisfied with comparing him to David, Alexander, and Cæsar, but have ranked him above these great Men. But however, without going so far for Comparisons, which, after all, seem not very just, methinks he might, with more reason, be put in Parallel with Edward III., his Great Grandfather. However, I should hardly scruple to give the Preference to Edward III. Edward had to deal with all France united against him, and the difficulties he encountered in his Conquests, were incomparably greater, and required an abler Head to mount them, than those which opposed the Progress of Henry V.

What I have been saying of this Prince, properly relates only to his principal Action, namely, his War with France. I shall now describe his other Qualifications; which, though not so glaring, are no less worthy of Admiration, than the glorious Successes, which have almost wholly engrossed the attention of the Publick. It is certain, he had all the Endowments of Body and Mind requisite to form a great Man. His Stature was tall and majestick, though a little too slender, and long-necked. His Hair was Black, and his Eyes, of the same Colour, were exceeding lively. He was strong and robust, very expert in all bodily Exercises, chaste, temperate, at least after he came to the Crown, injured to Hardships, and patient of Hunger and Thirst, Heat and Cold. In all this he was a standing Example to his Troops, of Moderation and Constancy. He was a great lover of Justice, following it himself, and causing it to be punctually observed. Religious without Disguise, persevering in Piety, and constant in his private, as well as publick Devotions; A great Protector of the Church and Clergy, he won by these Qualities, the Esteem and Affection of the Ecclesiastics, who did not a little contribute to heighten the Lustre of his Glory. He was prudent in Council, bold in undertaking, and resolute in executing. As for his Valour, he gave continual Proofs of it through the whole Course of his Life. There is another Thing likewise, for which he ought to be praised. He caused military Discipline to re-flourish, which was almost entirely neglected in England, since the Reign of Edward III. Never did the English Nation shine with such Lustre, as under this renowned Prince. To this may be added, he was so fortunate, as to end his Days in the midst of his Prosperity, and not see, with Edward III., the Fruits of all his Labours destroyed.

Having related what is said by the English, to this Prince's Advantage, the faithfulness of an Historian requires, that some Failings, cast upon him by the French, and aggravated perhaps by Malice and Envy, are not passed over in Silence. In the first Place, they tax him with Cruelty, and making War in a barbarous Manner. They ground this Charge, not only upon the Slaughter of the Prisoners at the Battle of Azincourt, but also upon his putting to death several Officers, after the taking of Caen, Melun, and Meaux. But as to the Prisoners of Azincourt, there is no doubt, but the Maxims of War, and the Necessity of providing for his own Safety, will justify his Orders upon that account, supposing they were not too hasty. As for his treatment of the Burglers and Garrisons of the conquered Places, I confess, it is not impossible, but he might be something swayed by Revenge, by reason of the Time these brave Men made him lose; but this can only be said by Conjecture. That he used Severity towards some is certain, but his Motives are unknown. To discuss such Facts, more Circumstances are required, than are come to our Knowledge. However, with regard to those of Meaux, they are known to have incurred the Guilt of several Murders, for which, doubtless, they deserved to be punished. It was neither unjust nor barbarous, to hang the Boastard of Vaurus, on the same Tree, whereon he himself had hanged all the Duke of Burgundy's Adherents, that fell into his Hands. For the other three, executed at the same time, I know not the Reason; but it is to be presumed, they were not capriciously chosen from all the rest of the Garrison, to be Instances of the Severity of the Conquerors. As for the English and Irish, who were in the Service of his Enemies, their being excepted in the Capitulation, needs no Apology. It were to be wished, for Henry's Reputation, that he could be as easily justified, in refusing to give quarter to the Scots, on pretence, they would not obey their King, who was actually his Prisoner.

The French accuse moreover this Prince of excessive Pride, even to the causing, as they assure us, the Marshall de P. de Penho P. de Penho de P. de Penho Adam to be committed to the Bastille, for daring to look in his Face when speaking to him (1). It is true, if he had no other Reason, this was a high Strain of Haughtiness

(1) King Henry, who had little Esteem for him, did not treat him with such Favour as he shewed to the other Officers, as appeared upon occasion of the Marshall's coming to him one Day for Instructions: His Majesty seeing him in a very plain Coat, said to him in Rallery, Hon. L'Adm. Adam.

1422. Haughtiness and Rigour. But can it be denied, that a Look, a bare Gesture, may be sometimes very offensive? And who knows, but the Marshal, as he spoke, uttered some aggravating Circumstance, or such Expression, which rendered him worthy of Chastisement, and which has been indifferently concealed, to make the King's Action appear the more odious?

Avarice is another Failing, wherewith he is confidently reproached. It is pretended, that after he was declared Regent and Heir of France, he was never countifful, either to any of the Burgundian Party, who had served him, or to those of the Dauphin's, who voluntarily submitted to him. I shall not undertake to clear him from this Charge, as it does not appear, that he was very liberal to the English themselves, who served him, whether by reason of his great Expence, or, because he was otherwise inclined. Though he had many good Officers, and excellent Generals, we do not find, that he rewarded them according to their Merit and Services. We must however, except the Earl of Dorset, to whom he assigned a Pension of a thousand Pounds a Year, when he created him Earl of Exeter; Earl of to whom he gave a considerable Estate near Harfleur; the Capital of Buch, of the House of Fois, who had the Lordship of Longueville; and the Earl of Salisbury, to whom he gave the Earldom of Perche. But after all, very possibly, Henry's want of liberality, was the effect of his Prudence. I have observed, that the Revenue of the Crown, amounted but to Fifty-six thousand Pounds, and that he was forced to pawn his Jewels, to supply what the Sums, granted him by Parliament, wanted to defray the Charges of the War. Was it proper to appear liberal in such Circumstances? Upon many occasions, it were to be wished, Sovereigns would moderate their Bounties, which are but too often, at the Expence of the poor People.

Lastly, An unbounded Ambition is a Failing, which the French think may justly be laid to his Charge. To know whether this Accusation be well-grounded, it should be examined, whether he was in the right to renew, or rather to continue, a War against France, occasioned by her Breach of the Treaty of Breigny, in the year 1419. But this Inquiry would be needless, if it had not been said upon this Subject in the Reign of Richard II., to which recourse may be had. However, it cannot be denied, that Henry was very ambitious. His first motive was only to restore the Peace of France. But when he saw a possibility of mounting the Throne of France, his Ambition carried him, beyond the Bounds prescribed to himself in the beginning of the War. I have taken notice of his Intent, to make one of his Brothers King of Naples, and the other, of Sicily, and of his using, certainly, no very honorable means, to procure the Duke of Gloucester four Provinces of the Low Countries. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, he had a design to purchase the Duchy of Luxemburg of the Emperor Sigismund, and to treat with him concerning his pretended Claim to the Dauphiné. In fine, it farther appears, he would have paid the Ransom of a Lord of the House of Brabant, Prisoner to the Marquis of Baden, probably, to assert one Day the Pretensions of that House to the Duchy of Luxemburg.

By Catherine of France his Queen, Henry left but one Son of his own Name, about eight or nine Months old. The Queen his Widow, forgetting she had been Wife of so great a Prince, and was descended from the most illustrious House of Europe, married some time after, Owen Tudor, a Welsh Gentleman, not without giving great Offence both to the English and French. It is pretended, this Gentleman was descended from the ancient Kings of Wales; but I do not know whether this Descent be well proved (2). Owen Tudor had by the Queen three Sons, namely, Edmund, Jasper, and Owen (3). The eldest married Margaret, only Daughter of John Beaufort Duke of Somerset, Grandson of John of Gant Duke of Lancaster, and Catherine Ret his third Wife. He was Father of Henry VII., whom we shall see hereafter mount the Throne, and leave it to his Posterity.

Charles VI., King of France, survived Henry but two Months. The Death of these two Monarchs is going to open a Scene very different from what we have seen (4).

Adam, in this the Garb of a Marshal of France? To which he replied with an Air of Confidence, That he had it made to wear in the Boat which brought him down the Seine. The Answer was displeasing from the manner of delivering it, and King Henry was provoked to say, You are too rude in your Behaviour, Sir; how dare you look on a King in that bold manner? Sir, replied the Marshal, It is the Fashion of my Country, where, if one Minjacks to answer, though the greatest on Earth, with a downcast Look, we think him conscious of some Baseness or Guilt. Your Customs, said the King, are very different from ours. The next Year, the Marshal was displaced from his Office, and committed close Prisoner by the King's Order, for some Misdemeanors. Monfréid, P. de Pessin. Godwin, p. 280.

It was also this King that first instituted Garter King at Arms, and made several Regulations about the honourable Order of the Garter, which the curious Reader may see in Adams's Letters, &c. of the Garter, p. 252, &c. He also appointed a new Herald, by the Title of Agent at Arms. Rymer's Fed. Tom. 9. p. 702.

In the Ninth of Henry V., a Pound Weight of Gold, of the old Standard, was to make by Tale fifty Nobles, or a hundred half Nobles, or two hundred quarter Nobles, amounting to sixteen Pounds, thirteen Shillings and Four-pence in Tale. And a Pound Weight of the same old Standard, was to make by Tale, ninety Groats or Groats, or a hundred and eighty half Groats, or three hundred and sixty Sterlings, or seven hundred and twenty Mailes, or fourteen hundred and forty Farthings, amounting to thirty Shillings. Bartholomew Goldbeater was Master and Worker. This King's Role-Noble is inscribed, HENRIC DI GRA REX ANGL ET FRANC DNS HIB. the King standing in a Ship, holding in his Right hand a Sword, in the Left a Shield, with the Arms of France and England, the Flower-de-lis being strictly three; he being the first that bore them so. Reverse, INC AVTEM TRANSIENS PER MEDIUM ILLOKV. IBAT. a Cross Fleury, with four Fleurs-de-lis, and as many Lions passant; each under a Crown above, and three Pellets below; within the Center of the Cross, in a Rose the Letter H, the whole within a large Rose. Evlin's Description of his Role-Noble, belongs to his Son's Angel. There was also Gold-Money stamped at Paris, and in Normandy, by Henry V., called Solar's, bearing the Angel's Salutation of the Blessed Virgin, (the one holding the Arms of England, the other of France) with the King's Title; and, on the Reverse, CHRISTVS VINCI. CHRISTVS SIGNAT. CHRISTVS IMPERAT. which we find, very little altered, upon some of the earliest Pistols of Louis XIV. The Legend indeed belongs to France, and De Fresse reckons the Salut amongst the proper Coins of that Country. The King's Gold Coins were so defaced, that it was necessary to order, that they should be re-coined at the Tower gratis. His Silver Money was mostly (as the Statue directed) coined at Paris, though some of his Pieces have CIVITAS LONDON, in the inner Circle of the Reverse. His Silver Coins are supposed to be distinguished (chiefly) from those of Henry IV., by two little Circles, or Eyelet Holes, deeply impressed below the Face, on each side the Neck, which are answered by two more, in the middle of two Triangles of Globules in the Quarters of the Cross, on the Reverse. See the Fig. There was also white Money coined by this King in France, after the Victory of Azincourt; his Style being then REX ANGLIE ET HERES FRANCIE. These Blacks, says Sir Edward Coke, were valued at Eight-pence, and because of their Balancé, were denoted Gally-bell-pence, Saxins and Dorkyns, and prohibited by Act of Parliament. Coke's Inst. l. 3. c. 30. p. 92.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XII.

The Reign of HENRY VI; With a Dissertation on the MAID of ORLEANS.

15. HENRY VI, Surnamed of WINDSOR.

1422.
He was crowned in England to maintain young Henry's Rights in France.

HENRY V, when within view of his End, seemed to have been taken out of the World by a particular direction of divine Providence, which is sometimes pleased to stop the best concerted Undertakings, when just going to be accomplished. The Peace of Troye not being yet firmly settled, and the Prince who was to mount the Throne, but an Infant of nine Months, every thing seemed to concur to take from the English the hopes, of seeing the two Kingdoms of France and England united under a King of their Nation. But on the other hand, the noble Qualities of the Dukes of Bedford and Glocester, Brothers of the deceased King, encouraged the most timorous. How great soever the Loss might be, it was not thought irreparable, since the Valour, Experience, and Wisdom of these two Princes, enabled them to support the new King's Minority. Instead therefore of being disheartened at so terrible a Blow, they showed, by proclaiming young Henry King of England, and Heir of France, that they were determined to maintain what the King his Father had so gloriously established.

The Duke of Glocester had governed the Kingdom by the Title of Guardian, ever since the Duke of Bedford his elder Brother attended the Queen into France. But this Dignity being inconsistent with a King actually present in his Kingdom, ceased the Moment young Henry was proclaimed (1). It is true, the late King had ordered upon his Death-Bed, that during his Son's Minority, the Duke of Glocester should be Regent, or Protector in England. But this was not a sufficient Warrant to exercise that important Office. The Parliament's Confirmation was also requisite. For that, and some no less urgent Reasons, the Council speedily summoned a Parliament for the 9th of November. Till the two Houses should settle the Form of Government, during the King's Minority, the Council, whereof the Duke of Glocester was President, issued all necessary Orders for whatever would not admit of delay.

A few Days after, the Council was informed of some Motions (2) in Wales, and the neighbouring Counties, which might be attended with ill Consequences. Very likely, as the Earl of March had great Interest in those parts, some of his most zealous Adherents designed to raise Commotions, in order to try, at such a Juncture, to revive the Earl's Claim to the Crown. It may at least be presumed, these Motions seemed to be of great Moment, since, besides the Orders of the Council to the Sheriffs, Commissioners were appointed to put them in execution.

During the time between the calling of the Parliament, died King Charles VI at Paris, the 21st of October, having survived Henry V, his Son-in-law, but fifty five Days. His Death entirely changed the Face of Affairs. It was not doubted that the Dauphin would take the Title of King of France, and exert his utmost to procure the Possession of a Crown, which he deemed fallen to him by the Death of the King his Father. Whilst Charles VI was alive, many of his Subjects thought it their duty to obey him, without inquiring, whether what he did was conformable to the Laws, and beneficial to the State, because, their Oath to him was not conditional. But after his Death, they believed it no less incumbent upon them, to acknowledge the Dauphin his Son, for Sovereign, notwithstanding the Peace of Troye, which deprived him of his Right. Indeed, that Peace bore but too visible Marks of Seduction and Violence, to be considered by true Frenchmen, as a fundamental and inviolable Law, though many that believed it very unjust, had been forced to approve it. So the Dauphin, who, in the latter Years of the King his Father, might, in some measure, be counted a Rebel, was upon better Terms, when he could assume the Title of Sovereign.

1432. These Considerations obliged the Duke of Bedford, who continued in France, seriously to reflect on the possible ill Consequences of this Change, and to seek means to prevent them. Charles VI had no sooner closed his Eyes, but the Duke ordered Henry to be proclaimed King of France, and pursuant to the Will of the late King his Brother, took himself the Title of Regent. Then he broke the Great Seal, and caused a new one to be made, with the Arms of France and England, and the Effigies of the young King holding a Sceptre in each hand.

The Succession to the Crown of France being settled by the Peace of Troye, the Regent thought he might, upon that Foundation, and without a new Consent of the States, put the King his Nephew in possession of the Kingdom. Wherefore, contenting himself with assembling at Paris all the great Men of the English Party, he made a Speech, exhorting them to recognize young Henry for their Sovereign. He insisted on the Peace of Troye, and their Oath to maintain it, and endeavoured to convince them, it was for their own, as well as the Kingdom's Interest, inviolably to observe it. This done, all that were present swore Allegiance to Henry, and did Homage to him, in the Person of the Regent, for the Lands they held of the Crown. The same thing was afterwards required of those that were absent, and of the Towns in subjection to the English.

This Ceremony being ended, the Regent, the Council of France, and City of Paris sent Deputies to London, of whom the Bishop of Teroenne was the Chief, to congratulate the young King upon his Accession to the Crowns of the two Kingdoms. At the same time, the Deputies had Orders to go by the Low-Countries, and exhort the Duke of Burgundy to remain firm to the Alliance. It was feared, the Death of Henry V, and of Charles VI, might cause him to alter his Measures.

Whilst the Duke of Bedford was taking all necessary Precautions to settle the Affairs of the King his Nephew, the Dauphin was no less intent upon his. He was at Espaly, a House belonging to the Bishop of Puy, when he heard of his Father's Death. He shed many Tears at the News, whereby Nature roused herself upon the occasion, or he had really ever preserved an Affection for a Father, who was not to be blamed for the Mischiefs he had done him. The first Day he appeared in Mourning, but on the morrow put on Scarlet, and was proclaimed King of France, with all the Solemnity the Circumstances of his Court, and the place he was in, would permit. After that, he came to Poitiers, where he had removed the Parliament of Paris. He was crowned here, in the beginning of November, because the City of Rheims, where the Coronation of the Kings of France is usually performed, was in the hands of the English.

Thus Henry VI and Charles VII assumed, both at the same time, the Title of King of France, and disputed with each other the possession of the Throne thirty Years. This renders the History of the present Reign so interwoven with That of France, that they cannot possibly be separated. The English were bent to preserve for their young King, the Crown of France, acquired by his Father's Labours, and of which they believed his Ancestors to have been unjustly deprived. On the other hand, Charles meant likewise to take possession of the same Crown, which it was designed to wrest from him, and which, in his Opinion, he held not so much from the King his Father, seduced by ill Counsels, as from a long Train of Ancestors, who had enjoyed it before him. This important Quarrel produced numberless Events, which to be well understood, require an exact Knowledge of the State of the Affairs of both Kings, in the beginning of their Reigns. It is no less requisite to know the Persons that managed the Affairs, as well Civil as Military, of the two Kingdoms. In short, to perceive wherein consisted the Advantages and Disadvantages of each King, during this tedious War, it will be absolutely necessary to have a general Idea of the then State of France, with regard to the Assistance each might have, as well from the Princes and Vassals of the Crown, as from Foreigners. This Review seems to me indispensable, in order to avoid the Obscurity, which would incessantly occur, in a mixt Recital of so many various Events.

First then, for the Persons of the two Kings, Charles was one and twenty Years old (1), and Henry but an Infant of nine Months. However, in this very thing the Advantage was on Henry's Side, whose Affairs were managed by two Uncles of great Abilities, and by the wisest Council then in Europe. On the contrary, Charles, who never passed for an extraordinary Genius, was, by reason of his Age, more difficult to be ruled; his Passions frequently hindering him from following the best Advice. To the time he assumed the Title of King, he had distinguished himself neither by his Valour nor Conduct. More prone to Pleasures than War, he appeared very unfit to reform the Affairs of the French Monarchy, which was upon the Brink of Destruction. The Duke of Burgundy's Murder, committed in his presence, and doubtless by his Orders, had raised disadvantageous Prejudices against him. He had not been more scrupulous, with regard to the Duke of Bretagne his Brother-in-law. This Prince, whom the Earls of Pontevre, by a notorious Treachery, had carried away by Force, and long detained in Prison, came to know, after his Deliverance, that the Plot was contrived against him with the Dauphin's Privy and Consent. And therefore, it might be said, it was not Charles's Fault, that the Duke of Bretagne had not undergone the same Fate with the Duke of Burgundy. These things made a deep Wound in his Reputation, which was not otherwise supported by any bright Virtue or Action. All that could be said to his Advantage, was, that he had not meanly stooped to his Enemies. But it did not require a great Genius, to refuse running into manifest Destruction.

As to the Forces of the two Kings, it is easy to see, that Henry had greatly the Advantage of his Rival, since, with what he possessed in France, he had moreover all England on his Side. France was then so divided between them, that each had whole Provinces under his Obedience, and in others, each had fortified Towns and Adherents. In the Provinces thus divided, there was scarce a walled Town, but what had a Garrison for one or other. And this rendered them, above thirty Years, the Seat of the War.

Charles was possessed of all Languedoc, from whence he had lately expelled the Earl of Foix, whilst Henry V was employed in the Siege of Melun, and had appointed for Governor the Earl of Clemon, eldest Son of the Duke of Bourbon. From that time, the Earl of Foix had in vain attempted to recover that Province.

The Dauphin, was likewise entirely subject to Charles, who possessed also Berry, Auvergne, Touraine, part of Saintonge, the City of Rochel and Poitou. Besides these Provinces, he considered as Countries dependent of him, Provence, Maine, and Anjou, for reasons mentioned hereafter.

Henry was in possession of Normandy and Guienne, the richest Provinces of the Kingdom. Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, and the Isle of France belonged to him, excepting a few Places, which still held out for King Charles. In a word, he was Master of Paris, the Metropolis of the Kingdom, which alone was equivalent to a great and rich Province. He could moreover rely on the two Burgundies, Flanders, and Artois, which belonged to the Duke of Burgundy, his Vassal and Ally.

From what has been said, it is easy to perceive, that the War might be carried on in all the Provinces of France, Bretagne excepted, which hitherto had stood Neuter. But there were some Places more exposed than others to the Fury of the Sword, as Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, and the Isle of France. The reason is, because the English, before all things, would clear these Provinces of King Charles's Garrisons, in order to attack him afterwards beyond the Loire, without being forced to leave any thing behind them. For the same reason, it was Charles's Interest to prosecute the War in the same Provinces, to prevent his Enemies from carrying their Conquests into the Southern Provinces, which were his last Refuge.

After seeing the Disposition of the Provinces, it will be necessary to examine that of the French Princes, immediate Vassals of the Crown. And first of the Duke of Bretagne.

Ever since the beginning of the War, John V, Duke of Bretagne, had stood Neuter, without concerning himself in a Quarrel, which could not fail of drawing the War into his Country, if he had been so ill-advised, as to declare for either of the Kings. But after the Peace of Troye was signed and sworn, he believed it no longer possible to continue in a State of Neutrality. Charles VI, and Henry V, being united by the Peace, and there being but one King of France, he could not help acknowledging him, unless he would openly join with the Dauphin. But such a Proceeding would have been very imprudent, since the Dauphin was so low, that there was little appearance of his ever recovering. Upon these accounts, as soon as the Duke saw the two Kings united, he sent Henry V word, he was ready to sign the Peace of Troye, and do Homage for his Dutchy to King Charles. This Negotiation, though begun in 1420, could not be ended before Henry's Death. Probably, the Duke of Bretagne prolonged it, on purpose to see how the War against the Dauphin would go. Be this as it will, Henry dying before this Affair was finished, the Duke of Bre-

(1) P. Daniel says, he was but in the twentieth Year of his Age. Vol. VI. p. 1.

1422. signe saw himself in the same State, as before the Peace of Troye, that is, at liberty to chuse his Side, or stand Neuter, according as he should be determined by the Events. There was however one strong reason for his not siding with the Dauphin, and that was, the discovery of the Dauphin's being deeply concerned in the Conspiracy of the Pontificians. Nevertheless, preferring the Peace of his Subjects, to the pleasure of Revenge, he had not thought proper to declare for England.

The State of the Earl of Richemont.

Arthur, Earl of Richemont, Brother to the Duke of Bretagne, was taken Prisoner at Azincourt in 1415, and carried into England, where he remained till 1420. Mean while, the Duke his Brother being seized by the Pontificians, he desired King Henry's leave, to go and endeavour to free him. Leave was granted him upon certain Conditions, namely, That on Michaelmas-day 1422, Arthur should return to London, and appear before the King, or his Successor, the Lord Chancellor, or the Mayor of London.

Ad. Pub. X. p. 58, 46.

That during the Term of his Enlargement, he should make no Alliance with the Dauphin, or any other Person whatever, against the King of England, or the Duke of Burgundy; neither should he attempt any thing contrary to the Peace of Troye.

That Alan de Raben, the Duke of Bretagne's Lieutenant, the States and Barons of the Country, should promise the same Thing, during the Earl's Absence from England.

For Security of these Conditions, the Earl of Montfort was to be delivered to the King, whom he promised to restore, upon the Earl of Richemont's return to London.

The Earl ratified and swore all these Articles, and then departed for Bretagne. The Death of Henry V. happening a Month before the Expiration of his Leave, instead of returning into England, according to his Oath, he still remained at the Duke his Brother's Court, who was freed from his Imprisonment. Thus, at the time of Charles VI's death, he was really Prisoner of the English, though he was not actually in their Power; and moreover, liable to the reproach of Breach of Faith. Some have thought to justify him, by saying, he only stood bound to the Person of Henry V. and therefore, upon that Monarch's decease, believed himself freed from his Oath. But this pretended Limitation of his Engagement, is destroyed by the forementioned Articles.

H.B. of Charles VII. by J. B. J. Tom. I. p. 195.

Besides the Duke of Bretagne's Disposition with respect to the two rival Kings, he was moreover prompted to side with the English, by the Earl of Richemont his Brother, who had a great Influence over him. Arthur not only thereby designed to free himself from his Engagement, but had also other Views, which shall be mentioned hereafter. It may therefore be said, that though the Duke of Bretagne stood Neuter, or was desirous of still passing for such, he was however upon the Point of declaring for England.

State of the Duke of Burgundy.

As for the Duke of Burgundy, there is no occasion to repeat here his Reasons to remain firm to the Alliance of the English. It will suffice to say, that he did not think the death of the Duke his Father sufficiently revenged, whilst Charles enjoyed any part of France.

Of the Duke of Anjou King of Sicily.

Lewis III, Duke of Anjou, and King of Sicily, who was possessed in France, of Provence, Anjou, and Maine, was entirely in the Interest of King Charles his Brother-in-law. But he had been some time employed at Naples, in securing the Inheritance of Joan II, Queen of that Country, who had adopted him for her Son. In his Absence, Violante of Aragon, his Mother, had the Administration of Affairs, and remained firmly attached to King Charles her Son-in-law.

Of the Earl of Foix and his Brothers. Oblig. Hist. of Foix and Bearn.

The House of Foix made then a very great Figure in the Kingdom (1). Matthew of Cosslebon, Earl of Foix, and Sovereign of Bearn, dying without Issue in 1399, Elizabeth his Sister, Wife of Archibald de Graillet, Capital of Buch in Guienne, took possession of his Dominions. Charles VI attempted to deprive the Capital and his Wife of this noble Inheritance, but they found means to keep possession. Archibald died in 1413, leaving five Sons, all of distinguished Merit. John, the eldest, was Earl of Foix and Bigorre, and Sovereign of Bearn. Gaston, who bore the Title of Capital of Buch, adhered to Henry V, who made him Knight of the Garter, and Earl of Longueville. From him sprung the House of Candale. Archibald, Lord of Noailles, the third Son, was killed on Montreux Bridge, with the Duke of Burgundy. Mat- thew the fourth Brother, married the Heiress of Cominge. 1422. We shall see hereafter, that a Quarrel between him and his Wife, caused the Country of Cominge, to fall into the Hands of Charles VII. Peter the youngest, was at first a Franciscan Friar, then Bishop of Lescar, and at last Cardinal, and Legate à Latere in France, under the Pontificate of Martin V. He founded the College of Foix at Toulouse.

Hence it appears, that the House of Foix was very considerable, as well for Extent of Dominion in the southern Parts of France, as for the Merit of the four Brothers, whereof it consisted. The Neighbourhood of Guienne obliged the Earls of Foix, to pay great regard to the Kings of England, who were Masters of that Dukedom. Foix, Bearn, and Bigorre, could with ease be invaded by so powerful Neighbours, and with difficulty be assisted by the Kings of France. Besides, the Capital of Buch, and the Earl of Cominge, were Vassals of the King of England. An ancient Quarrel between the House of Foix, and the Earls of Armagnac, was a farther Inducement to that House, to continue under the Protection of the English, and the Duke of Burgundy, sworn Enemy of the Armagnacs. These Considerations led Henry V, when he entered upon the Regency of France, to give the Government of Langue-doc (2) to the Earl of Foix. He made an Agreement with the Earl, to find a considerable Number of Troops (3); to keep that Province in Obedience to Charles VI. He was, as has been shewn, expelled by the Dauphin, and the Earl of Clermont put in his room. Immediately after the death of Henry V, the Earl of Foix renewed the Agreement with his Successor, who made him Governor again. But it was not in his power to dispossess the Earl of Clermont. Afterwards, the Earl of Foix, seeing England did not observe the Agreement, sided with King Charles. But in the beginning of the present Reign, he and his two Brothers openly declared for the English.

Ad. Pub. X. p. 49, 70, 176-191.

On the other hand, the Houses of Armagnac and Albret, very powerful in Guienne, declared for Charles VII, tho', a little before, they had complied with the Times, and made their Peace with Henry V.

Of Armagnac and Albret. Ib. p. 274, 276.

The House of Orleans consisted of two Princes, Charles of the Duke of Orleans, and John Earl of Angoulême his Brother, both Prisoners in England. The first had been there ever since the Battle of Azincourt in 1415. The second was given in Hostage to the Duke of Cleves in 1412, for Security of the payment of the English Troops, sent by King Henry IV, to assist the Princes in League against the Duke of Burgundy. These two Princes being Prisoners, were, as to their Persons, neither serviceable nor hurtful to either of the two Parties, but their strong Towns were at the disposal of King Charles. Some affirm, that the Duke of Orleans made a Treaty with Henry V, whereby, in consideration of a great Pension paid yearly for his Expence, he obtained of that Monarch, a Neutrality for his City of Orleans, and all his other Places. But this pretended Treaty is only a Chimera, since the Foundation on which it is built, namely, the Pension, had never any Existence. The ninth and tenth Volumes of the Publick Acts of England, are full of Papers concerning the Duke of Orleans; and yet, among so great a Number, there is not one that gives the least Intimation of this Pension, much less of the pretended Treaty. Besides, it is not very likely, that Henry V, should, in the Time of his Prosperity, grant such a Neutrality, for Places situated in the Heart of a Kingdom, he was undertaking to conquer.

Of the Duke of Alençon. Ib. p. 276.

John Duke of Alençon, about thirteen or fourteen Years old, Son of the Duke of Alençon, slain in the Battle of Azincourt, began to give Tokens of an uncommon Valour and Conduct, which caused him to be looked upon as a Prince of great hopes. He was firmly attached to King Charles's Side, as well as Peter his Bastard-Brother, who passed for one of the stoutest Warriors in the Kingdom.

Charles d'Artois, Earl of Eu, was Prisoner in England, ever since the Battle of Azincourt. As he was not released till 1434, he made no Figure in France, the first Years of this Reign.

Of the Earl of Bourbon. Ib. p. 276.

John Duke of Bourbon, Head of the illustrious House of Bourbon, which was divided into several Branches (4), was Prisoner in England since the Year 1415. So, though he was a Prince of great Merit, he had no Share in the Transactions of France. But the Earl of Clermont, his Francis Poissin, by marrying the Heiress of Navarre, added that King's Domain to France in 1479. And by Joisey of Barrois, Duke of Vendôme, marrying Jean, Heiress of this House, became King of Navarre, Earl of Foix, and Sovereign of Bearn, whose Son Henry II, King of Navarre, &c. succeeded to the Crown of France in 1589, being Grandfather to Lewis XIV, late King of France.

1422. eldest Son, firmly adhered to King Charles, with all his Father's Towns.

Lewis Earl of Vendôme, of the House of Bourbon, was likewise Prisoner in England, since the Battle of Azincourt. It is true, he agreed with Henry V for his Ransom, whereof he had even paid Part; but as he could not raise the rest, was not yet released. The French Authors say, that in 1423, he miraculously escaped out of Captivity, and in Memory thereof, instituted an annual Procession at Vendôme. I know not the manner of his Escape; but find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that in May 1423, he was taken out of the Tower of London, by the King's Order, and delivered to Sir John Cornwall, who took him Prisoner at the Battle of Azincourt; that in July of the same Year, he obtained Leave to go into France, to provide the rest of his Ransom, that, upon Payment of the whole, he might have his Liberty. In all likelihood, he fully satisfied the King, for it does not appear, that he was re-demanded. So, I do not see what Miracle there could be in his Escape, unless it was his misfortune of his Pass-port, in which Case the Miracle would not be very great. But however, he might institute a Procession at Vendôme, in memory of his eighteen Years Captivity.

Having spoken of the Princes of the Royal Family of France, it will be proper to mention the other Lords and Generals, in the Service of King Charles.

The Earl of Buchan (1) a Scotchman, Son of the Regent of Scotland, and First-Cousin to King James I, was Constable of France; a Dignity conferred on him by the Dauphin, after the Battle of Baugé.

Among the other Generals, the most considerable were, the Marshals de La Fayette, and de Souras, Andrew de Laval Lord of Lohac, John d'Harcourt Earl of Aumale, John de la Haye Lord of Cologne, Culennes, afterwards High-Admiral, Amyr Viscount of Narbonne, Potho of Kantailles, Stephen de la Hire, surnamed Vignoles, Graville, and some others of an inferior Rank, or less Note. To these I add, the Bastard of Orleans, natural Brother of the Duke of that Name, though as yet, he did but begin to appear, because he rendered himself very famous in the History of this Reign.

After the Generals, it will be further necessary to say something of the most eminent Persons, belonging to the Court of the new King. I have already spoken of the Person and Qualities of King Charles. Mary of Anjou, his Queen, was a Princess of exceeding great Beauty, but much more valuable for her extraordinary Merit. And yet, he loved her not as he ought, and as she deserved, being continually drawn aside by other Amours, which possessed in his Heart the Place, she ought to have held. How mortifying to the King's Coldness might be, she bore it with great Constancy, without the least Murmur, or Reproach; still hoping to gain his Affection by her Patience, Moderation, and dutiful Behaviour. If this Conduct was not capable of inspiring the King, with a Tenderness for so accomplished a Spouse, it commanded at least all his Esteem, and forced him to shew it, by consulting her generally, in his most important Affairs.

Violante of Arragon Queen of Sicily, and Mother of the Queen, was commonly at Charles's Court, where her Merit and Capacity gave her great Credit.

Tannegui du Châtel was the King's chief Favorite. It was he that first struck the late Duke of Burgundy, on Montreuil Bridge. It was not doubted, that, as he was the first in executing, so he had been the principal in advising, that detestable Treachery. However, all the French Writers represent him as a very honest Man. I do not know, how that Character can be reconciled with such an Action, which, let what will be said, was but too premeditated.

Lowet, President of Provence, was the next in the King's Favor. He had the Management of the Finances. As he was very covetous and ambitious, he generally preferred his own, to his Master's Interests. He is said to be one of the Advisers of the Duke of Burgundy's Murder. On the other hand, the Duke of Bretagne considered this Minister, as well as d'Avougar, another of Charles's Courtiers, as the chief Authors of the Pontevrian Conspiracy, because they had prevailed with the Dauphin to approve it.

La Trimouille, of a very ancient Family, was in great Favor with the King, though not in so great as Du Châtelet La Trimouille and Lowet. He was very ambitious, and notwithstanding his high Birth, regularly made his Court to the Favorites, in order to increase his Credit.

De Giac, and the Camus de Beau-lieu, Creatures of De Giac and Beau-lieu, were considerable at Court, by reason of their Patron's Interest.

These were the most noted Persons of Charles's Court, which usually was not very numerous. Most of the Princes of the Blood were Prisoners in England, and the other great Men found it more advantageous to follow the Army; the King's Circumstances not affording them any great Prospect at Court.

I shall now consider the chief Managers of the publick Affairs of the English, both at Court and in the Army.

John Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, under the young King his Nephew, was the most accomplished Prince then in Europe. Wise, judicious, of great Valour, Solidity, and Penetration, Master of his Passions, and of a Genius, superior to all employed by him, he seemed born for a Throne, though Providence had ranked him among Subjects. To all these Qualities he added a majestic State-liness, which became his Birth, and high Rank in France, and in England. But this he never carried beyond what was necessary to command a due Respect and Regard, for his Person and Authority. To sum up his Character in a Word, he was perfectly like the late King his Brother, and in all his Actions took him for Pattern. He had with him in France, the Earls of Warwick (2), Salisbury (3), Arundel (4), the Dukes of Somerfet (5), Falstaff (6), Talbot (7), and many others, all eminent for their Valour and Experience in the Art of War. The French Authors who have writ the Life of Charles VII, seldom speak of these Generals, without an honorable Epithet. For my part, I shall only mention these illustrious Persons. Their Names became so famous in the History of those Days, that all the Encomiums I can bestow on them, would be no Addition to their Glory and Reputation.

The Duke of Burgundy had, at the same time, three Generals of Generals, whom I shall rank among the English, because they were in the Service of the same Prince. Their Actions well deserve an honourable Mention.

The first was John de Luxembourg, Earl of Ligny, Son Earl of Voleran de Luxembourg, Constable of France. This General signalized himself, during the whole War.

Lisfe-Adam, Marshal of France, was a bold and enterprising Warrior, and withal, capable of managing the most difficult Undertaking. It was he, that in 1419, made the Duke of Burgundy Master of Paris. After that, incurring, by his too great Haughtiness, the Displeasure of Henry V, he was committed to the Bastille; from whence the Duke of Bedford had lately freed him, at the Duke of Burgundy's Request.

Toulounges, commonly called Marshal of Burgundy, was Toulounges in high Esteem with the Duke his Master, on account of his Valour and Parts.

I must now pass into England, and briefly mention some of the Princes, and great Men, who were chiefly concerned in the Direction of the young King's Affairs.

Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, younger Brother of the Duke of Bedford, was a Prince equally qualified for the Field and the Cabinet. His noble Endowments, improved by an extensive Knowledge of the Sciences, would have put him upon a Level with the Duke his Brother, had he been more Master of his Passions, or less ambitious and haughty. I shall have frequent occasion hereafter, to make known more fully the Character of this Prince.

The Princes of the House of Lancaster, legitimated by the Name of Beaufort, held the next Rank to the Duke of Gloucester. Thomas Beaufort Duke of Exeter, and Henry his Brother, Bishop of Winchester, were Sons of John of Gaunt, and Catherine Rast, his third Wife. John Earl of Somerfet, their elder Brother, was dead, and had left four Sons, of whom, Henry the eldest, bore the Title of Earl of Somerfet. Of the other three, Thomas, John, and Edmund, the last only was at Court, the other two being Prisoners in France (8).

York.

Richard Duke of York, Son of Richard Earl of Cambridge beheaded at Southampton in 1415, and Grandson of Edmund de Langley Duke of York, fifth Son of Edward III, was the only Male-Issue of this Family. He was very young at the time I am speaking of, but I shall have frequent occasion to mention him in the course of this Reign.

Other Lords

Humphrey Earl of Stafford, was Son of Ann of Gloucester, Daughter of the unfortunate Duke of Gloucester, whom Richard II, his Nephew, caused to be strangled at Calais.

Henry (1) Earl of Essex, Half-Brother of the Earl of Stafford, had married Isabella, Sister of the young Duke of York.

Ralph Nevill Earl of Westmoreland, was allied to the Royal Family, by his Marriage with Joan Beaufort, Sister of the Duke of Exeter, and Bishop of Winchester.

Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonshire, had for Wife a Sister of the Duke of Somerset.

Henry Talbot, had married a Sister of the Earl of Essex.

Henry Holland Earl of Huntingdon, descended from a Half-Sister of Richard II, was Prisoner in France, since the Battle of Bangi, wherein the Duke of Clarence was slain.

Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, and John Fitz-Alan Earl of Arundel, were married to Princesses of the House of March (2).

Nothing more remains, in order to give a general Knowledge of the Affairs of the two contending Kings, but to see how some foreign Princes stood affected towards them.

How the Princes of Europe were affected with regard to the two Kings.

It is very strange, that during this long War of thirty-eight Years, no Prince in Europe would be concerned in it. Immediately after the Peace of Troye, Henry V sent Ambassadors into several Parts, to make Alliances, in order to render himself so superior to the Dauphin, as to put it out of his Power to make any Resistance. But we do not find that he succeeded in this Design. If he made Alliances with some Princes, they were so worded, as did not oblige them to be Parties in this War; so that he reaped but little Advantage from thence.

The Emperor

The Emperor Sigismund might, by Virtue of his League with Henry V, have assisted his Son. But he was himself embroiled in Troubles on the account of Religion in Bohemia, which wholly employed him. The rest of the German Princes were unconcerned at what passed in France. They were not sorry to see the English and French unable, by their Diffension, to disturb their Neighbours.

Italy.

All Italy stood Neuter. The Duke of Milan alone was inclined to King Charles, but hitherto had sent him no Supplies.

Spain.

Castile, Arragon, and Portugal were in Peace, or in Truce, with the two rival Kings, and assisted Neither. Their Policy was to let them beat one another, and afterwards join with the Conqueror.

Title of

The Duke of Lorraine was inclined to King Charles, on account of the Alliance between their Families. But he durst not assist him, for fear of drawing the War into his Country.

Among all the neighbouring Princes of France, Amadeus, first Duke of Savoy, and Lewis de Chalon Prince of Orange, were those, on whom the Eyes of both Parties were chiefly fixed, by reason of the Diversions they could make in Provence and Dauphine. Mean while, these two Princes observed yet a Neutrality, pleased with being courted by both Sides. It was, however, easy to perceive, they leaned to the English, on account of the Duke of Burgundy, the Prince of Orange being his Nephew, and the Duke of Savoy his Vassal.

The Low-
Countries.

As for the Neighbours of England, there were only the Princes of the Low-Countries and the Scots, that could be so concerned in the Quarrel, as greatly to advantage, or prejudice the two Kings. The Duke of Burgundy possessed Flanders and Artois. John of Burgundy, his first Cousin, held Brabant, and the Earldom of Limbourg. Moreover, by his Marriage with Jaguelina of Bavaria, Daughter of the late Earl of Hainault, he had acquired the Sovereignty of Hainault, Holland, Zealand and Friseland. The first of these two Princes was firmly united with the English, and the other took care not to declare against them, for fear of depriving his Subjects of their advantageous Commerce with England.

As for the Scots, the War in France ought not to have been indifferent to them. It is certain, their Interest required their utmost endeavours, to stop the Progress of the English in that Kingdom. Besides their ancient Alliance, whereby they were obliged to assist the French, it was easy for them to perceive, it could not but be very dangerous to their State, to suffer the King of England to grow so very powerful. But, the private Interests of the Regent had hindered them from taking the Course, most agreeable to the Good of their Country, till at length, they sent seven thousand Men to the Dauphin. From that time, growing more and more sensible of their Error, in permitting the English to become Masters of France, they had resolved to send thither a more powerful Supply. But the Duke of Albany dying in the mean time, and Mordac his eldest Son, a Prince of a mean Genius, succeeding him in the Regency, intestine Troubles arose, which prevented the Scots from executing their Resolution. So, till the Death of Henry V, they had acted nothing in that respect, and King James was returned into England Prisoner as before.

Here I shall end this Digression, which will not appear needless, when we come to see the Relation it bears to the Events mentioned hereafter. And now having given a general Knowledge of the Affairs of the two Kings, it is time to resume the Thread of our History.

The Parliament met on the 9th of November, according to the Summons. The Duke of Gloucester, by a Patent under the Great Seal, was commissioned to hold it in the King's Name, according to the usual Practice, when the Sovereign is not in condition to be present in Person.

The Parliament's first care was to settle the Government, during the King's Minority. They nominated the Members of the Council; filled the Offices of the Crown; and gave the Great Seal to the Bishop of Durham (3), and not to the Bishop of Winchester, as some affirm. To pursue the Plan that was formed, it was necessary to appoint a Protector, who should take upon him the Administration of the publick Affairs, during the Minority. Henry V had ordered, on his Death-bed, that this high Dignity should be conferred on the Duke of Gloucester his Brother. But his Will could not be obeyed, without great Injury to the Duke of Bedford, the eldest Brother, the second Person in the Kingdom, and presumptive Heir of the Crown as long as Henry was Childless. This Prince would thereby have been below the Duke of Gloucester, his younger Brother. It is true, he was Regent of France; but very possibly, he might return into England, during so long a Minority. Wherefore, it was necessary to find some Expedient, to perform the deceased King's Will, without derogating from the elder Brother's Rights. After a serious Examination of the Affairs, the Parliament nominated the Duke of Bedford, Protector of England, Defender of the Church, and first Councillor to the King. But a Clause was added, that he should exercise this Office, only whilst in the Kingdom, without having, in his Absence, any concern in the Government. At the same time, the Protectorship was likewise conferred on the Duke of Gloucester (4), with Power, to act only in the Absence of the Duke of Gloucester. Bedford his Brother, who, upon his return into England, was to be acknowledged for sole Protector. The Protector's Salary was settled at eight thousand Marks a Year (5).

It has been seen, that the Duke of Gloucester was not so moderate, as the Duke of Bedford his Brother. He was impatient of any opposition to his Will. For this reason, the Privy-Council were always upon their Guard, to hinder his assuming a greater Authority, than his Station entituled him to. As they held not their Places of him, but of the Parliament, they were the less afraid of displeasing him, knowing it was not in his Power to remove them. Therefore, in the Council itself, there was a sort of Confederacy against him, managed by the Bishop of Winchester his Uncle. The Bishop's opposition to the Protector, ended at length in a Quarrel, the sad Effects whereof, we shall have occasion to mention in the Sequel of this Reign.

After having settled what related to the Protectorship, the Parliament appointed Governors, to take Care of the

1. Duke, the Duke of Exeter in his Title of Earl of Dorset. He was killed at St. Albans, 31 Henry VI. 4. Thomas, who is only mentioned; and 1. D. 4. Henry VI. The first of these had four Sons: 1. Henry, (from whom the present Duke of Bedford is descended) beheaded 5 Edward IV. 2. Edmund Duke of Somerset, beheaded 1471. 3. John Duke of Somerset, slain at Tewkesbury, 11 Edward IV. 4. Thomas, who died without Issue. M.D. 143. and seven Daughters.

1432. King's Person and Education. These were Thomas Beaufort Duke of Exeter, and Henry his Brother, Bishop of Winchester, both Great-Uncles of the King. I know not the Qualities of the Duke of Exeter, not having met with his Character in any Historian (1).

As for the Bishop of Winchester, he was a Prince more proper for the World and a Court, than the Church. However, he is placed by some in the Class of the Learned of those Days. After he was made Bishop of Winchester, in 1405, his principal Business was to heap up Riches; wherein he had so happily succeeded, that he was commonly reckoned the wealthiest of all the English Nobles. Henry V. his Nephew, had some regard for him, but was apprehensive of his intriguing Temper. Hence he opposed the Pope's making him a Cardinal, for fear that Dignity would give him occasion to exercise his Talents too much. The Truth is, he was a Man of Sense, and well-skilled in all the Means, Humane Prudence suggests to the Ambitious, to accomplish their Ends. His Birth, Parts, Riches, and Office of Governor to the King, gave him great Credit in the Council, and of course in all the rest of the Kingdom. In a word, he knew so well to manage his Affairs, that he had a better Interest, than the Duke of Glocester his Nephew, though Protector, and ruined him entirely.

The occasion of their Quarrel is not fully known. Some say, the Bishop, angry that the Duke of Glocester was preferred before him in the Government of the Kingdom, which he would rather have had, than that of the King, never ceased plotting to supplant him. Others on the contrary affirm, the Duke of Glocester hated him, only because he always found him ready to oppose his assuming too great an Authority, as Protector, which might in the end, prove fatal to their common Master.

Whilst the Courts of the two new Kings were equally employed in Affairs, which would not admit of Delay, the War was but faintly prosecuted in France. Besides, the Season permitted not, (after the Death of Charles VI. on the 21st of October.) great Armies to keep the Field. So, from that time, to the end of the Year 1432, the Troops of the two Kings took some Repose, in order to prepare to renew the War. There is nothing therefore remarkable in this Interval, but the taking of St. Valery, a Place of great Importance, surrendered to the English, pursuant to a Capitulation made some Months before, and of Buffi in the Earldom of Guise, by the Earl of Ligny, the Duke of Burgundy's General. On the other hand, James de Harcourt became Master of La Rue in Picardy, and La Hire of Vitry in Champagne.

The Duke of Bedford's Design, according to the late King his Brother's Project, was to reduce all the Towns Charles still held in the Isle of France, and the adjoining Provinces, that he might afterwards attack him beyond the Loire. It was the more necessary to proceed in this manner, because, so long as Charles had Places about Paris, the English durst not remove from the Metropolis, without leaving a strong Garrison, and much weakening their Armies. At the time the Regent was preparing to execute this Design, he received the ill News that Graville, one of King Charles's Captains, had taken Meulan by Storm, the 4th of January. This loss troubled him extremely, as well because it retarded the Execution of his Projects, as by reason of the Neighbourhood of Meulan, which was but six Leagues from Paris. Besides, the taking of a Place so very near him, was a sort of Affront he could hardly digest. And therefore, he determined to open the Campaign with this Siege.

Shortly after, King Charles's Troops took likewise La Ferté-Milon, a small Town between Meaux, and Seissens. But the Castle making a brave Resistance, the Marshal de L'Isle Adam had time to relieve it, and drive the French out of the Town.

In the beginning of February, the Regent himself besieged Meulan (2). As it was King Charles's Interest to keep the War in the Isle of France, and the neighbouring Provinces, he ordered the Earl of Aumale to join Stuart, who commanded the Scotch Troops, and march with him to the Relief of that Place. The French give Stuart, the Title of Constable of Scotland; but it does not appear, he was styled so by the Historians of his Nation.

I imagine, the mistake of the French sprung from their Ignorance of the English and Scotch Tongues, where the Title of Constable may be given to every Leader, or Commander in chief, of a Body of Troops, without his being, for all that, Constable of the Kingdom. Be this as it will, the Earl of Buchan, being then in Scotland, Stuart commanded the auxiliary Troops of that Kingdom. The two Generals were actually joined, but a Contest arising about the Command, they parted again without Action. Graville hearing of it, capitulated the 2d of March. The Capitulation ran, that such of the Besieged as had any Castles in their Power, should deliver them to the Regent. Pursuant to this Agreement, the Regent took possession of Marcoussis, Montlheri, and several other Places (3).

Though these Towns are of little Consequence at this Day, they were then of great Importance, chiefly on account of their lying near Paris, and keeping the English at a distance from the Loire, which was very advantageous to King Charles. For this reason he so managed, that his Adherents fortified themselves in those Parts, in all the Towns and Castles, capable of making any Resistance, in order to continue the War there. And this also was the Reason, that induced the Regent to form the Project, of clearing the Isle of France of all these Garrisons. However, he would not have opened the Campaign so early, had he not been forced to it by the loss of Meulan. He was meditating a much more important Design, which he executed immediately after the retaking of that Place.

I have observed, that the Duke of Bretagne made some Advances towards swearing the Peace of Troy, but that the death of Henry V. broke off the Negotiation. The Duke of Bedford perceiving, of what Consequence it was to the King his Nephew, to gain this Prince to his Interest, had spent the whole Winter in negotiating an Alliance with him, by the Duke of Burgundy's Mediation. This Negotiation succeeding to his Wish, he came to Amiens, where he met the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, with the Earl of Richemont his Brother. According to the Plan before formed, they signed a Treaty of League and Alliance against King Charles. To render their Union more firm, they moreover concluded two Marriages, namely, between the Duke of Bedford and Ann, sixth Sister of the Duke of Burgundy; and between the Earl of Richemont and Margaret, eldest Sister of the same Duke, and Widow of Lewis the Dauphin, who died in 1415. As the Earl of Richemont had been the means of engaging the Duke of Bretagne in this Alliance, it was very reasonable the Mediator should find his Advantage therein. The young Earl, having an extraordinary Opinion of his own Merit, his Vanity was agreeably flattered by this Marriage. Indeed, it was no small Honour for him, to espouse a Sister of the Duke of Burgundy, Widow to a Dauphin of France. But to obtain the Princess's Consent, he was forced to agree, that, according to the Custom of England, she should keep the Title of Dauphiness, because she absolutely refused to take the inferior one of Countess of Richemont. The Treaty between these Princes was concluded April the 8th.

Soon after, the Duke of Bedford went to Troy, where he consummated his Marriage. An Historian says, that the Duke of Burgundy, in case he died without Male-Issue, promised him the Earldom of Artois, but there was no occasion to perform this Engagement. In conducting his Bride to Paris, the Regent stayed some time in Champagne, to form the Siege of Pont-Sur-Seine, a small Town of that Country, which was carried by Storm. After that, he came to Paris, and lodged in the Hôtel des Tourneurs, which he had ordered to be repaired, and magnificently furnished.

In the beginning of the Year, the Earl of Salisbury had been invested with the Government of Champagne and La Brie, and had received Orders from the Regent, to clear these two Provinces of King Charles's Garrisons. This General, having taken the Field in April, besieged, or rather blockaded, Montaigu an exceeding strong Castle, seated upon a Cape, belonging to the Province of Burgundy, but running into Champagne. There were but Sixscore Men in the Castle, and yet, by reason of its Si-

This Thomas Beaufort, third Son of John de Gaunt by Katherine Swynford, was in the 6th of Henry IV. made Admiral of England, and afterwards Lord Chancellor. He was created 13 Hen. IV. Earl of Dorset; and 4 Hen. V. Duke of Exeter, i. e. Lie. He was Earl of Hereford in Normandy, and behaved with much Valour and Conduct in the French Wars, and particularly at the famous Battle of Azincourt, where he commanded the Rear-guard. He bravely defended Harfleur in Normandy, (of which he was Governor) and in a private Battle, encountered and put to flight the Earl of Armagnac. He married Margaret, Daughter of St. Thomas Becket, and had a Son by her, who 18 years young, so that leaving no Child, he departed this life at Greenwich, in 1424, and was buried at St. Edmundsbury in Suffolk, leaving his Nephew John, Earl of Somerset, his Heir, who was twenty three Years old. *Sandf. tuation, it was almost impregnable. The Earl of Salisbury having formed the Blockade, left the Earl of Suffolk (1) with some Troops, and marched himself to other Conquests. In June, he became Master of Vertus, Soissons, Epernay, and some other Places.

Mean while, King Charles, to whom the keeping of some Towns in those Parts was of great Consequence, ordered Tannegui du Châtel to relieve Montaigu. The Earl of Salisbury, who had left but few Troops before that Castle, fearing some Misfortune, posted immediately to its Assistance. He made such speed, that Tannegui du Châtel, who was now far advanced, finding himself too inferior to the English, was forced to retire into Burgundy, where the French had lately surprized Macon and Crevant, at the two Extremities of that Province. Salisbury followed, but not being able to overtake him, resolved to be- siege Crevant, a strong Place upon the Yonne, three Leagues above Auxerre.

Charles had no sooner received this News, but he ordered Stuart, who was lately reinforced from Scotland, to draw some Troops out of the neighbouring Garrisons, and join du Châtel, in order to attempt the relief of Crevant. All these Forces together, made a Body of ten thousand Men, whereof, by order of the King, the Marshal de Severac went and took the Command. But as it required some time, before they could be joined in one Body, Salisbury had sufficient leisure to take the Place. After that, not knowing yet the designs of the French, he joined Suffolk before Montaigu.

Whilst these Things passed in Burgundy, the Duke of Bedford caused Orléans to be besieged, a small Place between Paris and Montberri. The Garrison holding out six Weeks, and surrendering only at Extremity, he resolved to make them an Example, for a Terror to the other small Towns. All the Officers and Soldiers, were carried away Prisoners to Paris, and ordered to be put to death. But, happily for them, the Dukes of Bedford meeting them as they were going to Punishment, stopped the Execution, and obtained their Pardon.

Mean time, the French Army, drawn together in Auxerre, marched to Crevant, which they had not been able to relieve, and besieged it. The Army was commanded by the Marshal de Severac, who had under him du Châtel, Stuart, Ventadour, and some other Officers of Note. The Dukes Dowager of Burgundy, then at Dijon, sent immediately to the Marshal Toulangeon, and all the Burgundian Nobles, to try to relieve Crevant. At the same time, she desired the Earl of Salisbury to join her Generals, in order to raise the Siege. Salisbury was very sensible, how necessary it was to comply with the Dukes's Request, and therefore leaving part of his Troops before Montaigu, the Garrison whereof was reduced to twenty Men, repaired to Auxerre, and joined the Burgundians. Next day, they marched together to Crevant. They had in all, but six thousand Men (2), however, they were some of the best Soldiers then in Europe. The Besiegers, hearing of their March, raised the Siege in order to meet them, and posted themselves at some distance from Crevant, upon a Hill, where it was very difficult to force them. The Resolution of the French Generals, surprized the English and Burgundians, who seeing no possibility of attacking them in that Post, altered their rout, and, as if they had some other design, passed the Yonne at Cologny-le-Viveaux, with Intent to repass it at some other Place, and proceed to Crevant. The French, finding, that by this March, their Station on the Hill was become useless, defended, and posted themselves by the River-Side, in order to defend the Passage. The two Armies remained above three Hours facing one another, with the River between them. At length, a Body of English gaining a certain Bridge, withstood the Efforts of the French Army with uncommon Resolution, and gave the rest of the Troops time to come to their Support. This Action, which was one of the boldest, was performed with that Bravery, Order, and Conduct, that it was not possible for the French to beat them from the Bridge. As soon as all the English and Burgundians were over, they so vigorously attacked their Enemies, that they put them to rout. The Marshal de Severac, was blamed for retiring too soon, and leaving Stuart engaged with his Scotch Troops. There was slain on the spot, above five hundred (3), most of them Scots. As many more were made Prisoners, among whom were Stuart, and Xaintrailles, with forty Officers of note.

The loss sustained by the French on this occasion, rendering them incapable to keep the Field before a victorious Army, the Earl of Salisbury returned to the Blockade of Montaigu. A few days after his Arrival, the Place capitulated, and the Fortifications were demolished. Then, being apprehensive of no opposition from the French, he divided his Army with the Earl of Suffolk, who took Macon, whilst the Earl of Salisbury finished the Conquests of Champagne. After that, Salisbury entered the Isle of France, and took Caucy, and some other Castles.

In the mean time, the Regent had laid Siege to Cratay, a Town in Picardy, situated on the Somme, over-against St. Valery. Ralph Butler had the Management of this Siege, which employed him till October. At last, James d'Harcourt, Governor of the Town, agreed to surrender it the 1st of March next, if not relieved by that time. The sort of Capitulation was very common in those days. On the day fixed for the relief, or surrender of the Place, the Besiegers drew up under the Walls, expecting their Enemies. This was called Tenir Journee. If no Army appeared that day to give them Battle, the Place was surrendered according to the Capitulation. Though the Governor of Cratay, had given ample time to prepare for his relief, Charles was not in condition to attempt it, and the Town was surrendered to the Duke of Bedford.

The Battle of Crevant, was the more prejudicial to Charles's Affairs, as he lost many Officers of Distinction, some whereof were slain, and the rest Prisoners in the Hands of the English or Burgundians. Among the Prisoners, Xaintrailles was the Person for whom the King was most concerned, knowing him to be one of the bravest Officers in the Kingdom, and most capable of doing him Service. Though he had not much Money, he sent him however wherewithal to pay his Ranfom. Xaintrailles, very thankfully received this Favour, and to give the King sensible Marks of his Gratitude, presently after his release, found means to surprize Ham and Guise. At the same time, La Hire, or Vignoles did the like by Compiègne.

The loss of these Places gave the Regent no small Uneasiness, as it obliged him to keep his Forces near Paris, in spite of the Projects he had formed. As he could not execute his designs till the French were expelled the northern Provinces, he ordered the three Towns taken by Surprise, to be besieged all at once. If I should stay to relate the Circumstances of all the Sieges on both Sides, during this War, it would infinitely lead me into numberless Relations, for which few People would be concerned. The best way will be to keep to generals, and only mention the Beginnings and Events of the Sieges.

The Regent's design being, as I said, to retake these three Places, the Earl of Ligny invested Ham, and the Marshal de l'Isle-Adam made an Attempt upon Compiègne. But l'Isle-Adam falling into an Ambush laid for him by La Hire, lost three hundred of his Men. Nevertheless he obliged his Enemy to keep within the Walls. After Ligny had taken Ham, he invested Guise. Xaintrailles, who commanded in that Place, perceiving, that with his few Troops, he should make but a faint Resistance, went away in quest of Relief. But instead of succeeding in his Design, he fell himself into the hands of the Burgundians, and Guise surrendered immediately. After that Ligny joined l'Isle-Adam before Compiègne, and La Hire was forced at last to capitulate. So, all the Advantage Charles gained by taking the three Places, was making the Regent lose time, which however was no small Matter, considering the Situation of his Affairs.

After the Duke of Bretagne had taken part with the English, Charles saw nothing in France able to support him, and therefore resolved to apply to foreign Princes, for Assistance. He could hope for Aid, only from Philip Maria Visconti Duke of Milan, and the Scots. Philip was Uncle to the Duke of Orleans, and consequently a Friend of the House of Valois. His Affairs being then in a good Situation, he sent King Charles a thousand Men at Arms, and five hundred Lances, at the time when the Loss of the Battle of Crevant had made him despair of keeping the Field. These Troops being arrived on the Borders of France, Gracie Governor of Lyonnais, and Culant, lately made Admiral, went to receive them. As they were entering Burgundy, the Governor of La Fuffiere sent the Generals Word, that he was in Negotiation with Toulangeon, Marshal of Burgundy, to surrender the Town, and as the Marshal knew nothing of their March, it would be easy to surprize him when he came to take possession. This Stratagem was executed with such Secrecy, that Toulangeon entering La Fuffiere with seven hundred Men, was made Prisoner with all his Followers. The Duke his Master exchanged him afterwards for Stuart taken at Crevant.

This little Advantage was not capable of comforting King Charles for all his Losses. But shortly after, he had a fresh occasion of Joy, in the News, that a Body of English Troops were defeated in Maine with great Loss. John de la Pole, Brother of the Earl of Suffolk, knowing the French had no Army in the Field, departed from Normandy with a Body of Troops drawn out of several Garrisons, and throwing himself into Ajoux, burnt the Suburbs of Angers. After that, he retired with a Booty of twelve thousand head of Cattle, taken in his Incursion. Whilst he was employed in this Expedition, the Earl of Aumale, Governour of Anjou, assembled some Troops to stop his Progress. The young Duke of Alençon, Lohéac, Coulange, the Bastard of Alençon, and several others, joining him with what Troops they could draw together (1), he overtook the English at Gravelly in Maine. Pole perceiving, it was impossible to drive away his Booty without fighting, drew up his Troops, and intrenching himself with his Carriages in the Front, received the French with great Resolution. But whilst his Men were courageously fighting, a Detachment of the Enemy attacking them in the Rear, it was not possible for them to defend themselves on two Sides. After a very obstinate Resistance, they were at length defeated with the Loss of fourteen hundred Men (2), and all their Booty. Pole himself was taken Prisoner (3). Charles's Flatterers would have made him believe, he was revenged for the Business of Crevent. But there was a wide difference between these two Actions, with respect to the Consequence. The Battle of Gravelly did not affect the Affairs of the English, whereas that of Crevent had almost ruined Charles.

This Success however served to raise his hopes, especially when it was seconded with the News of the Arrival of five thousand Men, brought him from Scotland by the Earl of Buchan. This Lord had returned into his own Country, to take care of the Interests of his new Master, to whom he was entirely devoted. The great Men of Scotland were very much inclined the same way. The new Regent being a Prince of no great Genius and Credit, it was not difficult for the Earl his Brother to do King Charles Service. By his Care and Sollicitations he procured an Aid of five thousand Men, commanded by Archibald Earl of Douglas his Father-in-law (4). Douglas was a Lord of great Repute in his own Country, on account of his Qualities, Riches and Alliances, but still more considerable for his Merit and Experience in Military Affairs. At Rochel he landed his Troops, which could never more seasonably arrive. Charles pleased, as may be imagined, to see these Supplies, loaded the principal Scotch Officers with Honours, Careless, and Favours. He had already conferred on the Earl of Buchan the highest military Post, to which he could make no Addition. Douglas was created Duke of Touraine. Stuart was made Baron of Albigny, and afterwards Earl of Eureux, with Licence to quarter his Arms with those of France. To give the Scots a further Mark of his Esteem and Confidence, Charles chose out of them a Company of Guards, which in Process of time was increased to a Regiment. In short, he forgot nothing, that could help to gain the Affection of the Scots, in order to engage them to send him greater Supplies, or make a powerful Diversion in England.

Thus the Affairs of Charles began to flourish, by the Succours of the Scots and the Duke of Milan, which enabled him to withstand his Enemies. His Joy at the Arrival of these Troops, was preceded by the Satisfaction of having a Son born on the 4th of July the same Year. He gave the young Prince the Name of Lewis with the Title of Dauphin.

Richmont

Dowry.

Besides these happy Successes, which gave new Life to King Charles, an Event was preparing in his favour, that was no less proper to restore his Affairs: I mean the Earl of Richmont's Change, who drew after it that of the Duke of Bretagne. Richmont having consummated his Marriage at Dijon, where the Duke of Burgundy came with the Dauphiness his Sister, went and paid a Visit to the Duke of Bedford at Paris. During his Stay, he frequently intimated to the Duke, that he was extremely desirous of commanding the English Army, to which he offered to join a considerable Body of the Duke his Brother's Troops. But the Regent did not think proper, to put at the head of his Army a young foreign Prince, who had never commanded in Chief, nor even served since the Battle of Azincourt. The Earl of Richmont, who was extremely haughty and self-conceited, could not brook this Refusal. He considered it as a great Affront, and from that time resolved to be revenged. We shall see hereafter how he executed his Resolution.

Shortly after, Charles and the Duke of Burgundy made a Truce for Lyonnois and Burgundy. This Truce was absolutely necessary for these two Provinces, as well as for the Duke of Savoy, by whose means it was procured. His Subjects and the Inhabitants of Burgundy and Lyonnois not being able to live without trading together, the War was very detrimental to these two Provinces.

Whilst France was the Seat of War, England enjoyed a profound Tranquillity, by the good order established in the Government. In the Month of May (5), Lionard Mortimer Earl of March, was made Governor of Ireland with a very extensive Authority. Policy required that, during the King's Minority, this Prince should be removed from the Kingdom, on account of his Right to the Crown. Not that he had given occasion by his Conduct for any Suspicion. But it was not impossible, that even without his Consent, he might prove the Cause of Commotions, which the Wisdom of the Council was willing to prevent. He did not depart till February or March the next Year.

The Parliament, which met on the 26th of October, granted the King a Subsidy (6) for the Support of the War in France, where King Charles still kept his Ground, notwithstanding the great Disproportion between his and his Rival's Forces (7).

I have observed, that the Scots were extremely cajoled by King Charles, and that the Nation began to follow Maxims entirely different, from what they had done during the Duke of Albany's Regency. The Duke of Gloucester and the Council of England, perceiving this Aversion, which might prove very prejudicial to the King's Affairs, thought it necessary to countermine King Charles's Designs, by means of the King of Scotland Puker in England ever since 1408. To that end, they resolved to set him at Liberty, upon such Terms as should attach him to the Interests of England. This was indeed the only way, to stop the Career of the Scotch Nobles, who were almost all inclined to an open Rupture with the English. Whilst the Council was thinking how to proceed without a too plain discovery of their Design, an Accident in Scotland saved them the Trouble of making the first Advances.

Murdoch Stuart, Regent of Scotland since the Death of the Duke of Albany his Father, had three Sons, all very ill-tempered, and who created him a great deal of Trouble, because he was neither able nor steady enough to keep them within the Bounds of their Duty. The youngest asking one day for a certain Hawk, and being denied, wrung the Bird's Neck, though he knew it to be greatly valued by his Father. This Action convincing the Regent, how difficult it would be for him to govern the Nation committed to his Care, since his own Children had so little respect for him, he assembled the States, and proposed a Negotiation with England concerning their King's Liberty. A Motion so agreeable to the Wishes both of Nobles and People, was received with Joy and Applause. And, not to afford him time to repent, Ambassadors were immediately named, and empowered to negotiate the Affair. As the Council of England stood affected, these Ambassadors met with a very civil Reception, and Commissioners (8) were presently appointed to treat with them. The Commissioners Instructions were, that they should consent to James's Liberty, upon the following Terms: That the captive Prince should pay the King the Sum of forty, or at least of thirty six thousand Marks, for his Expenses in England during his Captivity: That a Truce should be made, during which neither of the two Kings should assist the other's Enemies. Moreover, they were ordered to intimate to the Scotch Ambassadors, that it would be very proper, to marry their King to a Princess of the Royal Fa-

For Conf.
1423. n. l. c. Eng. l. But the Council wished, that it possible this Motion should come from the Scots.
The first Conference upon this Affair was held at Tork, in the beginning of September, and on the 10th of the same Month the Plenipotentiaries agreed, that James should have his Liberty, and return into his Kingdom. That he should pay, at several times, the Sum of forty thousand Marks, and give Hostages for Security of Payment. In the second Conference, held at London on the 4th of December, every thing relating to the Payment of the Money, and the Quality of the Hostages, was settled. Then it was agreed, that the King of Scotland should marry Joanna, Sister of the Duke of (1) Somerset, and Niece of the Duke of Exeter and Bishop of Winchester. On account of this Marriage, which was solemnized in the beginning of February next Year, Henry, or the Council in his Name, abated ten thousand of the forty thousand Marks the King of Scotland was to pay (2).

Matters being thus settled, the Ambassadors of both Nations signed (3) a seven Years Truce, to commence May the 1st, 1424; during which, each of the two Kings was obliged to hinder his Subjects from doing any Damage to the other. So, by this Treaty, James bound himself indirectly, to recall his Troops out of France, before May the 1st. Nevertheless, whether he neglected to send Orders for their return, or, as is most likely, his Generals found some pretence to evade them, these Troops, as will be seen presently, were still there in August. All these Negotiations being thus ended, James was conducted to the Borders, and set at Liberty the beginning of March.

M. Baker of some English Historians concerning the Homage. Hall. n. l. c. p. 587.
An English Historian affirms, that before James quitted England, he swore Fealty, and did Homage to young Henry in Windsor Castle, for the whole Kingdom of Scotland. It were to be wished, that in advancing a Fact of such Importance, and so very improbable, this Historian, who relates the very Words of the Oath and Homage (4), had discovered the Fountain from whence it was drawn. It cannot be denied, that since John Balliol, all the Kings of Scotland had constantly refused this Homage. For we must not reckon among the Kings, Edward Balliol, who, to ascend the Throne of Scotland, had made himself Slave of Edward III. But not to take Things so high, it will suffice to remark, that Robert III. Father of James, refused to do Homage to Henry IV.; and that since, there had been no Treaty of Peace between the two Nations, but Truces only, which had settled nothing upon this Head: so James was upon the same Terms with the King his Father. If therefore he did Homage to Henry VI., it must have been by virtue of a new Agreement. And yet, it does not appear in the Instructions of the English Commissioners, that they had any Orders upon that Point. The Conventions of the Plenipotentiaries, appointed to treat concerning the Liberty of King James, make no mention of this Homage, though they are very large upon Things of much less Importance. Neither has the Treaty of Truce any Thing like it. In short, in above thirty several Acts, extant in Rymer's Collection, concerning the Affairs negotiated in the Years 1423 and 1424, between the English and Scots, there is not one Syllable alluding to any such thing. Upon all these accounts, it is to be presumed, in my Opinion, that what is advanced by this Historian, and by several others after him, concerning the pretended Homage at Windsor, is the pure Effect of their prejudice. They verily believed, as many do still, that this Homage was due from the King of Scotland; and accordingly they imagined, the Captive King would not be suffered to depart, without being obliged to pay it. But, besides the Reasons which the King of Scotland had to refuse this Homage, the Silence of the Records in the Collection of the Publick Acts, seems to me a cleat Demonstration. The Reader may look back to what has been said upon this Subject, in the Reign of Edward I. where the Rights of the English and Scots were sufficiently explained.

Whilst the King of Scotland's Liberty was negotiating in England, the War was continued in France, with various Success. In the beginning of the Year, the French took, by Scalade, Beaumont upon Oise, a small Town in the Isle of France, five Leagues from Paris.

On the other hand, Perceval Grailly, a Brengolian La Court, surprized La Charité, a Place of great Importance, which might open the English a Passage over the Loire, and enable them to carry their Arms beyond that River.

The taking of Places by Surprize was then so frequent, that it is strange, the daily instances should not render the Governors more vigilant. The Duke of Burgundy was extremely concerned to see, that as he promoted the Execution of his Projects, by taking the Enemy's Towns about Paris, others were surprized, which retarded his designs. His Scheme was, as I observed, to clear the northern Provinces, and yet he could not accomplish it. There was no End of it, and therefore it was necessary, in order to pursue his Project, to take Beaumont from the French. For that purpose, he opened the Campaign in March, with an Army of ten thousand Men. After he had recovered this Place, he made himself Master likewise in the Isle of France, of several Castles, by which the Parisians were very much incommoded.

Whilst he was employed in these slight Expeditions, the French News was brought, that Girart, a Captain of King Charles's Party, had surprized Fury, on the Frontiers of Normandy. He posted immediately into those Parts, and not to give the French time to provide for its Defence, laid Siege to the Town the beginning of July. Girart perceiving, he could not long defend it, in his present Condition, capitulated to surrender on the 15th of August, if not relieved by that time. King Charles being soon informed of this Capitulation, resolved to relieve Fury at any Rate, and to employ in that Service the Italian and Scotch Troops lately arrived. To these, he joined about eleven thousand Men, drawn out of several Provinces and Garrisons; foreseeing, that without a great Superiority of Forces, it would be very difficult to succeed in his Design. All these Troops together, made an Army of twenty thousand Men (5), which was formed in Maine. Charles had never had one so Numerous. It was the Earl of Buchan's Place, as Constable of France, to command in Chief. But he was pleased to resign that Honour to the Earl of Douglas's his Father-in-law, to whom the King sent for that Purpose a Patent, constituting him his Lieutenant-General of the whole Kingdom, otherwise, the Constable could not have been under his Command.

All the French Nobles of Charles's Party repaired to the Army, in order to share in the Glory, which was expected from this Expedition. The French beginning to march, passed on the 12th of August, by the Walls of Vernueil, a Town in Perche, possessed by the English. The next day, they came in Sight of the English Army, which was advantageously intrenched before Fury. Douglas had no sooner viewed the Enemy's Camp, but he judged it impossible to be attacked. So, altering his Design on a sudden, he immediately returned, and resolved to lay Siege to Vernueil. He reckoned, he should have time to fortify his Camp, as to expect the English with Advantage; or, in case they would not venture to attack him, the taking of Vernueil, would make the King ample amends for the loss of Fury. Upon his appearing before Vernueil, the Garrison preposterously imagined, he was come from defeating the English before Fury; taking it for granted, that with so great a Superiority, he would never return thus without Action. In this belief, which the French took care not to destroy (6), they surrendered upon the first Summons, and Douglas garrisoned the Place with French.

Upon News of the March of the French, the Earl of Salisbury hastened to join the Regent, with a thousand Men at Arms, and two thousand Archers, who arrived at the Camp on the 14th. So, the English Army was about fifteen thousand strong.

On the 15th of August, Fury opened her Gates to the Besiegers, pursuant to the Capitulation; and next day, the Regent marched to Vernueil, where the French still remained. When he came within a League of their

(6) The French told the Garrison, that they had discomfited and slain all the English Army, and the Regent, with a small Number, had saved himself by the Swiftness of his Horse. Whereupon the Inhabitants of Vernueil giving (as Hall expresses it) too light credit to these French Fables, opened their Gates to them. Hall, fol. 82.

Camp, he sent a Herald to offer them Battle. At the same time, he bid him tell Douglas, he was come to take a Bit with him; to which the other replied, he should find the Cloth laid. Naturally, it was the Duke of Bedford's Buifness to advance, since he was in quest of his Enemies. But knowing the impetuous Humour of the French, he did not question, that being superior in Number, they would come and attack him, and therefore resolved to expect them. For that purpose, he chose an advantageous Post for his Camp, and for the Field of Battle, a Ground flanked by a Hill, on which he placed two thousand Archers. He ordered his foremost Ranks to take such Piles, as the late King his Brother had so successfully used in the Battle of Azincourt, for the better resisting the Efforts of the French Horse, among whom were all the Nobles. In this posture, he waited the Enemies Resolutions, hoping they would be so imprudent as to attack him in this Post; and he was not deceived in his Expectation.

The Earl of Douglas having viewed himself the English Camp, called a Council of War. He represented, that the Duke of Bedford, instead of advancing, designed to fight with Advantage, on a Ground chosen by himself; and therefore, it was by no means proper to attack him in that Place. That the danger the King's Affairs would be in, was of so great a Consequence, that he thought a Battle was not to be hazarded. That however, if it was judged necessary to fight, the best way would be to chuse an advantageous Post, and there expect the Enemy, in order not to engage, till after such Precautions were taken, as would in some measure warrant Success. This advice coming from a Foreigner, was thought too cautious by some of the Council. Amidst the Debates, a Party was formed against the General, headed by Aymar, Viscount of Narbonne. This Lord represented, that, if with such a Superiority, a Battle was avoided, the reputation of the King's Arms would be irreparably lost. That by this Cowardice, the Troops would be so terrified, that there would be no possibility to lead them against Enemies, who were avoided, when they ought to have been attacked. That the King's Affairs were not to be restored without some great Action; and, as there could not be a fairer opportunity to vanquish the Enemy, to neglect it, would be to betray the Interest of the King and Kingdom. Notwithstanding these Reasons, the Constable and oldest Captains were of the General's Opinion. But the contrary Party were resolved to carry their Point. Narbonne, their Head, going out of the Council, ordered his Banner to be displayed, and began to march towards the Enemies. They who were of his Mind, did the same, and were joined by all the Volunteers of the Army. Douglas was enraged at this Disobedience. But neither his, nor the Constable's Authority, was capable of making them return. Had he been in his own Country, he would have left these rash Men to perish. But as he was in a foreign Kingdom, he was afraid of being taxed with Cowardice, or with having voluntarily suffered Part of his Troops to be lost. Besides, the number of the Disobedient continually increasing, he saw himself forced, though with extreme Indignation, to march with the rest of the Army. When they saw themselves followed, they readily left the General the Conduct of the Army, congratulating one another upon having conquered his Obstinacy. Mean while, notwithstanding the Earl of Douglas's care, his Troops, fearing Victory would escape them, were in such disorder and confusion, that, when they came in sight of the English, they were almost quite out of Breath. However, they immediately attacked them, without regarding those that advised to rest a little before they engaged. The Italians, being exposed to the Arrows of the two thousand Archers on the Hill, were the first that took to Flight. The French and Scots behaved better, but had to deal with Soldiers inured to War, who were not easily frightened. In short, the Leaders seeing the Attack unsuccessful, and themselves liable to everlasting Disgrace, and some even justly fearing an exemplary Punishment, chose an honorable Death before a shameful Retreat. The Earl of Douglas, the Earl of Bachan, Narbonne, Ventadour, Graville, Rambouillet being slain, and many others of the most considerable wounded, there was scarce a General left to lead the Soldiers to the Charge. So, the whole Army was utterly routed, and hotly pursued. Then it was, that the greatest Slaughter was made, as it usually happens on such Occasions. The Italians returning, upon a false Information, that their Friend had the Advantage, met the victorious English, who slew many more of them. These foreign Troops would have been all cut in Pieces, had not the Night cooled the Ardor of the Conquerors. The French and Scots lost above five thousand Men (1), who lay dead on the Spot, besides a great Number of Wounded and Prisoners. Among the last were the Marshal de la Fayette and Gaucour. The young Duke of Alençon, who had behaved most gallantly, was found among the Dead, with some remains of Life, and by the extraordinary care of the Regent, cured of his Wounds. But as will be seen hereafter, the Recovery of his Liberty cost him dear. The English lost sixteen or seventeen hundred of their bravest Soldiers. The 17th of August, the next day after the Battle, the Regent invested Verneuil, where Ram-bur commanded. This Governour could have long defended himself, had he been well stored with Provisions. But that Want, and perhaps the Confection of the Garrison, obliged him to surrender the third Day. There was found in Verneuil, all the Baggage of the French, Scotch, and Italian Generals, with the Money designed for the Payment of the Army. As they entered the Town, the English met the Corps of the Viscount of Narbonne, going to be buried; and, because he was one of the Duke of Burgundy's Murderers, took his Body and hung it on a Gibbet (2).

After the Battle of Verneuil, the Regent left the Command of the Army to the Earl of Salisbury, and posted to Paris, where some Mutineers had raised a Sedition, in a Belief, that he could not fall of being defeated by the French. This Commotion was appeased by the Death of some of the Ring-leaders: However, it convinced the Regent, that he must not trust to the Affection of the Parisians, unless it was in his Power to keep them always in Awe.

The Earl of Salisbury finding himself able to make some considerable Attempt, entered Maine (3), and besieged Mans, the Capital of the Province, and one of the strongest Cities in France. The Governour made a long and brave Defence; but at length, despairing of Relief, he capitulated. After the taking of Mans (4), the English General invested La Ferté Bernard, another Place in the same Province, which could hardly be carried by Storm, by reason of its Situation. Whilst Part of his Troops kept this Place blocked up, he over-ran the rest of the Province, and took St. Suzanne (5), with some other Places. He finished this glorious Campaign, and the Conquest of Maine, with taking La Ferté Bernard (6), after a four Months Blockade.

The Defeats of Crevant and Verneuil, had thrown King Charles's Troops, and all his Towns, into great Confection. Had not Winter been so near, probably, the English would have pushed their Conquests farther. But this delay, which the Season gave King Charles, would have only retarded his ruin a few Months, if a favorable and unexpected Event, had not given him time to breathe. I mean the Quarrel between the Dukes of Glocester and Brabant, wherein the Duke of Burgundy was also engaged. It may be truly said, that this Affair caused the English to lose the fatal Moment, which, probably, was to determine the ruin of the House of Valois, and render them Masters of all France. This will plainly appear in the Sequel. But it will be necessary first, to give a brief Account of the Rise of this Quarrel, which proved so fatal to England.

William of Bavaria, late Earl of Hainault, had by Margaret his Countess, Daughter of Philip le Hardi, Duke of Burgundy, an only Daughter called Jacqueline, who had been married to John second Son of Charles VI. John being Dauphin by the Death of his elder Brother Lewis, died at Compiègne in 1416, and Jacqueline remained a Widow, at her Father's House. The Earl her Father dying shortly after, he became Heir of his Dominions, containing Hainault, Holland, Zeland and Prussia. So noble an Inheritance, could not fail to attract the Adresses of many Princes. But the Countess her Mother being desirous to procure this rich Match for a Prince of her own Family, cast her Eyes on John Duke of Brabant, her Nephew, and perfwaded her Daughter to marry him. This Marriage proved unfortunate. The new-married Couple soon quarrelled, for Reasons foreign

Two hundred Gentlemen, besides many common Soldiers, were taken Prisoners. 1474. to our History (1). Their Quarrel grew to that height, that Jacqueline at last caused herself to be run away with, by some English Knights, who carried her to London. I have observed in the foregoing Reign, that this voluntary Rape was not unknown to King Henry V. Very probably, this Morarch had then thoughts of marrying Jacqueline to the Duke of Gloucester.

Upon this Prince's Arrival in England, he began to think of annulling her Marriage with the Duke of Brabant. To that end, he applied to the Anti-Pope Benedict XIII. who, though deposed by the Council of Pisa, persisted in keeping his Title and Dignity. The pretended Pope, overjoyed at being addressed to, nulled Jacqueline's Marriage, with permission to marry again. But whether Henry V. was afraid of disobliging the Duke of Burgundy, Cousin-German of the Duke of Brabant, or thought it too irregular to use the Dispensation of a Pope, whom he himself acknowledged not for such, he hastened not the Conclusion of the projected Marriage.

Henry dying in the mean while, the Duke of Gloucester believed, he ought not to delay any longer so advantageous a Marriage. He espoused Jacqueline, either in the very Year 1422, or at least in the beginning of 1423 (2); for there is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a Petition dated March 7. 1423, and presented to him under the Title of Earl of Hainault (3). However this be, the Duke had no sooner consummated his Marriage, but he thought of means to take possession of his Dutche's Dominions, now in the hands of the Duke of Brabant. Mean while, the Duke of Burgundy foreseeing, Jacqueline's third Marriage might create a War between the two Princes her Husbands, had a Conference upon that Subject, with the Duke of Bedford, at Amiens, and afterwards another at Paris in December 1423. They agreed, that the Decision of this Affair should be left to the Pope, as the proper Judge of such Cases. The Duke of Brabant approved of the Expedient, because he knew, there was no sufficient Reason to induce the Court of Rome to annul the Marriage. But the Duke of Gloucester rejected it, protesting however, he was ready to consent to a reasonable Agreement. Mean time, he made Preparations to support his Pretensions, whilst the Duke of Bedford his Brother was triumphantly prosecuting the War in France. At last, in October 1424, he came to Calais with his Dutche's, and brought with him a Body of five thousand Men. He staid there till about the middle of November.

Though the Duke of Burgundy was entirely in the Duke of Brabant's Interest, his good Understanding with the English was not altered. He still hoped, the Duke of Gloucester would desist from his Pretensions; and the more, as he saw the Duke of Bedford his Brother, using his Endeavours to persuade him. The arrival of the English Troops at Calais alarmed him not, being yet ignorant, they were designed against the Duke of Brabant. Nay, very likely, they were sent from England to strengthen the Regent. And therefore, whilst the Duke of Gloucester staid at Calais, Philip was at Paris, partaking of the Diversions and Entertainments made by the Regent, on account of his glorious Campaign. At his return to Dijon, he celebrated his second Nuptials with Bona of Artois, Widow of Philip Earl of Nevers, his Uncle. She was Sister of the Earl of Eu, Prisoner in England, and Half-Sister of the Earl of Clermont, eldest Son of the Duke of Bourbon.

Whilst this Marriage was solemnizing at Dijon, the Duke of Gloucester departed from Calais, and, with Jacqueline his Wife, marched towards Hainault. He passed through part of the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions, without suffering his Troops to commit any disorder, and came before Beauchain, which opened her Gates to him. Shortly after, all the other Towns of Hainault submitted, and swore Fealty to him and the Dutche's. Whereupon the Duke of Burgundy, ordered Ligny and Ple Adam, to draw an Army together with all possible speed, and join the Earl of St. Pol, Brother of the Duke of Brabant, who was making Preparations at Brussels, for the Assistance of the Duke his Brother. But, before we proceed in this Affair, it will be necessary to close the Account of the Occurrences of the Year 1424, with what passed in England.

Sir John Mortimer, Uncle of Edmund Earl of March, having been some time Prisoner in the Tower, was released with attempting to make his Escape, in order to stir up an Insurrection in Wales. It was pretended, his design was to proclaim the Earl of March his Nephew, and upon his refusal, to proclaim himself. Whether his Crime was proved, or it was thought proper to make away with a Person, who in case he had escaped, might have done mischief, he was condemned and executed (4).

The Earl of March his Nephew did not long survive him. He died in Ireland, about the latter end of the Year, without any Issue. By his death the Title of Earl of March, and his Right to the Crown of England, from which he was excluded, by the Election of Henry IV. descended to Richard Duke of York his Nephew, son of Ann his Sister, and the Earl of Cambridge, beheaded at Southampton in 1415. All the English Historians unanimously affirm, that this Prince, then under Age, bore not yet the Title of Duke of York, which according to them, was not conferred upon him, till the Parliament of Leicester in 1426. But we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he is styled Duke of York, in an Act dated February 26, 1425, that is, thirteen Months before the Parliament of Leicester, where he was only made Knight (5).

In the beginning of the Year 1425, the Affairs of King Charles were in a deplorable Condition. The Battles of Cravant and Vernuil, had deprived him of his Troops, and best Generals. He had neither Money nor Credit. His Revenues being all mortgaged, he saw himself unable to bring an Army into the Field. The Dukes of Burgundy and Brabant, the two most powerful Vassals of the Crown, were in strict Union with the English. The King of Sicily his Brother-in-law, had just lost Maine, and could hardly preserve the rest of his Dominions. The King of Scotland, ancient Ally of France, had made a Truce with the English, which tied up his Hands, and hindered him from sending any Succours. Reduced to this wretched State, he saw himself as it were forced beyond the Loire, without hopes of keeping any longer his Towns about Paris. To this was added, the just Apprehension of quickly seeing the Enemy's Armies in Berry, Langueue, and Dauphin. The English called him only the Earl of Ponthieu, or in derision, the King of Bourges.

Certainly, if the Duke of Gloucester had shewn the same Zeal for the King his Nephew's Interests, as he did for his own, and sent the Duke of Bedford the Troops and Money, he employed against the Duke of Brabant, it may be reasonably presumed, France would have been undone. Never would Charles have had it in his Power to wrest that Conquest out of the Hands of the English. This was the critical Minute, which that Nation should not have neglected. They were near the end of a War, which had lasted ten Years, and probably, was going to end according to their Wish, in securing the Crown of France to the Kings of England. The Duke of Bedford saw it plainly. He never ceased to sollicit his Brother to Hall improve so favorable a Juncture, and defer the Execution of his designs till a more convenient Season, when he might even employ all the Forces of France and England. But his Remonstrances were not capable of diverting the ambitious Duke, from an Enterprize, which promised him the possession of four of the finest Provinces of the Low-Countries. He was a younger Brother, and the Succession of the Throne of England, supposing the King his Nephew died without Issue, was to come to his Brother before him. For this reason, he thought he should not neglect this opportunity, which would raise him above the rank of a Subject, and was not likely to offer again. But at the same time, he caused the Duke his Brother to lose that, of completing the Conquest of France. The great Number of Garrisons requisite in the Kingdom, where was neither Town nor Castle, but what was fortified, drained the English Army. So, the Regent not receiving any Supplies, because of the unhappy diversion of Hainault, was no more able than King Charles, to bring an Army into the Field. This is the true Reason Gloucester - The English Prince hearing what the Duke of Burgundy had advanced, sent him a Letter, dated from Mons. January the 12th, 1424-5, taxing him with saying an Untruth. The Duke of Burgundy, provoked at this Affront, returned him a very abusive Answer. He told him, he lied, and offered to make good his Assertion, in single Combat, and to take the Duke of Bedford for Judge (1). The Duke of Gloucester accepted the Challenge, and appointed St. George's Day for the Combat. Several other bitter Letters passed between them, but of no Consequence to what I have farther to say.

While these two Princes were thus reviling each other, the Earl of St. Pol, Brother of the Duke of Brabant, besieged the little Town of Braine in Hainault, defended by two hundred English. After a faint Resistance, the Garrison capitulating, the Brabanters violated the Articles, put the English to the Sword, and set Fire to the Town (2).

Mean while, as the single Combat of the Dukes of Burgundy and Gloucester, was of course to decide the principal Quarrel between Gloucester and Brabant, it was thought proper to make a Truce, in Expectation of the Success of the Combat. Upon signing the Truce, the Duke of Gloucester returned into England. He would have carried his Dutchess along with him, but the People of Mons were so urgent with him to leave her behind, that he could not deny their Request. He made the Magistrates however, solemnly swear to defend her, at the Peril of their Lives, against all Persons whatever (3).

Charles takes Advantage of the Hainault Diversion. P. Daniel.

While the War of Hainault suspended that of France, Charles took Measures to improve this happy Diversion. In a great Council, held to consider the State of his Affairs, it was unanimously agreed, there was but one way to free him from his present Circumstances. And that was, to offer the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, a Carte Blanche, in order to win them from the English. The first had openly broke with the Duke of Gloucester. The other might be gained by the Earl of Richemont his Brother, who had great Influence over him, and moreover was very angry with the Duke of Bedford. This was a Juncture which was not to be neglected. On the other hand, Bona of Artois, lately married to the Duke of Burgundy, being French, and Half-Sister to the Earl of Clermont, the King's zealous Adherent, it was likely she would readily endeavour to gain the Duke her Spouse.

The Revolution being then taken to try these two means, Charles sent to the Earl of Richmond, private Emiffaries, who told him, what a great Esteem the King had for him; intimating, that he had often said, he should deem himself invincible, if he could have him at the head of his Army. This was attacking the Prince in the most feasible Part. As he had a high Conceit of his own Merit, it was no small Pleasure to him, to see King Charles offer him a Post, scornfully refused him by the Duke of Bedford. However, knowing the Persons that talked to him thus, were sent only to found him, he contented himself with returning a civil Answer to their Compliments, and artfully insinuating, he had a great Inclination to serve their Master.

This first Step being taken, Charles sent to him the Queen Dowager of Sicily his Mother-in-law, with Tannequ du Châtel, and empowered them to offer him the Constitable's Sword. This Post had been vacant ever since the Death of the Earl of Buchan, slain in the Battle of Verneuil. The Queen of Sicily, and du Châtel, found the Earl entirely disposed to the change. He was exasperated against the Duke of Bedford, and being extremely proud and vindictive, was pleased to think, he should have an opportunity of revenging his Contempt. So, without much Solicitation, he accepted the King's Offer, with great Demonstrations of Thankfulness, and promised to engage the Duke his Brother in his Interests. However, he required two Conditions, without which, he protested, he could not accept the Honour designed him by the Duke, or promise any thing, with regard to the Duke his Brother. The first was, that Lowel, and d'Aunougar, the principal Authors of the Pentecostian Conspiracy, should be removed from Court. The second, that the Duke of Burgundy should consent to the proposed Affair. His reason was, because he had injured himself by Data with the Duke of Burgundy, in the Treaty on Orléans. He had not the same people with respect to the Duke of Bedford, though he was no less engaged with him, than with the Duke of Burgundy. But Passius frequently causes the same thing to appear with two different Faces, according to the Persons with whom we are concerned. The Queen and du Châtel, readily assented him, the King would comply with his Demands. Whereupon he went to Tours, where Charles took care to flatter his Vanity, with all possible Civilities and Carresses. But however, the Earl stood firm to his previous Demands, and told the King plainly, he could lift in his Service, only upon the Terms propoed. The King gave him hopes of the first, without however fixing the time; and as to the second, was pleased, that he should talk with the Duke of Burgundy, to obtain his Consent. He took likewise this opportunity, to send to the Duke of Burgundy the Bishops of Puy and Chartres, with Orders to found him, whither there was any way to 'disengage him from the King of England.

Though the Duke of Burgundy was extremely incensed against the Duke of Gloucester, he appeared not so inclinable to an Agreement, as Charles and his Council expected. The Murder of the Duke his Father being still fresh in his Mind, he shewed at first great Aversion to a Reconciliation. Nevertheless, pressed by the King's Envoys, who endeavoured to excuse their Master by casting the Blame on his evil Counsellors, he replied, the King therefore should dismiss those pernicious Counsellors, and then it would be time to talk of an Accommodation. This was a sufficient Intimation, that he was not inexorable, especially as he readily consented, that the Earl of Richemont should accept of the Countess's Sword.

Charles, it seems, had reason to congratulate himself upon his good Fortune. It was in his own Power to gain the Duke of Bretagne; and moreover, he had hopes that the Duke of Burgundy was not Proof against a reasonable Satisfaction. However, the Terms imposed upon him, threw him into great Perplexity. To procure these Advantages, he must part with his two principal Ministers, Favorites and Confidants, namely, Tannequi du Châtel, who slew the Duke of Burgundy, and Lovet, Prefident of Provence, whom the Duke of Bretagne considered as Author of the Pontevivian Conspiracy. Du Châtel saved him from his Trouble to make this Sacrifice. He came and cast himself at his Feet, entreating him, in Reward of his Services, to give him leave to retire, since his Presence at Court could not, for the future, but be detrimental to so good a Master. It was with extreme Reluctance that the King granted his Request. It was a long time before he could come to a Resolution. Mean while, pressed by the continual Instances of a faithful Servant, who desired his leave, only to give him a fresh Proof of his Zeal, he suffered him at length to retire. There are few Favorites, who thus prefer their Master's Good to their own. Lovet, who was not so disinterested, did not think himself obliged to follow this Example. He would have kept himself in his Post, at the Expence of all the Advantages, the King could expect from an Alliance with the Duke of Bretagne.

Mean while, the Earl of Richemont not doubting in the least, that the King would perform his Promise in relation to Louvet, came to him at Tours, where he received the Confable's Sword (4) the 7th of March 1425. He had promised to win the Duke of Bretagne from England, but, as he still saw Louvet and d' Avanquer about the King, was not in haste to perform his Engagement. Charles was willing enough to make him a Sacrifice of the last. But Louvet had a surer Footing at Court. Besides his being beloved by the King, one of his Daughters, Wife of the Lord de Joyeuse, shared Charles's Heart with Agnes Sorrel, who began to appear at Court as a Favorite. Wherefore, to gain the Duke of Bretagne, Charles saw himself forced to dismiss a beloved Minister, and disoblige a Mitreiteis. This gave him no small Concern. On the other hand, Louvet used his utmost Endeavours to ruin the Confable in his Master's Favour. He represented to him, with what Haughtinefs he had imposed Terms on his Sovereign, as if he had been his Equal, and caused it to be considered as a Favour, that he was pleased to accept of the Confable's Sword. In short, he so managed the King, that Charles, who was very obitinate, resolved not to part with his Minister. Ier what would be the Consequence, to ruin Louvet in spite of the King himself. For that purpose, knowing this Minister was not beloved by the great 1425. Men at Court, he so caballed with them, that a Plot was formed to remove him from the King. When he was secure of the Success of his Project, he withdrew from Court without taking leave, and sent the King word, he would never return so long as Louvet was there. Charles little regarding his Retreat, still persisted in the Resolution to keep his Minister. But when he saw, that by degrees the great Men retired to their Governments, on divers Pretences, that they refused to receive his Orders, and that he had but two or three Towns left, which he could call his own, he found he must resolve to part with Louvet, or his Kingdom. He was even apprehensive, that the Constable would deliver the Duke of Bretagne's Places to the English. So he was forced, tho' with extreme Indignation, to dismiss his Minister, who had still Credit enough to cause his Creature de Giac to be received in his Room.

Upon this Removal, the Constable was willing to return to Court, but Charles was so provoked with him, that he could not bear to see him. However, the State of his Affairs obliged him at length to admit him again. The Constable, content with having accomplished his Designs, performed his Promise concerning the Duke his Brother, and brought him to Saumur, where he did Homage to the King (1).

Whilst the Earl of Richemont was raising disturbances in the Court of King Charles, Henry enjoyed no greater Tranquillity. I have observed, that the Duke of Gloucester, and the Bishop of Winchester, his Uncle, were not Friends. On which Side soever the Fault lay, they lost no Opportunity of plaguing one another. The Hainault Expedition furnished the Bishop with one, which he knew how to improve. When that Undertaking was proposed in Council, he strenuously opposed it, and manifestly showed, how prejudicial it might be to the King's Affairs. But though on this occasion, he was in the right, the Duke of Gloucester had Interest enough to have it approved. He departed with a Mind imbittered against his Uncle, and with a resolution to be revenged, the first Opportunity.

The Historians inform us not, how the Government was settled during the Duke of Gloucester's Absence, which lasted about a Year (2). Very likely, the Bishop of Winchester had the greatest Share in it, and made use of this Advantage to create his Enemy many Vexations. Some even say, all his Proceedings tended to deprive him of the Protectorship, in order to obtain it for himself.

The Duke being returned into England, about October 1425, this Quarrel was kindled afresh, with great Animosity on both Sides. One Day as he intended to go to the Tower, Sir Richard Woodville the Governor refused him Admittance, by the Bishop of Winchester's Advice. The Protector, who was exceeding high-spirited, flew into a great Passion with the Bishop, and proceeded even to Threats. In a word, the Quarrel was carried so far, that they both began to arm their Friends, either to attack or defend. The Duke of Cambria, Prince of Portugal, then in England (3), and the Archbishop of Canterbury, endeavoured in vain to reconcile them. An Historian says, the Bishop of Winchester was forced to fly for refuge to the Tower, and that eight or ten of his People were killed by the Duke's. But this is unlikely, since, in their mutual Complaints, laid before the ensuing Parliament, there is no mention of any such thing.

The Prelate having no Warriors on his Side, did not find his account in deciding the Quarrel by Arms. The Intrigues of the Cabinet were more within his Province. And therefore, to prevent the Mischief that might befall him, if things remained in this State, he writ to the Duke of Bedford, desiring him to come into England. He told him in his Letter, unless he made all possible Haste, the Kingdom was in danger of being exposed to fatal Commotions, by his Brother's violent Temper. The Duke of Bedford perceiving the Importance of this Request, let out immediately, leaving in France, Richard de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, to command in his room, and arrived in England December the 20th.

As soon as the Duke set foot in the Kingdom, he assumed the Title of Protector, and was received as such, pursuant to the Act of Parliament in 1422. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, not only that Petitions were presented to him as Protector, but the Parliament assigned him the Salary of eight thousand Marks, annexed to that Dignity, and which the Duke of Gloucester till then had enjoyed.

A few Days after his Arrival, the Duke of Bedford spoke in the Council, of the Treachery of the Duke of Bretagne, and the Earl of Richemont, representing the Prejudice it brought to the King's Affairs. Upon his Remonstrances, and by his Advice, it was unanimously resolved, to declare War against the Duke of Bretagne, which was accordingly done on the 15th of January, by Proclamation. Moreover, to find that Prince Employment in his own Country, and hinder him from afflicting King Charles, a resolution was taken to support the Pontivier against his Enemies, and try, by their means, to raise a Civil War in Bretagne. To that end, Safe-Conducts were dispatched to the two Brothers of Pontivier: But however, nothing came of it. Probably, their Interest was not great in that Country.

This Affair being ended, the Duke of Bedford wholly applied himself, to procure a sincere Reconciliation between the Duke's Brother and the Bishop of Winchester. The Way to succeed, was to favor neither. Had he taken his Brother's Part, as the Ties of Blood seemed to require, he would not have been fit to perform the Office of a Mediator. Moreover, besides the Character of Brother and Nephew, he had another to maintain, in order to answer his Duty, and the Expectations of the Publick; I mean that of Protector, chiefly concerned in the Good of the State, independently of the Duties of Nature. So, not to take upon himself alone so nice an Affair, he assembled some of the prime Nobility at St. Albans, in hopes of finding, with their Assistance, some expedient, to content these two Princes. But their Animosity was so great, that it was not possible to succeed by this means. After many fruitless Endeavours, the Decision of the Affair was forced to be referred to a Parliament summoned at Leicester for March (4). When the Parliament met, the Duke of Gloucester exhibited six Articles against the Bishop.

I. He accused him of causing him to be denied Entrance into the Tower, and thereby rendered the Dignity of Protector contemptible.

II. That he would have removed the King from his Palace at Eltham, to Windsor, with Design to become Master of his Person.

III. That not being satisfied, with causing him to be denied Admittance into the Tower, as was said in the first Article, he had placed armed Men on London Bridge, and in Southwark, on purpose to murder him.

IV. That he had concealed a Villain in the late King's room, when Prince of Wales, in order to murder him.

V. That he had advised the same Prince, to seize the Crown, before the King his Father's Death.

VI. That in his Letter to the Duke of Bedford, it evidently appeared that his Design was to raise a Civil War in the Kingdom.

The Bishop gave a particular Answer to these Accusations, by explaining such of his Actions as might have been ill construed, or by denying the Facts laid to his Charge (5).

The

That Charles should be reconciled to the Princess of the Blood, princess by the Duke of Burgundy. 2. That he should not protect the Earl of Pontivier. 3. See Statutes. It being feared, that some Quarrel should arise between the Attendants of the Duke of Gloucester, and the Bishop of Winchester, during the session of this Parliament, strict Orders were given, that no Person should come in with Swords, or other warlike Weapons. This Order was literally observed, yet the Lords came with Batts, or great Clubs, from whence this Parliament was called the Parliament of Batts. Comp. Hist. p. 352.

Deputy-Governor of the Tower, a certain Number of defensible Persons, for his more sure keeping in the said Tower: And he was thereunto charged by the Council, that during the time of his said Charge, he should not suffer any Man to go in or out of the Tower stronger than himself, without special Charge or Commission of the King, by the Advice of his Council. 2. To the second he answered, That he never proposed to seize the Crown on the King, or remove him, without the Advice of his Council: For, the doing of it would have been no Advantage to him, nor rather great Pain and Charge. 3. To the third he said, That what armed Men he employed, it was only in his own Defence, for he was often warned,

The Parliament appointing Commissioners to examine the Accusation and Answers, declared, upon their Report, that the Charge was groundless, and acquitted the Bishop. Then they obliged the two Princes to be reconciled. Whereupon they shook hands, and seemingly parted good Friends, but however were no less Enemies to each other.

Mean while, as the Times and Circumstances of Affairs would not allow the Duke of Gloucester to be entirely sacrificed to his Enemy, the Protector took care to procure him also some Satisfaction. In the first Place, he took the Great Seal from the Bishop of Winchester, and gave it to the Bishop of London. Moreover, as it was impossible for the two Adversaries to be together in the Council, without great Prejudice to the King's Affairs, he prevailed with the Bishop to go with him into France, under colour of performing a Vow. But to repair the Injury his Absence might do him, he had leave to solicit a Cardinal's Cap, which was sent him shortly after.

This Affair being thus happily ended, the Protector bestowed John Mowbray, Earl Marshall, to the Title of Duke of Norfolk, which his Father Thomas, was deprived of by Richard II. At the same time (1), he made forty Knights, among whom was the young Duke of York. Hence, doubtless, it is, that this Prince is said to receive in this Parliament the Title of Duke of York, though it is certain he bore it before, as has been observed.

Whilst the Duke of Bedford was thus employed in England, the Constable Richemont levied an Army in Bretagne. He was extremely impatient to show, that he was not unworthy of his Post. By his Care and Credit, this Army amounted to twenty thousand Men. With these numerous Forces, which the Earl of Warwick was not in condition to withstand, he entered Normandy, and took Pontorson about the end of February. Then he laid Siege to St. James de Beuvron, where the English had a strong Garrison. This Siege proved more tedious and difficult than he expected. He had been promised a Convoy of Money, which came not. De Giac, who had the Management of the Treasury, was in no haste to send it, being glad to make him receive some Mortification. He was afraid, if the Constable gained reputation at this Siege, he would grow more haughty and daring, and pretend to rule the Court as he pleased. Mean while, the Army diminished every Day by Desertions. These Disappointments exceedingly troubled the Constable, in a Dread, that his Reputation would be blasted in his first notable Action. In short, he received false Intelligence, that the English were assembling all their Forces to raise the Siege. His fear of a Disgrace, made him resolve to storm the Town, though the Breach was not yet sufficiently wide or prepared. Mean while, to secure himself against the dreaded Relief, he detached two thousand Men, with Orders to post themselves on the Road to Auranche, and oppose the first Efforts of the Enemies, if they came during the Assault. Then he caused the Breach to be vigorously attacked. But the Garrison, which was very numerous, made so brave a Resistance, as gave the Besiegers but small hopes of being Masters of it. Whilst both Sides were fighting with equal Ardor, the Detachment hearing no News of the Enemies, and imagining it dishonorable to expect them in vain, whilst the rest were engaged, hastily returned to assist at the Assault. Their coming threw the Besiegers into a Panic. They fancied, the Detachment being repulsed by the Enemies, were flying for Refuge to the Camp, and in this Belief relinquished the Assault. The Constable did all he could to undeceive them, but the Disorder was already so great, that it was not possible to make them renew the Fight. Mean time, the Besieged seeing the Confusion that prevailed in the Camp, sallied out, and suddenly falling upon Troops already terrified, easily put them to Flight. The Constable himself was forced to follow them, and leave his Baggage and Artillery in the Power of his Enemies, extremely concerned to see all his Projects confounded, by this unfortunate Accident. However, as he had not lost many Men, he found himself still able, after drawing his Army together, to march into Angou, and take la Flèche and Galarand belonging to the English.

The taking of these two Places, was not however capable of comforting him for his misfortune before St. James's. He openly accused de Giac of being the Cause; and regardless of the King's Resentment, resolved to be revenged.

The Moment he returned to Court, after the Campaign, which the Desertion of his Troops obliged him to end sooner than he would, he caused de Giac to be seized in his Bed, and by a Sentence, as violent as irregular and rash, ordered him to be strangled, and then thrown into the Loire. After that, he boldly declared, he would serve in the same manner, any Person whatever, that should endeavour to ingross the King's Favour. The Camus of Beaulieu not being terrified with these Threats, and accepting de Giac's Place, which was offered him, was, by the Constable's means, assassinated in the King's own Palace, and even before his Eyes. His Pride could not bear any Person at Court, that was not his Creature. By the way, this monstrous Arrogance ill agrees with the excessive Commendations bestowed on this Prince.

Charles was so provoked at these haughty Proceedings, that he would not see the Constable. Nay, he could not hear him mentioned without horror. But his Displeasure was little regarded by a Man, who had for him both the Nobles and People. In the King's Extremity, every one thought he did him a Favour to serve him. Upon the least discontent, he was threatened to be left, for the English, who received with open Arms those that submitted to their King. Besides, the Earl of Warwick had now invested Montargis about a Month, and the King had no other way to relieve that Place, but by the help of the Bretons. So, notwithstanding the Constable's outrageous Affronts, he gave leave, at the Instance of La Trimouille, that this proud Prince should pay his Respects to him. But his Affairs were not more advanced by it.

Whilst the Duke of Bedford was in England, the Earl of Warwick, who commanded in France, did all that lay in his power, to keep the Affairs of the English in good State. He found himself at first too weak to oppose the Constable's entrance into Normandy; but upon News that the Bretons had disbanded themselves, because there was no Money to pay them, he thought himself able to make some Attempt. With a Body of five thousand Men he entered Maine, and retook several Castles, which the Bretons had seized. The surprizing of Places was then so frequent, that sometimes the same Town changed Master twice or thrice in one Year. But there would be no end, if the Circumstances of every Particular were related. The Earl of Warwick seeing, the Constable's Defeat before St. James's, the Desertion of his Troops, and the Broils in Charles's Court, had long disabled the French from having an Army in the Field, formed a Design to become Master of Montargis. This Place was necessary for the Execution of the Regent's Project, to carry the War beyond the Loire. Indeed, the English General could not expect, with his few Troops, to take Montargis, by a Siege in Form; but was in hopes, the Place, being closely blocked up, would be forced to surrender, before it could be relieved. The River Loin parting into three Branches near this Town, there was a necessity to separate the Troops into three different Quarters, the principal of which the Earl of Warwick commanded. The second was intrusted with the Earl of Suffolk, and the third with John de la Pale his Brother. These Quarters were joined by Bridges of Communication, and in this Posture the English patiently waited, till Hunger should constrain the Besieged to capitulate.

The Blockade had now lasted three Months, and King Charles had taken no care about relieving the Place. At length, the Besieged acquainting him that they could no longer resist, without Assistance, he cast his Eyes on the Constable for that Undertaking. But Richemont, who had now no Army, refused the Commission, being unwilling with new-leived Troops to expose himself to a Disgrace, like that of St. James. Upon his Refusal, the Management of this Expedition was committed to the Bastard of Orleans (2), who was returned from Avignon, where he had retired with Louvet his Father-in-law. This young Lord, then but Twenty-two Years of Age, had already made eight Campaigns, and on several occasions given signal Proofs of his Conduct and Courage. He must needs have been young, to take such an Enterprize upon him, with only sixteen hundred Men, against the Earl of Warwick (3), whose Reputation was equal to that of the greatest Generals.

that my Lord of Gloucester intended them bodily harm. 4. To the fourth he returns but an indifferent Answer, saying only in general, That he was ever true to all those that were his Sovereign Lords, and never purposed Treason or Untruth against any of them, especially King Henry V. By whom, he adds, he was let in a place of such great Trust as that of Chancellor. 5. To the fifth he says, That it is a mere Calumny. 6. As to the words in his Letter, which were, "By my youth if you try, we shall put this Land in adventure, with a Field, such a Brother you have here." He affirms, That he did not thereby mean, he would assemble People against the King's Peace; but his meaning was, that there were like to be Insurrections in London, upon occasion of some Orders made by the Mayor and Aldermen, against the excessive Wages of Masons, Carpenters, and other Workmen; and the Duke of Gloucester did not use so much Diligence, as he ought to have done, in suppressing those Troubles. Therefore the Duke of Bedford's coming was the more necessary. See a full account of this whole Matter in Hall's Chron. fol. 94--99.

1426. The Besieged having notice that Succours were preparing, let go their Sluices to favour them. The Lain was so swollen thereby, that the Bridges of Communication between the English Quarters were over-flowed. The Bishop of Orleans arriving in the mean time, thought, as there could not be a more favorable opportunity, he ought immediately to attack the Enemies, before the Waters were fallen. He gave half his Troops to La Hire to attack Pole's Quarter, and with the other half fell upon the Earl of Suffolk. It was a strange sort of Battle, the Soldiers on both Sides, standing up to their Middle in Water. At last, after a long Resistance, the two Quarters attacked, were forced, with the loss of fifteen hundred Men on the Side of the English; many of which were drowned in endeavouring to pass into the other Quarter, by reason the Bridges were under Water. Warwick finding it impossible to assist his Men, chose to retreat in good order. This Action acquired the Bastard of Orleans a great Reputation, being from that time considered as a Person, that would one Day become a famous General.

Since the end of the last Year, the Dukes of Burgundy and Gloester, had been preparing for their single Combat, which probably, as it was not fought at the time appointed, namely, St. George's Day, was deferred by Consent. Though these two Princes seemed to have nothing more to manage, and the Decision of the Affairs of Hainault was likely to depend on the Success of their Combat, the Duke of Burgundy did not think himself obliged to confound his personal Quarrel with the Duke of Brabant's Affairs, or to neglect the Advantages procured him by the Truce, to put that Prince in possession of his Wife's Dominions. He no sooner saw the Duke of Gloester out of Hainault, but he began by secret Emisaries, to cabal among the chief Men of the Country, for the delivery of Jacqueline, who continued at Mons. The Countess her Mother, ever a Friend to the House of Burgundy, came into the Plot, though she took care to conceal it from her Daughter. When Matters were ripe, the Towns of Hainault suddenly declared for the Duke of Brabant, and the Earl of St. Pol his Brother appeared before Mons with an Army. Then the Magistrates of the City, pretending a fright, and intimating, they could not alone bear the Brunt of the War, entered into Treaty with him. As every thing had been privately settled, they promised to deliver Jacqueline to the Duke of Burgundy, till the Pope should decide the Difference in question. All this was transacted unknown to Jacqueline, who heard nothing of the Matter till it was too late to help it. She writ to the Duke of Gloester, complaining of being basely betrayed, but her Complaints were in vain. On the 13th of June 1426, she was forced to go from Mons, under the Conduct of the Prince of Orange, who guarded her as far as Gant, where she was to reside. After that, all Hainault unanimously received the Duke of Brabant for Sovereign.

Jacqueline was intrusted to see herself a Prisoner. But perceiving, Resistance would but render her Condition more grievous, she feigned to be pleased, that her Affair was left to the Pope's Determination. This Dissimulation procured her a mild and honorable Treatment, which she knew how to improve. In September, she found means to escape in Man's Cloaths, and retire into Holland. She was well received by some of her Subjects, whilst others chose rather to adhere to the Duke of Burgundy; knowing how difficult it would be to support her against so potent an Enemy. The Duke, vexed that his Prey had escaped him, carried the War into Holland, to hinder her from fortifying herself in that Country. This War, which is foreign to our History, lasted the Year 1427, and part of 1428. I shall hereafter relate the Success, and in the mean time must return to what passed in France.

The Earl of Warwick's loss before Montargis, and the Necessity of garrisoning so many Towns, prevented his keeping the Field. Besides, the Duke of Bedford had ordered him to spare his Troops against an important Expedition, which it was not yet proper to discover. All this while, Charles was in no better Condition. The Advantage lately gained by his Troops, had not augmented his Forces. Thus both Sides were forced to remain unactive, or at least to content themselves with Attempts to surprize some Places.

In the beginning of this Year, the Earl of Fois, who had at length taken part with King Charles, sent him a Body of Troops, under the Command of Count d'Orval, of the House of Alvra. This General approaching Mons, where the Earl of Suffolk was with a few Soldiers, held Intelligence with some of the Burghers, who promised to deliver the City. Accordingly, he was admitted, and the Earl of Suffolk forced to retire into the Castle, where he had but three days Provisions. In this Extremity, he sent to Talbot, who was at Amiens, desiring him to endeavour to relieve him. Talbot lost not a Moment. By the next Night, he was with some Troops at the foot of the Castle, towards the Country, and entered at a Postern-Gate, whilst d'Orval thought himself safe in the City, not imagining the Besieged could be so soon relieved. At Break of day, Suffolk and Talbot sallied out of the Castle, and taking the French unprepared, drove them before them quite out of the City. Thus the Place was almost as soon recovered as lost, by the extraordinary Diligence of Talbot, one of the bravest and most experienced Leaders of the Age.

After this Expedition, the two Generals marched to Laon, a little Town in Maine, and carried it with Ease. Then joining the Earl of Warwick, who was marching to those Parts, they besieged Pontorson, taken by the Constable Richemont last Year. As this Siege was very long, I shall leave the Generals there, in order to relate what passed elsewhere.

The Duke of Bedford was arrived from England the beginning of this Year (1), according to the English Writers, or some Months sooner, if we believe the French, with a Reinforcement that rendered him formidable. The Bishop of Winchester came with him, who had received at Calais, a Cardinal's Cap, given with great Ceremony. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was generally stiled the Cardinal of England, doubtless, because he was of the Royal Family. And yet the English Authors seem to have been ignorant of this Circumstance, since they always call him only the Cardinal of Winchester. I shall give him the same Title for the future, in conformity to other Historians, who mention him only by that Name. Shortly after, the Bishop was made the Pope's Legate in England, and thereby had opportunity to increase his Riches and Credit, to the great Prejudice of the Duke of Gloester his Enemy.

The Siege of Pontorson still continued, without King Charles's being able to relieve that Town. He had then much more important Affairs upon his Hands, and which more nearly concerned him. The Constable Richemont was retired to Vannes in Bretagne, extremely displeased at the King's Coldness. Since his receiving the Constable's Sword, he had done nothing to answer the great Expectations he had raised of his Valour and Abilities. On the contrary, instead of advancing the King's Affairs, he had rendered the Royal Authority so contemptible, by his Pride and Oppressions, and violent Doings, that Charles was, as I may say, less a King than before. The Princes and great Men at Court, after his Example, took upon them to give Law to their Sovereign. Since the Death of Beaulieu, la Trimouille was the sole Favorite, and had such an Ascendant over the King, that nothing was done but by his Direction. The Constable thought at first, to have been a great gainer by this Change, because the new Favorite had always professed a Friendship for him, but was quickly convinced of the contrary. His Behaviour to the former Ministers, making this apprehensive of the same Treatment, he used his utmost Endeavours to inflame the King's Aversion for him. The whole Court quickly perceived it, with extreme Concern. The great Men could expect no Preferments, unless the King's Affairs were in a good Situation, and were persuaded, the Constable alone was capable of restoring them. For this and several other Reasons, la Trimouille grew exceedingly odious. This Hatred was carried so far, that at last a Confederacy was formed against him, of which the Earls of Clermont and De la Marche his Cousin, were the Heads. They began with an Attempt upon his Life, after Richemont's Example. Having notice that the King was gone to Loches, and had left la Trimouille at Bourges, they assembled some Troops, and marched thither to seize the Favorite. But they found he was already gone after the King. However, not to lose their labour entirely, they resolved to carry away La Borde and De Prie, two of his Creatures, who were retired into the great Tower. De Prie was killed in defending himself, but La Borde held out, till the King himself came to rescue him. This Affair turned to a Civil War, which, after lasting some Months, was at length ended by the Duke of Alençon's Mediation. This young Prince, who was taken Prisoner at the Battle of Vernouil, was lately released by the Duke of Burgundy's Intercession, who, though an Enemy of King Charles, fought all occasions to gain the Friendship of the French Princes. But it cost the Duke of Alençon two hundred thousand Crowns, a very considerable Sum at all times, but especially at the Time we are speaking of. To procure this Money, he was forced to part with his Jewels, and sell the Duke of Bretagne the Town of Fougères, at a very low rate. In return for his late Ser-1427. vice to the King, Charles made him a Present of fourcore thousand Crowns, though himself was in great want. Mean while, la Trimouille still kept his Post at Court.

While Charles was employed in quelling his Domestic Enemies, the Duke of Bedford was intent upon executing a Design, formed before he left England; and that was, to reduce the Duke of Bretagne to the Obedience of King Henry. Ever since June he had caused Pontorson to be beleagued (1), a strong Town on the Borders of Bretagne, which might have been a great Obstacle to his Entrance into that Dukedom, had it continued in the Hands of the French. This Siege, which had been very long, being ended (2), the Duke of Bedford repaired to the Army, with a Reinforcement which increased it to twenty thousand Men. With this powerful Body, to which he knew his Enemies had nothing like it to oppose, he prepared to enter Bretagne, threatening the Country with utter Destruction. Whether the Duke of Bretagne was surprized, or, was glad to have an excuse to abandon King Charles, whom he had joined only out of Condescension to the Constable his Brother, he wisely prevented the impending Danger. He was very sensible, Charles was not able to protect him. Besides, he was displeased with him on the Constable's account. For these Reasons, he sent Ambassadors to the Duke of Bedford, to sue for Peace, upon what Terms he pleased.

Though it was in the Regent's Power to be revenged of the Duke of Bretagne, he thought it his duty, to prefer the Interests of the King his Nephew, to his own Satisfaction. Indeed, it was much more advantageous for the King, to make of the Duke of Bretagne a willing Friend, by treating him civilly, than a private Enemy, by using him rigorously. So, he required nothing more of him, than to swear to the Peace of Troye, and cause all his States to do the same, pursuant to his Engagements with Henry V (3); and to promise with an Oath to do Homage to young Henry when required. This Moderation made great Impression on the Duke of Bretagne, who, ever after, proved a Friend to the English, even in the decline of their Affairs. On the other hand, though the Regent perceived, he could expect no great Assistance from the Duke of Bretagne, by reason of the Influence, the Constable his Brother had over him, yet he thought the gaining that Prince from Charles's Party, was no small Advantage to the English.

I left the Duke of Burgundy at War with Jaquelina in Holland, under the specious Pretence of supporting the Honour and Interest of the Duke of Brabant his Cousin; though, as the Sequel will discover, in reality, it was only for his own private Views. This War, as may be imagined, did not turn much to Jaquelina's Advantage. There was too great a Disproportion between the two Parties. The Duke of Gloucester was not able of himself to give his Dukes the Assistance he wanted. To that end, he must have employed the Publick Revenues of England, or procured an extraordinary Subsidy of the Parliament. But that was not easily to be obtained, at a time, when the War in France was expensive to the Nation. However, in the Parliament held this Year, the Duke had Interest enough to procure a small Aid. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Parliament petitioned the King, to assign the Duke of Gloucester, the Sum of five thousand Marks, out of the Subsidy granted him, to enable him to assist his Dukes. To this Sum, the King advanced five thousand Marks, upon the Salary annexed to the Protectorship. With this Aid the Duke sent a Reinforcement of some English Troops, under the Command of Silvester (4). But these Troops being defeated by the Duke of Burgundy, presently after their landing, Jaquelina found herself reduced to a very sad Condition. In short, by the Duke of Bedford's Intercession, she obtained a Truce, during which the Duke of Gloucester was brought to consent, that his Affair with the Duke of Brabant, should be decided by the Pope. It must be observed, that the Duke of Bedford had now annulled the single Combat, between the Dukes of Burgundy and Gloucester. Some time after, the Pope published his Sentence, annulling Jaquelina's Marriage with the Duke of Gloucester, and confirming her first Marriage with the Duke of Brabant (5), who survived but a few Months this Determination, and was succeeded by the Earl of St. Pol his Brother. By the death of the Duke her Husband, Jaquelina ought to have had peaceable possession of her Dominions. But the Duke of Burgundy discovered on this occasion, that the Duke of Brabant's Interest, was not the Motive of his Proceedings. He so ordered it, that Jaquelina's Subjects refused to receive her, and made himself Mediator between them. The Lion in the Fable was literally practised in this Agreement. The Duke obliged Jaquelina, to commit to him the Government of her Dominions, appoint him her Heir, and promise never to marry again (6).

All the Historians generally fix these Occurrences to the Year 1427. And yet it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this Affair was not ended May the 18th, 1428. At least the Duke of Gloucester and Jaquelina had not yet submitted to the Pope's Sentence; for there, Henry VI, speaking of this Princess, calls her Jaquette, Duchess of Gloucester and Holland, his well-beloved Aunt. Probably, the Duke of Brabant's Death, had put them in hopes, that their Marriage might be confirmed, or a Dispensation obtained to marry again. Accordingly, it was on this account doubtless, that the Duke of Burgundy exacted from Jaquelina the forementioned Conditions, in order to deprive the Duke of Gloucester, of all hopes of ever setting foot again in the Low-Countries. Be this as it will, the Duke of Gloucester, preflated by his Brother and the Council, who saw how prejudicial to the King's Affairs his Obtinacy was, desisted from his Pretensions. He relinquished Jaquelina, and shortly after married Eleanor Cobham (7), whom he had long kept as his Mistress. Thus ended the Quarrel, which had proved so fatal to England (8).

Though the English were no longer concerned in Jaquelina's Affairs, it will not however be improper briefly to relate the Success; and withal, show the Growth of the House of Burgundy's Greatness. This Princess, notwithstanding her involuntary Engagement, married afterwards Borst, a Zelander, which obliged the Duke of Burgundy to make War upon them. Borst being made Prisoner, Jaquelina was forced, in order to free him, to agree, that her Children by her late Marriage, should be incapable of inheriting her Dominions, and to deliver all her Towns to the Duke of Burgundy. She still lived ten Years, and after her Death, the Duke of Burgundy was acknowledged for Earl of Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Lord of Friesland. Before Jaquelina's Death, he had taken possession of the Earldoms of Zutphen and Namur, of which, he had purchased the Reversion, after the Decease of the Earl of Namur, which happened in 1428. In 1430, he inherited the Duchies of Brabant, Lothier, Limbourg, and the Marquise of Anvers, by the Death of Philip Duke of Brabant his Cousin, who left no Issue. All these Dominions, joined to Flanders, Artois, the two Burgundies, and the Towns on the Somme held of the King of England, put him upon a Level with the crowned Heads. Let us return now to the War in France.

The English had still a great Superiority over King Charles. Though the Buifels of Hainault had somewhat disordered their Affairs, they were, however, notwithstanding that Diversion, in so flourishing a Condition, as seemed to promise certain Success. The Duke of Bretagne no longer gave them any Uneasiness. The Earl of Richmond his Brother was at Variance with King Charles, without any probability of a Reconciliation. The Duke of Burgundy, freed from the Holland War, could for the future powerfully assist his Allies. In fine, besides their numberless Garrisons in the Kingdom, the Regent had on foot a Body of twenty thousand Men, and moreover expected a strong Reinforcement with the Earl of Salisbury from England.

On the other hand, King Charles was without Allies, and without Refuge. It is true, in order to obtain Succours from Scotland, he was negotiating a Marriage between the Dauphin his Son, and Margaret Daughter of King James, though they were yet both in their Infancy.

Statute-Book.

1428. But this was a distant Prospect. Besides, the King of Scotland had no way shown an Inclination to break the Truce with the English. So, Charles seeing no appearance of supporting himself, seemed to have entirely given over all care of preventing the Designs of his Enemies. He lived in a surprizing Indolence, without losing any of his usual Diversions.

fol. 37.

The Consideration of the Posture of the Affairs of the two Nations, made the Duke of Bedford conclude, the War would soon end, and two or three Campaigns infallibly drive Charles out of the Kingdom. He resolved therefore to exert his utmost, during so favorable an Opportunity. But as he had many Troops, it was necessary first to provide for their Subsistence. For that purpose, he held an Assembly of the chief Men at Paris, to whom, he proposed revoking all the Grants made to the Church for forty Years past. But he met with so strong opposition from the Clergy, that, not to alienate the Affection of so powerful a Body, he was obliged to desist, and to make use of other Means for the Maintenance of his Army.

Before he began the Execution of his Projects, he lost the Assistance of the brave Earl of Warwick, who returned into England, being appointed Governor to the King. He was designed for this Place, immediately after the Death of the Duke of Exeter in 1426. But as he was necessary in France, his Patent was not drawn up till the 1st of June this Year. Probably, it was thought proper to stay, till the Earl of Salisbury, who was to lead a strong Reinforcement to the Duke of Bedford, was ready to depart.

The Regent's
Design.

The Earl of Salisbury arrived in France in July, with five thousand Men (1), raised at his own Charge, pursuant to an Agreement with the Council (2). Upon his Arrival at Paris, the Regent gave him the Command of an Army of sixteen thousand Men. This was more than sufficient to be Master of the Field, King Charles not being able to set on foot any such Body of Troops. The Regent's Design was, to drive Charles beyond the Loire, knowing, that when once that Prince was at a Distance, all his Towns, on this Side the River, would surrender of Course for want of Succours. To this end, it was necessary to take from him the Places, which preserved the Communication with the Northern Provinces, in order to deprive him of all hopes of returning.

Salisbury

Loire.
Montfret.

It was with this view, that the Earl of Salisbury, assisted by the Earls of Suffolk, Talbot, Fastolf, and several other famous Leaders, marched towards the Loire, the beginning of August. Orleans was the most important Place in those Parts. It belonged to the Duke of Orleans, who was Prisoner in England, ever since the Battle of Azincourt. The pretended Treaty, as I observed, between Henry V. and the Duke of Orleans, concerning the Neutrality of this City, is a meer Chimera. It was invented to render the Siege of Orleans odious, and make it believed, that Heaven interposed in favour of France, to punish the pretended perfidiousness of the English.

The Siege of Orleans resolved.
Act. Pub.
X. p. 408.

Be this as it will, the Earl of Salisbury holding a great Council of War, it was resolved to besiege Orleans. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that this Resolution was taken without the Duke of Bedford's Knowledge, and contrary to his Opinion. To succeed in this Undertaking, the neighbouring Places, which might annoy the Besiegers, were first to be secured. Accordingly, the Months of August and September were spent in that Work. During that Space, the English took Jenville, Mehun, Baugency, Gergeau, Clerly, Sully, and some other small Towns, and at last, appeared before Orleans the 12th of October.

The French
lay in Stores.
Act. Pub.
X. p. 408.
Montfret.

The French easily perceived, by all the English General's Proceedings, that he intended to besiege Orleans. Accordingly, whilst he was elsewhere employed, they had sent thither both Men and Ammunition (3). Gaucour, a Creature of the Duke of Orleans, commanded there, though he was still a Prisoner of the English, and released upon his Parole, only to have means to provide his Ransom. He had even been recalled ever since June. The Bastard of Orleans, d'Orval, La Hire, Xaintrailles, Thouars, Bouffiac, Chabannes, La Fayette, Graville, and several other Officers of Note, had thrown themselves into the City, to acquire Reputation in the Service of their Sovereign.

The English Army not being sufficiently numerous to invest the City on all Sides, the Besiegers received Succours in the very beginning of the Siege. But the Earl of Salisbury, who considered this Enterprize as a decisive Action for the King his Master, and his own Reputation, omitted nothing to deprive the Besieged of that Advantage. He run up round the City sixty Forts or Redoubts, called then Bastilles. How great soever this Work might be, nothing could divert him from it, since the Success of the Siege entirely depended upon it. In vain would he have pushed his Attacks, if the Enemies could continually introduce fresh Supplies. Besides, the Season, now far advanced, suggested to him, that he would be forced to pass the Winter in the Camp, and during that time be liable to many Inforts.

Among the sixty Forts, there were six much stronger than the rest, upon the six principal Avenues of the City. The French could before with ease introduce Convoys into the Place, and had made frequent use of that Advantage. But after these Forts were built, it was with extreme Difficulty, that they could, now and then, give some Assistance to the Besieged. Upon these six great Redoubts the General erected Batteries, which thundered against the Walls. But as the Artillery was not then in its present Perfection, it must not be imagined, the Canons did the same Execution as now.

It would be tedious to relate all the Particulars of this Siege, the Attacks, Salies, and daily Skirmishes, either to introduce or repulse Convoys. It may easily be judged, that one of the strongest Places of France, defended by a numerous Garrison, under the Conduct of the bravest and most experienced General Officers then in France; and assaulted by Englishmen, deemed the most undaunted Warriors in the World; furnished the Besiegers and Besieged with frequent Occasions to exercise their Valour.

Charles readily perceived, the taking of Orleans would deprive him of the Advantage, of continuing the War in the northern Provinces of the Kingdom: But, as he had neither Men nor Money, could not raise the Siege. However, he approached it, and came to Chinon, where he convened the chief Men, and obtained an Aid of Money. Whilst he was in this Place, the Constable Richemont sent him an Offer of his Service. But in whatever Distress he might be, and however great his Want was of a speedy Assistance, he could not resolve to forgive him.

Mean while, the Siege was vigorously prosecuted. The English Bulwark of the Tournelles (4) being much shaken by the Besiegers Cannon, and the Besieged thinking it proper to set it on Fire, the English extinguished the Flames, and lodged themselves in that Post. At the same time they became Masters of the Tower on the Bridge, from whence the whole City could be viewed. The taking of this Tower proved fatal to the Earl of Salisbury. One the 14th of May, as he was looking out of a Window, a Cannon-shot from the City hit him as it passed on the Right Side of his Head, carried away his Cheek, and struck out one of his Eyes. He died a few Days after at Mehun, where he had been removed (5). This Loss, though very great to the English, interrupted not the Siege. The Earl of Suffolk taking the Command of the Army, continued the Attacks as vigorously as before, assisted by Talbot, one of the bravest and most experienced Captains of his Age.

There was nothing every Day but continual Assaults, Salies, Skirmishes, wherein the Besieged behaved with equal Bravery and Conduct. Notwithstanding the Precautions used by the English, to prevent Succours from being thrown into the City, Troops and Convoys were, from time to time, introduced, though always by Dint of Sword. Thus the Garrison, which at first consisted only of twelve hundred Men, was become three thousand strong by the end of December. On the other hand, the Army of the Besiegers was encreased to three and twenty thousand, by the Supplies perpetually sent by the Regent, so that the Siege daily grew more important and difficult.

The English had now been four Months before Orleans, and the Success of their Enterprize was yet doubtful. The Regent, who began to be uneasy at the length of the Siege, was confirmed more and more in his Opinion, that it was a rash Undertaking. However to neglect nothing in his Power, he sent from Paris a Convoy of Salt-Fish (6), the Lent Season of the Year 1429 being come. He left the Conduct of it to Fastolf, one of the bravest 1429. and most able Generals the English, then had (1), and gave him a Guard of seventeen hundred Men (2). Charles having notice, of the Day the Convooy was to set out from Paris, resolved to way-lay it. He commissioned the Earl of Clermont for that purpose, who, at the Head of three thousand Men, attacked the Convooy on the Road to Orleans, February the 12th, at seven in the Morning. Faustell having heard of the Approach of the French, had made an Intrenchment with his Carriages, behind which he had secured himself against their first Charge. It was indeed very vigorous, but the English sustained it with such resolution, that, instead of being routed by the first Shock, they put their Enemies into extreme Disorder, by the great Slaughter of their Men. When Faustell saw the Confusion, he ordered the Carriages to be removed, and falling upon the French Troops, already disheartened, entirely defeated them with great Slaughter. Six score Lords or Officers of Note fell that Day, besides a great Number of Common Soldiers (3). The Bastard of Orleans, who had fallen out to assist the Earl of Clermont in deserting the Convooy, preserving a Preference of Mind in this Rout, found means to re-enter the City with four hundred Men. This Action was called The Battle of Herrings.

King Charles was extremely dejected upon News of this Defeat. He saw himself upon the Point of losing Orleans, and was sensible of the Consequences of the Loss. The Thoughts of seeing the English savage the Province beyond the Loire, and thereby disable him from continuing the War, could not but trouble him exceedingly. This Misfortune would infallibly follow, upon their being Masters of Orleans. In this Distress, he devised an Expedient, proper, as he thought, to rob them of this Advantage; reckoning they would be so blind as not to see through his Artifice. This was, to send to the commanding Officers a Power to deliver the Place to the Duke of Burgundy, to be kept in Trust till the end of the War. Xaintrailles and others, who were appointed to treat of this Affair, going to Paris, made the Duke of Bedford the Offer, who laughed at the Stratagem. He plainly told them, it was a great Mistake to think, he would beat the Bush, for another, to run away with the Game. Some say, the Duke of Burgundy was extremely offended with this Reply, and even withdrew his Troops from the Siege. But this is a mere Invention. The Duke of Burgundy had no reason to complain, that the Regent refused to deliver a Place of that Importance to him, to please his Enemies. Besides, we shall see presently, the Regent was all along very well satisfied with the Duke of Burgundy, as well during the Siege as after.

Charles not succeeding in his Project, and seeing no other way to save Orleans, began now to think of retiring into Dauphiné, when a very extraordinary Accident gave a sudden Turn to the Affairs of the two contending Nations. We are going to see the frangest and most unexpected Revolution, ever mentioned in History. The French from vanquished, are going to be on a sudden victorious; and the English, hitherto deemed invincible, are going to be every where defeated, and at last driven out of the Kingdom. And what is more surprising in this Revolution, is the Instrument by which it was caused. But before I enter upon Particulars, I must warn the Reader, that in what I am going to relate concerning this strange Event, I follow the French Authors, without however warranting the Truth of all their Assertions.

About the end of February, 1429, a Country Girl, called Joan of Arc, a Village in Domremy (4) in Lorraine, came to Robert de Baudricourt, Governor of Vaucouleurs, and told him, she had received express Orders from God to raise the Siege of Orleans, and crown King Charles at Rheims. Baudricourt at first considered the Girl as a Visionary, but afterwards finding she talked very sensibly in the rest of her Discourses, he thought fit to send her to the King, who was still at Chinon. Charles being informed, that Joan of Arc was coming, declared, that Maria d'Anjou a Nun, had formerly told him, Heaven would arm one of her Sex in Defence of France. Adding, that perhaps this Girl was the Person designed by Heaven. 'Twas sufficient to satisfy the Court beforehand, that Joan of Arc's Calling was miraculous. The supernatural Mission perfectly squared with the Sentiments of the Queen, of Agnes Sorrel the King's Mistress, and of the principal Courtiers, who used all possible Endeavours to dissuade the King from his purpose to retire into Dauphiné.

So, nothing was more proper to divert him from this Retreat, than the hopes of a Change in his Fortune. However this be, in these Dispositions, was Joan of Arc expected. The first time she appeared at Court, she addressed herself directly to the King, discovering him among all his Courtiers, though she had never seen him, and he had taken care to have nothing about him, to distinguish him. However, he seemed at first to make no great Account of this Girl. But as she earnestly pressed him to credit her Words, which were the same she had spoken to Baudricourt, he resolved to have her examined. The Divines, her Examiners, declared, upon what Ground I know not, that her Mission was divine. Then she was sent to the Parliament at Poitiers, who were of the same Opinion. Lastly, to confirm this Belief, the King declared, she had told him Secrets, which no Mortal knew but himself.

Every one being now predisposed, that Joan of Arc, commonly called la Pucelle [or the Maid] was sent from God to save France, she was looked upon with Eyes of Admiration. All her Actions, Words, and Gestures were construed to her Advantage. There was discovered in her, a fine Genius, solid Judgment, Greatness of Soul, and a Knowledge very unusual in one of her Sex and Condition. This was the common Effect of Prejudice. Thus far there is nothing that should seem very strange. It is easy to conceive, that this might be a Contrivance to revive the Courage of the French, and perhaps of the King himself, dismayed at so many Losses, and beholding the Kingdom just going to fall under the Dominion of Foreigners. But that this Invention, if it be one, should succeed according to the Design of the Authors, is what may indeed be just cause of Admiration, and afford ample Matter for moral and political Reflections.

Mean while, the Siege of Orleans being vigorously prosecuted, Charles resolved to try to throw a Convooy into the City. Joan desiring to be of the Party, and to have Arms and a Man's Habit, easily obtained her Request (5). To render herself more remarkable, she would have a certain Sword sent for, from the Tomb of a Knight buried in the Church of St. Catherine de Fierbois. The Convooy designed for Orleans departed April the 25th. Several French Writers affirm, that Joan commanded the Guard, and conducted the Convooy into the City, but Montfaucon, a cotemporary Author, says the contrary. The Convooy being arrived on the 29th in the Morning, near the Burgundian Gate, the Bastard of Orleans made a Sally to favour their Passage. A fierce and bloody Battle ensued, wherein, after a long resistance, the English were defeated, and forced to let the Convooy go in (6). Joan made her Entry into Orleans, amidst the Generals, and Acclamations of the People, who ascribed to her the good Success of that Day.

On the 4th of May, Joan, at the head of a Detachment of the Garrison, attacked, Sword in hand, the Fort of St. Loup, one of the six largest before-mentioned. After a Conflict of four Hours, the Fort was carried, and 400 of the twelve hundred English who defended it (7), four hundred were killed on the Spot. Two Days after, she assaulted likewise the Fort of St. John; but as it was almost abandoned by the English, she met with little Resistance. Presently after, without giving her Troops any Respite, she led them against the Fort, called Laumont, the most considerable of the six, built upon the Ruins of the Church of the Augustines. Notwithstanding the gallant Resistance of the English, this was also taken, with great Loss on their Side. Joan's Troops thought of resting themselves, after so hard Duty, but immediately she marched them to the Fort of the Tourneilles. But as she could not attack it that Evening, for want of day-light, she kept it invested all Night. On the morning, at Break of Day, the Assault began, and lasted fourteen Hours without Intermission. The French were repulsed four several times, and as often renewed the Charge; Joan animating them by her Words and Actions, though wounded with an Arrow between the Neck and Shoulders. At length, about eight at Night, the Fort was carried like the rest, and six hundred English cut in Pieces. In all these Actions, Joan shewed a Valour and Resolution very uncommon in Persons of her Sex (8).

It may easily be guessed, how great was the Consternation of the English, after the ill Success of that Day. The Loss of four of their largest Forts not permitting

Here is a Fragment of the Duke of Bedford's Letter to the King his Nephew, after the raising of the Siege of Orleans, which shews how much the English, and the Duke of Bedford himself, were discouraged by this unexpected Event.

The great Liberation of the French and English.

The raising of the Siege of Orleans ushered in the Decline of the English Affairs. From that time, the French and English seemed to have mutually changed Tempers and Characters. The English were seized with a Spirit of Fear and Amazement, whilst the French were filled with a Courage, almost entirely lost since the Battles of Asincourt and Verneuil. Though, after the raising of the Siege, the French exceeded not six thousand, they fearlessly and briskly pursued the English, who, though they were still superior in Number, retreated in a strange Disorder.
Their Confinement was such, that they knew not what they did. Instead of keeping together, to withstand their Enemies, they amused themselves with throwing numerous Garrisons into the Places, conquered before the Siege, about the Laire. By that means they so weakened themselves, that they were no longer able to expect their Enemies who were closely pursuing them. As they dreaded a Battle as much as they were wont to desire it, they retired at a Distance, and gave the French time to retake these Places one after another. The Earl of Suffolk was made Prisoner in Gergeau, where he had imprudently shut himself up, with four hundred Men only (2), which must have proceeded from his Confinement at the Defeat of his Troops. Of all the Places in those Parts, Baugenci held out the longest, but could not help undergoing the same Fate with the rest. In short, Disorder and Confusion had so possessed the English, that Charles, by Joan's Advice, resolved to be crowned at Rheims. Mean time this City was still in the hands of the English. Besides, there was a Necessity of travelling above one hundred and twenty Miles of the Enemies Country, and of taking several Places, which at any other time he would not have ventured to approach. Strange Effect of the Terror struck into the English by a Woman, and of the Confidence instilled into their Enemies by the same!

The Constable brings in Joan.

The Constable Richement, seeing the Prosperity of the King's Affairs, began to abate of his haughtiness. Hitherto he imagined himself necessary, but the late Events made him sensible, he might be entirely forgotten, and lose his Share of the Glory the King was, probably, going to acquire. In this belief, he assembled all his Friends, and forming a Body of twelve hundred Horse, and twelve thousand Foot, he marched to join the King who was then before Baugenci. The Duke of Bretagne doubtless, connived at this Levy in his Country; the late Revolution causing him to alter his measures. Whilst the Constable was upon his march, La Trimouille, who desired not his Company at Court, artfully persuaded the King, he was coming with a numerous Army, to have his Person in his Power. This first Impression so affected the King, that he was going to raise the Siege of Baugenci, and give the Constable Battle, but upon better Information, was pleased to receive him with his Succours. It was however upon very mortifying Terms to a Prince of his Character. It was required of him, that he should not pretend to govern the King, nor be present at the Coronation, where La Trimouille was unwilling to be out-shone.

Baugenci being taken, the King had Intelligence, that the English were assembling in Beauce. Whereupon Charles holding a Council of War, it was unanimously resolved to give them Battle. Indeed, there was no probability of going to Rheims, with the Enemies in the Rear. Charles's Army was then ten thousand strong (3), including the Bretans, brought by the Constable. But of the twenty two thousand English, lately before Orleans, there was left but six thousand with Talbot, who had taken the Command of the Army, after Suffolk was Prisoner. By an effect of the great Amazement of the English, since the Affair of Orleans, they suffered themselves to be surprized near Patay, by the French, who appeared in Sight before they had heard any thing of them. They had scarce time to draw up, which was done in such Confusion, that they made but a very faint Resistance. Talbot alone maintained the Fight, by his Valour and Conduct. But at last, the General being taken Prisoner, the English Army was routed, with the loss of two thousand five hundred Men (4). Faifol run away with the flying Troops, seized by one of those sudden Terrors, which, for the time, deprive a Man of the use of his Reason, and may happen to the most Courageous (5).

If the raising of the Siege of Orleans was a great Check to the Affairs of the English, the Defeat of Patay was a no less grievous and fatal Blow to them. The Regent saw himself forced to keep within the Walls of Paris, being unable to appear in the Field, to oppose the Progress of his Enemies. Mean while, Charles improved these Advantages. Lewis III, Duke of Anjou, and King of Sicily, his Brother-in-law, being returned from Naples, where he had made a long stay, brought him, immediately after the Battle of Patay, a Supply of several brave Officers, who had attended him into Italy, and were come back with him into France.

King Charles's Adherents increasing, as his Affairs became more prosperous, he reviewed his Troops at Gien, and found them augmented to fifteen thousand Men. He gave a Part to the Constable, to make a Diversion in Normandy, or rather, under that honorable Pretence, to remove him, that he might not assist at the Coronation, according to Agreement. The Earl of Perdriac had another Part, to carry the War into Guienne. These two Detachments were but five thousand Men. With the remaining ten thousand, Charles took the Road to Rheims, knowing there was no Army in the Field to oppose him.
In passing through Burgundy, he summoned Auxerre, which promised to follow the Example of the principal Towns of Champagne. Troye and Chalon surrendered upon the first Summons. A few days after, the Inhabitants of Rheims drove the English Garrison out of the City, and sent Deputies to the King, to present to him the Keys of their Gates. Thus every thing succeeding to his wish, Charles entered Rheims (6) in Triumph, and was crowned presently after (7). The Ceremony being ended, Joan would have retired, affirming, she had nothing more to do, after executing what God had commanded. But the King pressed her so earnestly, that at last he prevailed with her to stay.

It is now time to see what was transacting in England, the Duke during the late fatal Revolution in France. The Quarrel still subsisted between the Duke of Gloucester and the Bishop of Winchester, who was returned to London. As the Pre-late's new Dignity rendered him more haughty than ever, the Duke of Gloucester took occasion from this Dignity, to give him a sensible Mortification. St. George's Day, Patron of the most noble Order of the Garter, being at hand, the Cardinal was to officiate, as Bishop of Winchester. But the Duke of Gloucester, and his Friends, opposed it, affirming, he could not hold the Bishoprick of Winchester, with the Dignity of Cardinal (8), without the King's express Licence. The Affair being brought before the Council, it was resolved, that for this time the Cardinal should not officiate as Bishop of Winchester; and two Lords were sent to give him notice thereof. Next day,

(3) Here must be some mistake either in the Author or the Printer, since Rapin says above, the Bretans alone were thirteen thousand and two hundred. Probably the Bretans were not so numerous, as is said above. P. Daniel says, they did not exceed twelve hundred. Tom. VI. p. 69. Hall, fol. 108. Stow and Hall say, the French Army consisted of twenty three thousand Men, fol. 108. p. 270.

(4) Montfaucon says, there were about eighteen hundred English killed, and between a hundred and sixscore taken Prisoners; the chief of whom were the Lords Stables, Talbot, Hazegford, Sir Thomas Rampton, &c. fol. 45. According to Hall, about twelve hundred were slain, and forty taken Prisoners, fol. 108.

(5) The English could not agree about the Place and Manner of fighting, whether it should be on foot or on Horseback; which was the chief Cause of their Defeat. Besides they had neglected to provide themselves with sharp Stakes, which used to be their main Defence against the Enemies Cavalry. Montfaucon, fol. 45. Hall, fol. 108.

The Duke of Bedford Infirm?

Act Pub.
X. p. 433

V. Lastly, The Council of France most humbly besought the King, to come and be crowned at Paris.

That if the Crusade did not take place, the Money furnished by private Persons should not be employed without the King's Approbation.

to send Troops into Bohemia, the Council resolved to make some Alteration in what was granted to the Cardinal of Winchester. Upon this urgent occasion, a new Agreement was made (3) with him, whereby he engaged to serve in France, under the Duke of Bedford, till the end of December, with the Troops of the Crusade, provided they were not employed in any Siege.

Mean time, the Duke of Bedford, having at last received the expected Supplies, began to march (8), in order to stop the Progress of his Enemy (9). At Crepin, The Regent marches towards him

Another Reason, inducing the Council to treat with the Duke of Bourbon, was, the Hopes, his Ransom would help to defray the Charges of the King's Journey, who was ready to depart for France. This means failing, there was a necessity of having recourse to Borrowings, which plainly discovered the low Condition of the Treasury (1); and with what difficulty sufficient Funds, for carrying on the War, were found.

Henry departed at length, on the 24th of April, attended by great Numbers of the Nobility, and particularly the Cardinal of Winchester, who was appointed Chief Counsellor of the King with a large Salary (2). This honorable Pretence was used, to keep him out of the Realm, left in the King's Absence, and under the Duke of Gloucester's Regency, who was made Guardian, their Difficulties might breed Disturbances. Henry being arrived at Calais, made but a short Stay there. He proceeded immediately to Roan, where he spent almost all the rest of the Year, whilst Preparations were making at Paris for his Coronation, which could not be finished till December. About the middle of the Month, he came to the Metropolis, where he was crowned (3) on the 17th, with all the Solemnity, the Circumstances of the time would permit.

Whilst the King was at Roan, the Duke of Bedford used all his endeavours to restore his Affairs. He had foreseen the Duke of Burgundy's Designs, and as he was sensible of the Consequences, neglected nothing to prevent them. It cost him Champagne and la Brie, or at least, the Places he still had in those Provinces, which he was forced to deliver to him, to secure him in the Alliance of England. But withal, he was enabled, by this means, to stop the Progress of Charles, who had carried on his Conquests with a wonderful Rapidity.

Another Inducement to keep, for some time, the Duke of Burgundy in the Interest of the English, was, his third Marriage, with Isabella of Portugal (4), near Relation to the King of England (5), and who had not the same Affinity with King Charles, as Bona of Artois, his former Wife. So, the Duke of Bedford, receiving an Aid from the Duke of Burgundy (6), took the Field, and became Master, in the Isle of France, of several Places; which though of little Consequence in themselves, were of great Importance, as they were incommensurable to Paris (7).

Shortly after, the Duke of Burgundy himself entered France, at the head of a powerful Army. He retook first Torcy and Soissons, and then besieged Compiègne. Flouy commanded in that Place, with a numerous Garrison, and six Months Provisions. Upon the first News of this Siege, the Maid of Orleans, and Xaintrailles, threw themselves into the Town, not without the Governor's secret Indignation, who easily saw, they were come to rob him of the Honour of the Defence.

On the 25th of May, Joan made a Sally, and fought with great Conduct and Resolution. At length being forced to retreat, she put herself in the Rear, and now and then made a stand, to stop the Enemies, by whom she was pressed. In this manner, she secured all her Men; but, when she would have entered the Town, found the Gate shut, and the Draw-Bridge up. It is said, this was done by the Governor's Order, who was glad to destroy her, pretending he did not know she was still without. But this Circumstance is not well proved (8). However it be, Joan finding no way to escape her Pursuers, surrendered herself Prisoner to the Bastard of Vendôme, who immediately delivered her to the Earl of Ligny (9), the Duke of Burgundy's General. The Duke of Bedford over-joyed, that this Prey was in the Hands of his Allies, demanded her so earnestly of the Earl of Ligny, that the General could not deny him. He required, however, a Reward suitable to the Importance of such a Prisoner. Some time after, the Town was relieved by the Earl of Vendôme (10), who introduced Troops and Ammunition, when it was almost reduced to Extremity. Whereupon, the Earl of Ligny, Commander in Chief, seeing no more likelihood of succeeding, raised the Siege, and the Duke of Burgundy, who had staid all the while at Nogon, retired into Artois.

I pass over in Silence numberless Attempts on both Sides, and divers Skirmishes, which contributed but little to the Decision of the general Affair. It will however be proper to observe, that Joan's pretended Inspiration, had made so deep an Impression in the Minds of the French, that Marshal Bouffac and Xaintrailles, suffered themselves to be deceived by an Artifice, which, doubtless, would not have produced its Effect, had it not been supported by this Prepossession. A Shepherd living near Roan, came and told the Marshal, that Heaven had revealed to him a certain private way, by which, he would lead him into the very City of Roan. Bouffac, imparting the secret to Xaintrailles, they were both of opinion, the opportunity should not be neglected. So, persuaded as they were, that they had God himself for their Guide, they marched with a Body of chosen Troops after the Shepherd, who led them into an Ambush, where Talbot expected them. Their Troops were cut in pieces, and Xaintrailles remained a Prisoner, in the hands of the English.

These are the most remarkable Events in France, during the Year 1430, with regard to the War. We must now see what passed in England.

During the Cardinal of Winchester's Absence, the Duke of Gloucester created him Troubles, which gave him no small Uneasiness. The Duke told the Council, that the Cardinal intended to leave the King, and return to his Place in the Council, with design to raise Troubles in the Kingdom; that his Intention was the more criminal, as he meant to make use of the Pope's Authority, to free himself from the Obligation to assist the King in France; which was visibly subjecting the Orders and Regulations of the Council, to a foreign Power. Upon these Complaints, the Council issued out a Proclamation, prohibiting all the King's Subjects, of what rank soever, on pain of Imprisonment, to attend the Cardinal, if he left the King without Leave.

On the 8th of November, a Truce of one Year was concluded at London with the King of Castile, to commence May the 1st, 1431.

About the middle of December, the Ambassadors of England signed, at Edinburgh, a five years Truce with Scotland, to begin the same Day, with that made with Castile.

Joan having been in the Hands of the English, ever since the Siege of Compiègne, the Duke of Bedford ordered her to be carried to Roan, where he intended to sacrifice her, to the Vengeance he believed due to the English Nation. There was, doubtless, great Policy in this Resolution. All France was possessed with the Notion, that she was sent from God; and the English Soldiers imagined, that in fighting against her, they had to deal with the Devil. Wherever she appeared, they deemed the French Troops invincible. At least, the Terror that had seized their Souls, and the strange Alteration thereby wrought in them, cannot be ascribed to any other Cause: It was therefore of the utmost Importance to undeceive them. The taking of Joan, had already begun to produce this Effect. It was very naturally inferred, that had she acted by God's Command, there was no probability of her falling into such a Misfortune. But, to confirm this first Impression, it was not improper to insinuate to the terrified English, that she had done nothing, but by way of Witchcraft and Sorcery. It may be, the Duke of Bedford was himself of that Opinion, as may be concluded from his Expressions, in the fore-mentioned Letter to the King. However this be, (for I do not pretend, either to blame or justify the Prince, that it was done out of Policy or Vengeance) he so managed, that the King, by the Advice of his Council of France, ordered Joan to be tried for a Witch. Pursuant to this Order, she was delivered over to Ecclesiastical Judges (11), who, after a long Examination, condemned her as a Heretic, to do Penance upon Bread and Water, all the Days of her Life. Some time after, under colour of a Relapse into her former Errors, she was tried again by the same Judges, who delivered her over to the secular Arm to be burnt alive. This Sentence was executed in the old Market-Place at Roan, the 30th of May, 1431 (12).

Thus far the French and English agree. It cannot be denied, that Joan performed great Exploits, and inspired the French with Courage, and the English with Terror. But the French ascribe what appears wonderful in her, to the immediate Power of God, and the English to the Artifices of the Devil. What then shall we believe? Perhaps Neither are in the right, and indeed there is a third Opinion, which wants not plausible Reasons. As the Examination of these three Opinions would be a too great interruption of the Thread of the History, I shall not stay to discuss them here. They who desire to be more fully informed concerning this Matter, may read a Dissertation, inserted at the end of this Reign, where I shall endeavour to give this Affair all the Light it is capable of.

Weakness of the two Kings.

Notwithstanding his Advantages, King Charles saw himself little able to continue the War. Most of the Places he had taken were ruined, and consequently incapable of giving him much Assistance. Besides, as they had voluntarily surrendered, he was unwilling to press them, for fear they should return to the English. They might have done it with the same ease, since it was not in his power to place there, Garrisons strong enough to keep them in Awe. On the other hand, the English, humbled by so many Losses, were not better able to keep Armies in the Field. So, during the rest of this Year, the War was continued only by Parties, and surprizing of Places, most of which were but weakly guarded.

The French

Monstrous
Halls.

In this manner, the French became Masters of Chartres, by means of a Cart loaden with Wine, which they caused to be overturned just under the Port-cullis. On the other hand, the English took Montargis, by holding Intelligence with a young Woman, who persuaded a Barber, her Lover, to introduce them into the Town.

The Fair of

J. Chastel.

Loré, a French Captain, made an Inroad to the very Gates of Caen, upon a Fair-Day, and carried away two thousand Persons, with a very great Booty. After that, he retired to Silley, a small Town in Maine, where he was besieged by the Earl of Arundel. But the Duke of Alençon, suddenly coming to his relief, obliged the English to retire.

Other Excesses of the two Parties.
Monstrous.

This Year, Xaintrailles and Gaucour, who were ravaging Normandy, were defeated and made Prisoners. A Party of English took also Villeneuve-la-Jeu from the French. This is all that passed worth noting in France, between the two Parties. But a more important Affair happened in Lorraine, wherein King Charles and the Duke of Burgundy were concerned, and which therefore it will not be amiss briefly to mention.

War of Lorraine.
Monstrous.
Hall.

Lewis, Cardinal of Bar, and Marquis of Pont-a-Mousson, being the last Male of the House of Bar, the Children of Violante his Sister, Queen of Aragon, were to be his Heirs. Among these Children, Violante of Aragon had married Lewis II, King of Sicily, and Duke of Anjou, and by him had three Sons, Lewis, René, and Charles. Of these Princes, the Cardinal Duke of Bar chose René for his Heir, and married him to Isabella, third Daughter of Charles Duke of Lorraine, who had no Issue-Male. It is said, Isabella's two elder Sisters had renounced the Succession of the Duke their Father. René being Duke of Bar, by the Death of the Cardinal his Uncle, would likewise have taken possession of Lorraine, upon the decease of the Duke his Father-in-law; but Anthony Earl of Vaudemont, Son of Frederic, younger Brother of Duke Charles, disputed the Succession with him. This occasioned a War between these two Princes, wherein King Charles supported René his Brother-in-law, and the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Vaudemont. On the 2d of July, this Year, the two Competitors fought at Balegnerville a bloody Battle, where René was vanquished, taken Prisoner, and carried to Dijon. There were twelve hundred French slain in this Action. This Loss, no doubt, helped to hinder King Charles from continuing his Progress.

An Attempt to take the See from the Bishop of Winchester.

The Affair concerning the See of Winchester, of which the Duke of Gloucester would have deprived the Cardinal, was rather suspended, than determined in 1429, by an Order of Council to the Prelate, to forbear, for that time, officiating as Bishop on St. George's Day. The Duke, willing to take Advantage of the Cardinal's Absence, who was with the King at Paris, caused, about the end of this Year, the Affair to be again brought upon the Board. On the 6th of November, the King's Attorney General appearing before the Council, required, that the Cardinal should be deprived of his See; affirming, that by the Laws of the Land, the same Person could not be Cardinal and Bishop in England. He supported his Assertion with the Examples of Simon Langham, and Robert Kilwardby, formerly Archbishops of Canterbury, who, upon their being made Cardinals, resigned the Archbishoprick. When he had done speaking, the Duke of Gloucester, addressing himself to the Bishop of Winchester, required him to say, upon his Oath of Allegiance to the King, whether it was not true, that the Cardinal had obtained of the Pope, an exemption from the Jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, for himself, for the City, and for the whole Diocese, of Winchester. His Aim was to shew, how inconvenient it was, to suffer a Cardinal to hold a Bishoprick in England. The Bishop of Winchester replied, after some Intreaty, that the Bishop of Lichfield being at Rome, had sued for, and obtained this Exemption for the Cardinal, who had reimbursed all the Charges; and that he had this from that Prelate's own Mouth. This Affair having been long debated, by reason of the two Parties in the Council, it was at length resolved, that, before any Decision, the Cardinal should be heard, and the Judges consulted. Thus it was not yet possible for the Duke of Gloucester to compel his Ends.

Whilst Henry was in France, Pope Eugenius II, Successor of Martin V, sent thither the Cardinal of Santa Croce, to try to persuade the two Kings to a Peace. This Legate prevailed with them at last, to send their Ambassadors to Auxerre, but this Congress was fruitless. They did not so much as enter into a Conference, because, if we may believe the French Authors, the Ambassadors of England refused to acknowledge King Charles's for Ambassadors of France. The 31st of March, the next Year, was however appointed for their Meeting; but it was in vain, since there was no place appointed for holding the Congress. The Court of England had named, for Plenipotentiaries, the Bishop of Exeter, and some others (1).

Monstrous.

Henry returned into England the beginning of the Year 1432 (2), being full ten Years of Age. As his Journey hither into France produced no great Effects, his return made no Alteration in his Affairs. They were still managed by the Duke of Bedford in France, and by the Duke of Gloucester in England. The Government of two Kingdoms was no light Burden for these Princes, at a time when the King's Affairs were manifestly going to decay. The Duke of Bedford was obliged to be always on his Guard, to resist Enemies, now grown very formidable. But this was nothing, in comparison of the Trouble, occasioned by his perpetual distrust of his own Friends, or those who pretended to be well-affected to him. The Duke of Burgundy's ambiguous Proceedings, justly made him uneasy. The Duke of Bretagne was no surer Friend. In short, since the decline of the Affairs of the English, the Towns which seemed to side with them, were faithful, only in proportion to the Strength of their Garrisons. The Regent, by sad Experience, had been convinced of this Truth. Paris herself, the Metropolis, on which, as I may say, all depended, was not so well disposed, as that her Fidelity could be relied on; or at least her Attachment to the Interest of England wholly depended on the Duke of Burgundy's. Add to this, the inconsiderable Aids of Men and Money, received by the Duke of Bedford from England, at a time when they were most wanted. To complete his Misfortune, the Regent found himself almost alone, burdened with the Weight of the public Affairs, as well Military as Civil; those who had assisted him in the beginning of his Regency, being for the most part either dead, or Prisoners in the Hands of the Enemy. In this Perplexity, he resolved to propose to King Charles, the Exchange of Talbot for Xaintrailles, and his Offer was accepted. As he durst not leave Paris, and the War was carrying on in several Parts of the Kingdom, he could not be without such a General as Talbot; though to procure him, he was forced to give his Equal to the Enemy (3).

If the Affairs of the English were upon an ill foot in France, they were upon no better Terms in England. Subsidies were granted by the Parliament with great reluctance, for continuing so destructive a War, which began to be tiresome, since it prospered not as formerly. On the other hand, the Quarrel between the Duke of Gloucester and the Cardinal still continued, with greater Bitterness than ever, and began to turn to the Duke's disadvantage. In the last Year's Parliament (4), the Cardinal had found means to gain the Commons to his Interest, and give his Adversary a grievous Mortification. The House, willing to shew him Marks of their Favour,

(4) By the last Year's Parliament, Repin must mean the last Parliament; namely, that held in 1430, or rather that in 1409; for it does not appear there was one in 1431.

1432. presented a Petition to the King (1), praying him, in consideration of the Cardinal's great Services to the State, to give him a full Pardon for whatever he had done, contrary to the Laws, particularly with regard to the Statute of Premunire. This was a mighty Advantage for the Cardinal, since the Commons Petition being granted, he was screened from all Prosecution. However, the Duke of Gloucester did not desist. He pretended, that, notwithstanding the Pardon, he had sufficient Evidence to prove the Cardinal guilty of High-Treason, a Crime which could not be supposed to be included in the Letters of Pardon. The Cardinal, who was then in Flanders upon the King's Affairs, speedily repaired to London, without asking leave, and thereby gave his Enemy a Pretence to seize his Baggage (2). The next day after his Arrival, he went to the House of Lords, and said, he was come to clear himself of the Crimes, pretended to be laid to his Charge, and vindicate his Innocence, against whoever should offer to be his Accuser. The Duke of Gloucester not thinking proper to support what he had advanced, the Prelate was answered, that as none appeared to accuse him, he was acknowledged for a loyal Subject. He thanked the House for this Declaration, and desired it might be drawn up in Form, which was granted. Then he complained, that at his arrival at Sandwich, his Baggage was seized, and petitioned the Redhibition. He maintained, that the Seizure was made without Cause, and offered to lend the King six thousand Pounds, for six Years; on condition, that if, in that time, the Seizure appeared to be lawful, the Money lent should be forfeited to the King's Use. He offered moreover to lend him the like Sum, and to defer the Demand of the thirteen thousand Marks, due to him on another account, provided the payment of the whole should be assigned out of the next Subsidy granted to the King. His Aim was, to shew his regard for the King's and the People's Wants. His Offers were accepted, and the Seizure reformed. Thus the Duke of Gloucester, instead of hurting his Enemy, had the Mortification, to see him receive the Applauses of both Houses. Mean while, this Discord produced very ill Effects. As the Duke of Gloucester had Friends and Adherents in the Council, the opposition generally between the two Parties, could not but be very prejudicial to the King's Affairs. Whilst the Duke and the Cardinal thought only of their own private Concerns, the War in France was neglected, though it was more necessary than ever, to support it with the greatest Efforts.

If England had known how to improve her Advantages, she had a very favorable opportunity to repair some of her Losses. King Charles languished in the Arms of Agnes Sorrel his Mistress, and left to the Care of his Ministers and Generals, his most important Affairs. Nothing affected him but his Pleasures. It was with extreme reluctance, that he bestowed a few Moments upon the War, and the Affairs of State. So impatient was he to return to his Pleasures, interrupted by these troublesome Cares, that he only fought to intrust with others, whatever might embarrass him. La Trimouille, his Favorite, was generally accused of soothing him in this Supineness. But it was perceived by Persons of Penetration, that the King began to grow weary of him, and was uneasy under a Yoke he had imposed upon himself. The Constable, though absent, was soon informed of it. His Spies at Court were too watchful, for so important a thing to be long concealed from him. As he was of a proud and violent Spirit, he could not bear, without Indignation, to be surpassed by La Trimouille; and had formed a Design to serve him, as he had done Louvet, De Giac, and Beaulieu. When he knew, the King no longer looked upon La Trimouille with the same Eye as before, he immediately resolved to set hand to the Work. But as in ruining La Trimouille, he did not find himself so far in the King's Favor, that he could hope for his Place, he projected to introduce Charles d'Anjou, the Queen's Brother, into this Post. Strange Project, haughtily to attempt to take from a Prince one Favorite, and give him another against his Will, or at least without consulting him! As soon as the Constable had made all his Cabals at Court, and matters were ripe for Execution, La Trimouille was seized in his Bed, in the King's own House, who was then at Chinon and carried to Prison at Montreuil. Charles was enraged at the News, and would immediately have taken Vengeance, but when he saw all the Princes of the Blood, and the great Men at Court, declare against La Trimouille, he durst not venture to proceed. He remembered, with dread, the Confederacy formed against him, when he would have screened Louvet, and was afraid of the like. Besides, his disgust for the Favorite, who was only so in Name, being added to that political Reason, he abandoned him without much Concern. Charles d'Anjou came to comfort him, and succeeded so well, that, according to the Constable's Project, he became the Favorite, and La Trimouille was forgotten.

It is easy to judge, that a Prince of Charles's Character, who had an Aversion for War, would not have been very formidable to the Duke of Bedford, if the Supplies from England had been sufficient, to enable him to make some considerable Attempt. But he had not for some time been able to bring an Army into the Field, without disgranting his Towns, and exposing them either to be surprized, or tempted to follow the Example of those, that had voluntarily surrendered to King Charles.

About the end of last Year, Foucault had conquered Lagny, a Place often taken and retaken, and which they Neighbourhood of Paris rendered extremely important. A little after, the Regent unsuccessfully attempted to retake it. In the beginning of this Year, the Marshal de Pisse-Adam, and the Earl of Arundel (3) attacked it in vain, being forced, by a vigorous Sally from the Town, to abandon their Enterprize. At last in the Beginning of August, the Duke of Bedford besieged it himself with an Army of six thousand Men. But, on the 10th of the same Month, the Bastard of Orleans, in spite of the Duke's Precautions and Vigilance, introduced a Convoy (4), and then passed the Marne. The Duke, fearing by this March, that he sold home Intelligence in Paris, suddenly raised the Siege, to prevent his Designs. Thus Lagny was besieged three times in vain, within the Space of seven or eight Months.

On the other hand, a small Body of French, drawn out of the Garrisons near the Loire, surprized Montargis. But, as the Castle made a vigorous Defence, the French not being able either to force it, or keep the Town, were obliged to retire. In Normandy twelve hundred English invested la Hire in Louviers, and after a three Months Blockade, constrained the Place to capitulate.

These were Events of little Importance. But, on the 13th of November, there happened one of much greater Consequence, namely, the Death of Ann of Burgundy, Duchess of Bedford (5). This Loss was not peculiar to the Duke her Spouse, but common to all the English, since it broke the Bond of Union between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and by the Coldness which succeeded, proved very fatal to England.

The Council of Basil had been assembled since the last Year, but England had sent no Ambassadors. About the end of this Year, the Pope and Council, who were disputing concerning Pre-eminence, sending, each a-part, Legates to the King, the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Rochester, the Earl of Huntington (6), and several others, were appointed to go to the Council.

In the Beginning of the Year 1433, there was a dangerous Insurrection in Normandy, which would have been no less fatal to the English, than the raising of the Siege of Orleans, if by their Diligence they had not timely prevented Part of the Mischief, which might have ensued. Sixty thousand Peasants of that Province having taken Arms, divided themselves into two Bodies, one whereof consisting of forty thousand Men, marched into Vexin, and the other towards Caen. Had Charles's Army been near enough to support them, he would doubtless have conquered all Normandy. The Rebels soon became Masters of Caen, Harfleur, Dieppe, and Lillebonne. Probably they would have made a much greater Progress, if the Earl of Arundel (7) had not, with the utmost Expedition, marched against those that were assembled in Vexin. As these Men had no eminent Leader, they suffered themselves to be surprized in the Night, and easily yielded him a Victory, more advantageous to his Master than glorious for him. Those of Caen, though not so numerous, would have given him more Trouble, because the Marshal of

The Marshal seeing himself thus deserted, took with him some of the most courageous, and threw himself into Dieppe. Mean while, Arundel, taking Advantage of their Confusion, found means to recover Caen and Lillebonne. But Dieppe and Havfleur, places of very great Importance, remained in the hands of the French.

The Duke of Bedford was married to Jacolina of Luxemburg the Duke of Burgundy was extremely offended, that this Marriage was made without his Knowledge. He thought the Duke of Bedford should have shewn him more respect, since, besides the Confederation of the many Ties by which they were united, he married the Daughter of one of his Vassals. The Duke of Bedford, who was very prudent and circumspect, had doubtless his reasons for hastening his Marriage, he paid him some Compliments by the Cardinal of Winchester, who even procured an Interview at St. Omer, where the two Princes met in April. But an unhappy Dispute about Precedency hindered their Reconciliation, and caused them to part extremely incensed with each other. These two Princes had frequently met without any Contest upon that account. But the Duke of Burgundy was obliged to start some Dispute now, for a Cloak to the Steps he intended to make. He owned Henry for King of France, and the Duke of Bedford for Regent, and Uncle of the reigning King, how therefore could he pretend to take place of him?

The Duke of Burgundy took care never to give place to the French Monarch.

This same Year, another Event helped to disconcert the Affairs of the English. The Duke of Bedford being a Widow, married in March, Jacolina of Luxemburg (1), Daughter of Peter of Luxemburg (2), Earl of St. Pol. The Duke of Burgundy was extremely offended, that this Marriage was made without his Knowledge. He thought the Duke of Bedford should have shewn him more respect, since, besides the Confederation of the many Ties by which they were united, he married the Daughter of one of his Vassals. The Duke of Bedford, who was very prudent and circumspect, had doubtless his reasons for hastening his Marriage, he paid him some Compliments by the Cardinal of Winchester, who even procured an Interview at St. Omer, where the two Princes met in April. But an unhappy Dispute about Precedency hindered their Reconciliation, and caused them to part extremely incensed with each other. These two Princes had frequently met without any Contest upon that account. But the Duke of Burgundy was obliged to start some Dispute now, for a Cloak to the Steps he intended to make. He owned Henry for King of France, and the Duke of Bedford for Regent, and Uncle of the reigning King, how therefore could he pretend to take place of him?

During this Year, nothing of Moment passed, with regard to the War. Charles seemed to have wholly relinquished all Care of his Affairs, the better to relish the Pleasures of Love and Ease. The Duke of Bedford was weak, and as he received no farther Supplies from England, thought more of keeping what he had, than of making new Conquests. Mean while, though the Duke of Burgundy purposed to make a separate Peace with Charles, he believed it would be the more advantageous, if he could do it with full hands. To that end, he became Master of St. Valery, which Gaucour had taken by Surprize. The Town of Hain, defended by the Bastard of Orleans and Xaintraville, with Laon and Provins, were also taken by him. On the other hand, the Earl of Arundel, besieging Silley-Guillaume in Maine, the Constable Richemont obliged him to raise the Siege, but the French were scarce gone when the Earl returned and took the Town (3).

The Duke of Orleans offered to negotiate Peace. Act. Pub. X. p. 559. 560.

Mean time, the Council of England were more intent, how to procure a Peace, than to recover what the King had lost in France. The Duke of Orleans, still a Prisoner at London, had made the first Overtures, and offered to use his utmost Endeavours, to finish an Affair, on which depended his Freedom. To compass his ends, he had proposed to bring to Calais, or any other place the Council should name, the Queen Dowager of Sicily, Charles of Anjou her Son, the Duke of Braagne, with the Earls of Richemont and St. Giles his Brothers, the Duke of Alençon, the Earls of Armagnac, Fois, Perdriac, Clermont, and the Archbishop of Rheims, to treat with the Ambassadors of England. He desired likewise Permission to be at the Congress, to promote, to the utmost of his Power, the Conclusion of a Peace. As his Aim was, to engage the Court of England to enter into Negotiation, he demonstrated, that the English would reap great Advantages, whether this Treaty broke off, or succeeded. There are the two Articles he proposed to the Council concerning himself.

His Office. Ibid. p. 556.

I. In case a Peace was concluded between Henry and the Dauphin, (for so he called King Charles) he promised to do Homage to Henry whenever required, and never to own any other King of France, than him, or his lawful Successors.

II. He promised the same thing for all his Vassals, for the Duke of Alençon, for the Earls of Armagnac, Perdriac, Angoulême, and the Dukes of Milan and Savoy.

In another Article, he supposed the Dauphin would be contented with an honorable and considerable Appennage, which was the very thing the English aimed at in this Negotiation.

But, as a Peace might happen not to be concluded, in 1435. that case, the Duke engaged to acknowledge Henry for sole and true King of France. He promised moreover to deliver to him Blais, Orléans, and all his demean Towns, with Rebelle, Mont St. Michel, Limoges, Bourges, Chigny, Poitiers, Tournoy, Beziars, Saintes, and Loches, or what other Places he pleased instead of these, except Rebelle and Mont St. Michel, which were not to be changed.

That if the King should grant him any Demefins in England, he would own him, as King of England, for his Liege-Lord, and as such, swear Fealty to him.

That he would do his utmost, to put the King in possession of the Countries and Cities of France, which did not yet acknowledge him, and would serve him at his own Expence.

That in case the Treaty did not succeed, he promised to return a Prisoner to England, till all the Articles were performed on his part, on condition he should afterwards be released without Ranfom (4).

These Articles, which had been before concerted between the King's Commissioners and the Duke, being approved by the Council, the Duke signed and sealed them, and swore to observe them. Then Passports were prepared (5) for the Queen Dowager of Sicily, and the rest mentioned in the first Article, that they might repair to Calais in October. The Council appointed also Plenipotentiaries, to treat with the French.

When the Engagements here entered into by the Duke of Orleans are considered, they are a clear Evidence of his joining with the Court of France, to impose upon the Court of England. This plainly appears, in the hopes he gave that Charles would be satisfied with a bare Appennage: A thing most certainly far enough from that Prince's Thoughts, and which was insinuated, only to cause the English the more readily to fall into the Snare. Moreover, in promising to bring to Calais the Queen of Sicily, and the other French Princes and Lords, he would have intimated, that it was their Intention to conclude a Peace upon that foot; which was however, as afterwards appeared, directly contrary to their Design. In the next Place, the Duke's fervile Expressions to the King of England, calling him, in the Articles, his King and Sovereign Lord, manifestly shews, he flattered him only to deceive him. In short, he promised things that were beyond his Power: For Instance, to deliver Places which belonged not to him. But this was precisely wherein consisted the Fraud, because his Aim was to intimate, that he was empowered, tho' the Court of France did not think proper to discover themselves openly. These are not bare Conjectures. The Sequel of this Negotiation will plainly shew, the Duke did not act with Sincerity. This however is the same Duke of Orleans, whom the French would represent as a Saint, and upon whose account Jean pretended to have several Revelations.

It is very easy to perceive, the Duke of Orleans acted in concert with the Court of France, when it is considered, that Charles was now reconciled with the Duke of Burgundy, who only wanted a pretence to break with England. The Constable Richemont had finished a separate Treaty, in a Conference with the Duke at Nevers. He repaired to that City, under colour of adjusting a Difference between the Duke of Burgundy and the Earl of Clermont. Here all the Articles of the separate Peace were settled with the Duke. All he wanted, was to furnish an occasion to take this Step; and to this the Project of a Conference for a general Peace was made subservient. It was well known, the English would not agree to the Terms that should be proposed to them, and their Refusal was to be the Duke of Burgundy's Pretence to make a separate Peace. This was the real Motive of the Duke of Orleans's large Offers to the King of England, in case a Peace was not concluded. The Design was, to engage Henry's Council in this Negotiation, by putting them in hopes, that, whether the Conference ended in a Peace, or came to nothing, England would still be a great Gainer. The Duke of Bedford and the Council of England, who knew nothing of what had passed between King Charles and the Duke of Burgundy, fell into the Snare. As soon as they had consented to the proposed Negotiation, the Duke of Burgundy pretending to be still strictly united with the English, so ordered it, that instead of Calais, the City of Arras was appointed for the Place of Congress, where all the Parties concerned were to send their Ambassadors. We shall see presently what passed in this Assembly.

1434. Mean while, the War in France degenerated into real plundering and robbing. Both Kings being too weak to keep great Armies on foot, only small Bodies and Parties acted on either Side. The most remarkable Occurrences of this Year were these. The French having surpris'd Rue in Picardy (1), the Earl of Arundel posted thither (2) to retake the Town. Whilst he was upon the March, he heard, the French were fortifying Herbercy near Beauvais, and thought he should drive them from thence, before their Works were finished. Accordingly he appeared before that Place, but upon notice that Vignoles and Saintrailles were approaching with twelve hundred Men, rais'd the Siege, to go and meet them. A bloody Battle ensued, where the Earl of Arundel was mortally wounded, and made Prisoner. He died within a few Days, to the great Grief of the Duke of Bedford (3).

About the same time the Earl of Clermont, now Duke of Bourbon by his Father's Death, became Master of Corbeil and Brie Comte-Robert, which were fold him by the Governors. A Scotch Officer found likewise means to take Vincennes, but could not keep it.

Mean time, Talbot being arriv'd from England with three or four thousand Men (4), to whom he joined some other Troops, drawn out of the Garrisons, was in such manner Master of the Field, that all the French vanish'd before him. So, without much Opposition, he retook Beaumont upon Oysse, Creil, Pont St. Maxence, and Clermont in Beauvoisis. He even began the Siege of Beauvais, but the bad Weather oblig'd him to desist. During these little Exploits, King Charles went into Languedoc and Dauphiné.

The Frost, which was very severe about the end of this Year, and the beginning of the next, hinder'd not the two Parties from continuing the War all the Winter, by Sieges, and Surprisings of divers Places. The French had a great Advantage, in that most of the English Towns thought of returning to the Obedience of King Charles, since the Affairs of the English were gone to decay. But it was not from these Progresses, so inconsiderable in themselves, that Charles expected the Conclusion of the War. It must have been long, before he could have taken one by one all the Places possessed by the English in France. The Congress which was to be at Arras, promis'd him much more advantageous Successes, since he was sure of making a Peace with the Duke of Burgundy.

The News being spread over Europe, that a Peace between France and England, was going to be negotiated at Arras, there was scarce a Sovereign Prince, but what was desirous to send his Ambassadors. Pope Eugenius II and the Council of Basil, who were still at Variance, sent theirs also, but separately. From the Pope came the Cardinal Santa Cruz, and from the Council the Cardinals of Cyprus and Arles. King Charles sent seventeen Plenipotentiaries, at the head of whom was the Constable Richemont. Henry appointed twenty seven for France and England, of whom the Duke of Burgundy was the first (5); with Power to eight of them, viz. four English and four French (among whom were to be the Duke of Burgundy and the Archbishop of York) to sign the Peace. Afterwards the same Power was given to the Cardinal of Winchester. Hitherto the Duke of Bedford and the Council of England were perwaded of the Duke of Burgundy's Sincerity. This appears, in his being trusted with the Secret of the Embassy, since nothing could be treated, or concluded, without him. It must be confessed, this Prince acted a base part in this Congress. However, shortly after, private Intelligence was received in England, that he had desired the Pope to absolve him from his Oath to Henry V. Whereupon the King writ to the Pope to know the Truth. Eugenius answer'd, no French Prince had ever applied to him for any such thing; that he had never granted any such Dispensation, and for the future, would behave in that respect, so as the King should have reason to be satisfied. We shall see in the Sequel, how he performed his Promise.

The Congress of Arras was opened on the 6th of August. It began with King Charles's Proposals. His Ambassadors offer'd, in his Name, to the King of England, Normandy and Guienne, provided he would quit the Title of King of France, and do Homage for those two Provinces: That is to say, he offer'd as a Favour the two Provinces which the King of England was entirely possess'd of; a Favour, which he was to purchase with the Resignation of the Title of King of France, and a great Part of the Kingdom still in his hands. Though there were no other Proof of Charles's being certain of gaining the Duke of Burgundy from the English, this alone would be sufficient. For on what other Foundation could Charles, who, for three Years past, was unable to bring an Army into the Field, make such a Proposal? But, as was observ'd, his Intent was, not to conclude a Peace with the English, but only to afford the Duke of Burgundy a colour to proceed as he had resolv'd. The Ambassadors of England, surpris'd at an Offer so remote from what the Duke of Orleans had made them expect, suddenly broke off the Conference, and withdrew (6) extremely dissatisfied, without vouchsafing an Answer. Here it is that several French Authors display their Eloquence, to shew to what Height the English had carried their Pride and Insoience, since they reject'd so reasonable Offers. A remarkable Instance of the usual Prejudice of Historians in favour of their own Nation.

The Retreat of the English surpris'd neither the Duke of Burgundy, nor the French Ambassadors. They must have foreseen, that such Offers would be reject'd. Nay, it may be affirm'd on the contrary, that in making so unreasonable a Proposal, considering the Posture of Affairs, their sole Aim was to induce the English Ambassadors to withdraw. This abrupt Departure however, was highly exaggerated, and represent'd as a clear Evidence, they never intended to make Peace. It was this likewise, that gave the Duke of Burgundy a Pretence, to conclude a separate Treaty with King Charles. He pretended, he was not oblig'd to follow their Humour, or render the War everlasting for their sake. Upon this Foundation, the Pope's Legate absolved him from all his Oaths, as well to the late, as the present King of England. After that, as all the Articles were before settled, his separate Peace was soon concluded (7). Never had King of France made so dishonourable a Peace. Charles was bound by this Treaty, to disown the Murder of Duke of John, to deliver up the Murderers, or if they were not in his Power, to banish them from the Realm: He promis'd to found certain Chapels, where the Soul of the Deceased was to be prayed for, Day and Night. He agreed, that the Duke of Burgundy should nominate the Priests that were to officiate, and a Cross should be erected on Monterau Bridge, for a standing Monument of the Reparation of the Murder. He was oblig'd moreover, to pay fifty thousand Crowns of Gold for Duke John's Equipage, which was pillaged, and resign to the Duke of Burgundy certain Towns, to satisfy him for the Charges of the War. Lastly, he freed him from all Homage during Life. The Duke contented on his Part, that the King might redeem the Towns of St. Quentin, Peronne, Amiens, Corbie, situated on the Somme, for four hundred thousand Crowns. By this Article it appears, the Duke was not very scrupulous, since he sold to France Places, held only by the Bounty of the King of England, pursuant to his Engagement with the Duke of Bedford. It may be proper farther to remark, that the Service done by the Duke of Burgundy to France, in making a separate Peace, greatly outweigh'd, in the Opinion of the French Historians, all his Proceedings against her. This has made them very cautious in their Expressions, before the Treaty of Arras, for fear their Language should not agree with what they had to say afterwards. But after this happy Peace, they have extolled to the Skies, his Goodness, Wisdom, and Probity. This was however the Man, who for the sake of Revenge, had ruin'd France; and found no other way to repair the Fault, but by a notorious Treachery to England. What would the French have said, if he had always continued firm to the English? I am sorry to be oblig'd to speak thus of a Prince, to whom was given the Sir-name of Good. But it serves to shew, how the Sir-names and Encomiums bestowed on Princes, happen sometimes to disagree with their real Character.

I say nothing of the Dispensation granted to the Duke of Burgundy. Every one may make what Reflections he pleases. I shall only add, that in November was published in England, Pope Eugenius's fore-mentioned Letter, attested by the King. Probably, it was design'd for an indirect Information of the Court of Rome's Sincerity.

As soon as the English had lost the Assistance of the Duke of Burgundy, their Affairs began so visibly to decline, that it portended their sudden Ruin. As they had not Troops sufficient to defend all the Places, they were obliged to rely on the Loyalty of the Inhabitants, who very often proved false. On the other hand, the Towns upon the Somme, resigned to the Duke of Burgundy, being now against them, they were under a necessity to provide for that Quarter, for fear they might be used to invade the neighbouring Provinces. So, their whole Attention was confined to the Preservation of Normandy and Paris, it being impossible to take care of all, amidst the continual Defection of the Towns trusted to the Inhabitants. Houdan, St. Denis, Pontoise, Melun, Pont St. Maxence, Meulan, voluntarily surrendered to the French, during the Congress of Arras, or a little before. The Duke of Bedford retaking St. Denis (1), razed the Walls. Then he ordered Meulan to be invested, but the Bastard of Orleans raised the Siege. The Lord of Chatillon, Governor of Epernay for the English, going out of the Town, found the Gates shut against him at his Return; and the Inhabitants called in the French.

Isabella, Queen Dowager of France, seeing the prosperity of the King her Son, whom she mortally hated, and the desperate Condition of the English, died at Paris with Grief and Vexation, twelve Days after the Conclusion of the Treaty of Arras (2). She was universally hated by the French, who considered her as the principal Cause of the Ruin of the Kingdom. The English did not much esteem her; at least, they shewed but little regard for her, since she was become unserviceable to them.

Her Decease was of little Consequence to either Party. But the Death of the Duke of Bedford, on the 14th of the same Month, at Roan, was of infinitely greater Importance. Very probably, his Indignation to be thus imposed upon by King Charles, and the Duke of Burgundy, helped to throw him into the Sickness, of which he died, four Days before the Conclusion of the Treaty of Arras, the fatal News whereof, he expected every Moment. He forebaw with a mortal Concern, the Affairs of the King his Nephew, were going to be irretrievably reduced to a very wretched Condition. During the whole Course of his Administration, he behaved with that Wisdom and Prudence, as justly ranked him with the greatest Men of his Time. His Valour, and other martial Virtues, shone with no less Lustre on all Occasions, where he commanded in Person. Had he been well assisted by England, he would have, probably, ended the War to his own Glory, and the young King's Advantage; since he wanted no Qualification proper to accomplish the greatest Undertakings. But unfortunately for him, he was abandoned, when he stood most in need of Assistance. The only thing he could be taxed with, was his suffering himself to be surprised, in the Affair of the Congress of Arras. But where is the Man, that can always be upon his guard against Treachery? Nothing better shows the Esteem, due to this illustrious Prince, than the Regard Lewis XI. Son of Charles VII. expressed for him, when he could have no Inducement to flatter him. Lewis being one Day in the Church of Roan, and looking upon the Duke of Bedford's Tomb (3), a certain Lord of his Retinue, advised him to demolish that standing Monument of the Dishonour of the French; No, replied the King, Let the Ashes of a Prince rest in Peace, who, were he alive, would make the boldst of us tremble. I rather wish, a more stately Monument were erected to his Honour.

Immediately after the Duke of Bedford's Death, the Duke of York (4), was appointed Regent of France. But Edmund Beaufort (5), who aspired to that Dignity, so managed it by his Intrigues, that his Rival's Patent was long deferred. Probably, he was in hopes to obtain a change in his favour. This Delay proved extremely prejudicial to the King's Affairs, as will be seen in the Relation of the next Year's Occurrences (6).

All England was exceedingly moved at the News of the Duke of Burgundy's Defection. The most opprobrious Names were there liberally given him. Meanwhile, the Duke wanted to show still some regard for Henry, sent two Heralds to make his Excuse, for concluding a separate Peace, on pretence, his Subjects were grievously oppressed by the continuance of the War. This is the common pretence for a Peace, though generally when a War is undertaken, the Interests of the poor People are little regarded. The Duke offered at the same time his Mediation to Henry, if he desired to conclude a Peace with King Charles. This offer was looked upon as a fresh Insult. The truth is, what could be expected from the Mediation of a Prince, who had so openly sacrificed the Interest of England to his own Advantage? Accordingly, no Answer was vouchsafed to his Letters, which, besides, were writ in a Style very different from what he was wont to use (7). His Heralds were received with Indignity. The Law of Nations had like to have been violated on their account, and all the Flemings and Burgundians then in England, torn in pieces by the Populace; so incensed were they against their Prince. But such Behaviour was to him very serviceable. He wanted a Pretence to join his Forces with the French, and did not fail to find one in the Insults upon his Heralds and Subjects. For in May, this very Year, he sent the Constable Richemont five hundred Lances, under the Command of the Earl of Lalain, and thereby, openly declared himself an Enemy to the King of England.

The Constable joining this Aid to fix or seven thousand Men, drawn together from other Places, approached Paris, where remained but fifteen hundred English, under the Command of Sir Richard Woodville (8). Besides that this Garrison was very weak, for the Defence of so large a City, the Constable held Intelligence with the Inhabitants, who being almost all Friends of the Duke of Burgundy, sided with England, only out of regard to that Prince. Whilst he adhered to the King of England, Paris wanted no other Guard, but her own Citizens; but upon his declaring for King Charles, they all changed with him. So, it was no wonder, if fifteen hundred English could not keep them in Awe. The Death of the Duke of Bedford, the Absence of the new Regent, and the little care taken, to send Succours from England, disabling the English to keep an Army in the Field, the Constable met with no Opposition in his March. He took several small Places near Paris, and slew five hundred (9) of a Detachment, sent by the Governor to throw themselves into St. Denis. After that, he encamped at the very Gates of Paris, with his little Army. Whilst he was in this Camp, there were continual Parleys between the Burgurers and Beseigers, without the Governor's being able to help it. At length, April the 13th the whole City rose in Arms, whilst the Marshal de l'Isle Adam scaled the Walls (10). The Garrison advancing to repulse the Assault, found themselves pelted with a Shower of Stones from the Windows, whilst all the City resounded with Long live the King, and the Duke of Burgundy. The Governor, perceiving there was no resisting so many Enemies, chose to retire into the Bastille, with all his People. Immediately all the Streets were chained, for fear he should think of returning. Mean time, P. Isle Adam entered the City with ease, and opened the Gates to the Constable. Thus

See above, p. 540, Note (1). But the Person here meant, was Edmund, third Son of John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset. This Edmund bore the Titles of Earl of Mortagne in Normandy, and Lord of Chesleworth in the Marches of Wales. He was created, August 28, 1442, Earl of Dorset; and June 24, 1443, Marquis of the time. And at last, May 31, 1448, upon his Brother John's Death, he succeeded him in the Dukedom of Somerset. See above, p. 535, Note (8), and Sandford's Council, p. 311.

They also granted, That every Person having any Freehold in Lands, Annuities, Fees, Offices, or Hereditaments, above five Pounds yearly, should pay for every Pound and Sixpence, upon his Oath. There was also a Parliament in the beginning of the Year 1436, which met at Windsor, Jan. 21, and granted a Tenth and a Fifteenth, and the like Subsidy of Wools for three Years, as was granted in the former Parliament. Cotton's Abridg. p. 613. 620. In the last Parliament it was enacted, That no Sheriff or Bailiff should impose any Person upon Justice, but such as inhabit within his Bailiwick, and have Estate to their own use, or they to whole use other Persons have Estate of Fee-simple, Fee-tail, or Freehold, in Lands and Tenements, of the yearly Value of twenty Pounds, or more. 1436. Paris was taken for King Charles by the same Ple Adam, who had surprised it in like manner, seventeen Years before, for the Duke of Burgundy. The Bastille, which might have held a long Siege, had it been well stored with Provisions, was so destitute, that it could hold out but three Days. It was very well, the Governor could obtain an honorable Capitulation.

As the Affairs of the English sensibly declined, the Council of England were extremely desirous of a Peace. The War in France no longer concerned the Conquest of that Kingdom, as in the Reign of Henry V, and till the raising of the Siege of Orleans, but only what part the King of England could possibly keep; and the little that could be expected to be preserved by a vigorous War, cost England immense Sums. This was a very plausible Reason, to persuade the Publick, it was necessary, seriously to think of a Peace. I say, a plausible Reason, because it was not the real Motive of the Council's Proceedings. The Cardinal of Winchester had for some time gained ground upon the Duke of Gloucester his Rival. The Council by degrees, was filled with his Creatures, who, more than himself, found their own private Advantage in the Continuation of the War; which, since it was unsuccessful, rendered them odious to the People. Coin was grown exceeding scarce in England, and yet the Council was forced to be continually devising means to raise Money, which could not be done without causing great Murmurs. On the other hand, the Cardinal hoped to ruin his Enemy with more ease, during a Peace, because the War, and the unexpected Accidents thence arising, rendered the Person and Counsels of the Duke of Gloucester absolutely necessary. In short, as the Duke was ever of Opinion, that vigorous Endeavours should be used to recover what was lost in France, this was an Argument for the opposite Party to insist, with the same Earnestness, upon the necessity of concluding a Peace. This Opinion prevailing in the Council, the Duke of York, whose Commission to be Regent of France, was at length signed, had Instructions, and full Power, to treat with King Charles, if he saw any appearance of Success. Moreover, on supposition of a Negotiation, the Council impowered the Cardinal of Winchester, and the Duke of Burgundy, jointly to treat of the King's Marriage with one of his Adversary's Daughters.

Shortly after, the Duke of York departed for France, and in Normandy landed a good Body of Troops (1), with which he retook many small Places or Castles seized by the French, since the death of the Duke of Bedford. Poicamp was among the Places recovered by the Regent, but presently after retaken by Scalade.

Though the Duke of York was master of the Field in Normandy, and about Poitiers, he was concerned for Picardy. He heard from all Parts, that the Duke of Burgundy was drawing all his Forces together, and making great Preparations for a Siege. As these Preparations could be designed only against Calais (2), he sent notice to the Council of England, that they might provide in time, against the threatened Siege. Indeed, a powerful Fleet, a great Train of Artillery, and an Army of fifty thousand Men, assembled by the Duke of Burgundy, were clear Evidences of his extreme Desire to succeed in his Enterprize, and of his Resolution not to be disappointed. This News flying to England, the whole Nation was alarmed, and grew more incensed against the Duke of Burgundy. The Council trembling for Calais, the first Conquest of the English in France, resolved to use all possible Endeavours to save it. To that end, they ordered fifteen thousand Men to be raised, and petitioned the Duke of Gloucester to take upon him the Care of relieving that Place. Fifteen thousand Men were little enough for such an Undertaking. But, besides that it was reckoned, the Regent would join the Duke of Gloucester with all his Forces, the Enemy's Army was known to consist almost entirely of the Militia of Flanders, who were not much valued.

Whilst the Troops were levying with the utmost Diligence, the King, by Advice of his Council, resolved to express his resentment against the Duke of Burgundy, in granting, by Letters under his Great Seal, the Earldom of Burgundy, to the Lord Beaumont, and Flanders to the Duke of Gloucester. But it was easier to give them in Parchment, than wrest them out of the Hands of the Possessor.

Henry despatched Boulogne and Flanders. p. 649. 652.

Every thing being ready for the departure of the Army, 1436. designed for the relief of Calais, the Duke of Gloucester set sail, and landed in Normandy the beginning of October (3). The Duke of Burgundy had now been before Calais six Weeks, with his numerous Army. He carried on the Siege vigorously, and the Besieged made as brave a Defence. Mean time, the Duke, who hoped to acquire immortal Fame, by taking one of the strongest Places in Europe, was yet very far from his Aim. Nay, he began to perceive, the Attempt was beyond his Power. His Fleet (4), by the unskillfulness of the Pilots, or some other Accident, coming too near the Town at low Water, run on ground, and was reduced to Ashes before his Eye, by the Besieged. This was a very mortifying Accident, but a worse befell him quickly after. A Rumour being spread in the Army, that the Duke of Gloucester was approaching to relieve the Town, the Flemings, discouraged by the Fatigues of the Siege, and terrified at the approach of the English, suddenly unpitched their Tents, and began to retire. In vain did the Duke endeavour to remove their Fears. The Scouts of the English Army beginning to appear, it was still less practicable for the Duke to stop his frightened Troops, who fought only to avoid a Battle. So, the Duke seeing he could not prevail, was forced to follow them in their Retreat, which was made in great disorder, though timely enough to prevent the English from taking any Advantage. He had the further mortification to receive a Defiance from the Duke of Gloucester, offering him Battle, and not to have it in his power to accept it, though his Army was much superior to that of his Enemy. But this was not yet all. Hardly was he returned into his own Country, when the Towns of Flanders revolted against him. He was even in danger of losing his Life at Bruges, in a seditious Tumult of the Citizens. He was himself wounded, after seeing, with Grief, Ple Adam torn in pieces by the mutinous Populace. Mean time, the Duke of Gloucester improving this juncture, overran Artois, Flanders, and Hainault, and carried away twelve hundred Waggon-Loads of Booty. From thenceforward the Duke of Burgundy had so much trouble at Home, that he was but little serviceable to King Charles.

In June this Year, Lewis the Dauphin, Son of King Charles, married Margaret of Scotland, Daughter of James I, about twelve Years of Age.

The beginning of the Year 1437, was remarkable for the Death of Joan of Navarre (5), and Catherine of France (6), both Queen Dowagers of England, one Widow of Henry IV, the other of Henry V. The King had married Owen Tudor, a Welsh Gentleman, descended, as it is said, from the ancient Kings of Wales. I do not know, whether, in those Days, this Descent was more regarded, or was endeavoured to be traced, till after the Crown was devolved to the Family of the Tudors, by the Advancement of Henry VII to the Throne. However that be, when Queen Catherine espoused Owen Tudor, the Marriage appeared so unfuitable, that all England was offended at it; and the more, as it was made unknown to the Duke of Gloucester, who was then Protector. But that Prince's Veneration for the Memory of the King his Brother, prevented him, from giving the Queen his Sister-in-law any Trouble. When she was dead, the Council had not the same regard for her second Husband. They thought it their Duty to punish him for his rashness, in daring to espouse the King's Mother, without the Consent of those who governed the Kingdom, and ordered him to be sent to the Tower. Some time after, Tudor made his Escape, but was taken, and put under closer Confinement. Some say, he found means to escape a second time, but being retaken, lost his Head. Others affirm, he was not beheaded till 1460, upon being taken in Battle, fighting for the House of Lancaster. I don't know, whether it be certain, that Tudor was put to Death, but it may be affirmed, that those who say, it was in 1460, were guilty of an Error, by taking Owen Tudor, his third Son (7), for Owen Tudor the Father.

Tudor had by Queen Catherine three Sons, Edmund, Jasper, and Owen. The eldest was created Earl of Richmond (8) by Henry VI, his Half-Brother, who gave him to Wife, Margaret, only Daughter of John Duke of Somerset. From this Marriage Queen Elizabeth, first of England, whom we shall see hereafter ascend the Throne

After the Death of the Prince her Husband, she married Sir Richard Woodville, who was only a Knight, and much her inferior. This Match was almost as unsuitable as Queen Catherine's. Besides, it was made not only without the King's License, but also contrary to Jacqueline's express Oath; not to marry without his Permission. So, both the Bride and Bridegroom, would have been liable to the rigour of the Law, had not the King been pleased to forgive them (2).

On the 19th of February, James I, of Scotland, was murdered in his Bed, by Assassins suborned by the Earl of Arbol (3) his Uncle. James II, his Son, seven Years old, succeeded him, under the Guardianship of Joan of Somerset his Mother, who was herself wounded, by endeavouring to save the King her Husband. It is time now to return to what passed in France.

After the Arrival of the Duke of York from England, the Affairs of the English began to be upon a better foot. King Charles, ever a Slave to his Pleasures, had no considerable Body of Troops in the Field; and the Revolt of the Flemings, hindered the Duke of Burgundy from sending him any Assistance. It is true, the Towns that had voluntarily surrendered to him, had strengthened his Party considerably, but which, his Army was much weakened, on account of the Garrisons he was obliged to keep there. As Matters then stood in France, both Kings had almost equal Reason to fear the Disloyalty of their Adherents; who, for the most part, were attached rather to the Fortune of him they served, than to his Person, or the Justice of his Cause. Thus, the Preservation of the Towns they were possessed of, entirely depended upon the Strength of the Garrisons.

The first Months of this Year, the Cold was so excessive, that it seemed to leave the Generals on both Sides, no desire to form any Enterprize, till it should be abated. Mean while, Talbot, who found nothing impossible, reaped a considerable Advantage from the Security of the French, caused by the Sharpness of the Season. On Shrove-Tuesday at Night, he scaled Pontoise, by help of the Ditches being frozen (4), and carried it, whilst the Garrison and Townsmen were wholly intent upon their Diversions. The taking of this important Place, was a great Blow to King Charles. Especially, it very much annoyed the Parisians, who were exposed to the continual Incurfions of the new English Garrison, to the very Gates of Paris.

The French made themselves some amends for this Loss, by the Acquisition of Dreux and Chevreuse, sold them by the Governors.

The Superiority the English had recovered in France, made the Duke of Burgundy apprehensive of some fatal Revolution. He was sensible that, without his Aid, King Charles could never end the War; and as he had openly declared against the English, it was his Interest that they should be entirely expelled the Kingdom. Mean time, it grieved him to act alone for the Benefit of a Prince, whose Indolence kept him from all the Enterprizes, where he ought to have been the chief Actor. The Duke, designing therefore to rouse him out of this Lethargy, represented to him, that his Honour and Interest called upon him to assemble all his Forces, put himself at their Head, and approach Paris, in order to drive his Enemies out of the Heart of the Kingdom. At the same time, he offered to make a powerful Diversion in Picardy, to favour his Undertakings.

Never was Prince less inclined to War than Charles VII, and yet never did King of France make greater Conquests than he, since he may be said to conquer his whole Kingdom. But it was chiefly by means of his Generals, who, for the most part, were Men of eminent Merit. The Duke of Burgundy's Remonstrances and Offers having raised him from his Sloth, he drew all his Forces together, to approach Paris, where he was much wanted. By the Way he attacked Montereau-Faut-Yonne (5), whilst the Duke of Burgundy besieged Cratoy, a strong Place in Picardy.

It was about the end of August (6), when the Duke of Burgundy invested Cratoy with a strong Army (7), whilst four French Ships blocked up the Place by Sea. The Duke of York being recalled, by the Intrigues of the Earl of Somerset his Enemy, was about to depart, and only waited for the Arrival of the Earl of Warwick, who was to succeed him in the Regency. For this cause, not being able to take upon him to relieve Cratoy in Person, he commissioned the brave Talbot for that purpose (8), whose Name alone was sufficient to strike Terror into the Enemies of the English. Talbot, at the head of five thousand Men, boldly advanced towards Cratoy, in order to relieve it, though the River Somme parted him from the Duke of Burgundy's Camp round the Town, which was on the other Side. When the Duke was informed of his March, he left part of his Troops at the Siege, and with the rest posted himself on the River-side, to oppose his Passage. The Hatred conceived by the English against this Prince, was so violent, that they thought nothing impracticable, when an Opportunity offered to be revenged. Talbot, improving this Disposition, rushed first into the River, Sword in hand, and by his Intrepidity inspired his Troops with such Courage, that they instantly followed him. The more bold, or rather rash this Action was, the more it astonished the Burgundians, who imagining they had to deal with Devils rather than Men, took to Flight, without expecting their Enemies. Their Terror infecting those, that were left at the Siege, the whole Army ran away; and it was not in the Duke of Burgundy's Power to rally them. At the same time, the Duke of York appeared with seven Men of War in Sight of four French Ships, and chased them so briskly, that it was with great Difficulty they escaped to St. Valery. Talbot entered the Town in Triumph, and after levelling the Trenches of the Besiegers, marched back to Normandy. In his Return he conquered five or six small Places in Picardy, and retaking once more Tancarville in Normandy, entered Rouen covered with Glory.

The Success of the Siege of Montereau was not so favorable to the English; nevertheless it was not inglorious. Thomas Gerard Governor of that poor Place, long defended it, in spite of the vigorous Efforts of the Besiegers, though he had but four hundred Men. Hitherto King Charles was not very eminent for his Valour, but at this Siege he performed such Exploits, as began to breed a higher Idea of his Courage. After a pretty long Siege, he carried the Town by Storm, having been himself one of the first to mount the Breach, and fight hand to hand with those that defended it. Doubtless he had been told, that it was necessary to procure the Esteem of his Subjects, by some extraordinary Action. The Intrepidity he shewed on this occasion, turned greatly to his Advantage. From thenceforward, his Friends as well as Enemies, had very different Thoughts of him from what they had before. Mean while, the Garrison retiring into the Castle, a second Siege was to be formed. Charles furnished with the Glory acquired in the first, and perhaps discouraged by the Fatigues he had endured, left the Management of this to the Dauphin his Son. Gerard, who was no less brave than experienced, held out fifteen Days longer, and then was forced to capitulate. When he came before the Dauphin, he very politely told him, that against any other but him, he should have been able to make a longer Defence. This Compliment was well received by the young Prince, who was pleased to see himself set in some Measure above the King his Father. But Charles, who was told of it, seemed extremely mortified. It is said, he began from thenceforward to entertain a Jealousy of the Prince his Son, which proved very fatal to him afterwards.

Whilst the War continued in France, the Duke of Orleans, Prisoner in England, was thinking of means to obtain his Liberty. Nothing but a Peace between the two Kings could possibly procure it. And therefore, no one was more concerned than he, to endeavour to set on foot a fresh Negotiation. For that purpose, he desired leave to go and talk in Person, with the Duke of Bretagne at Calais, who was then thought to be the only Prince, that could be employed as Mediator. The Council, who were all inclined to Peace, would have readily granted his Desire, but it was judged necessary to see first how Charles was disposed. Besides, the Duke of Gloucester was 1439. Consideration so affected the Duke of Burgundy, that he resolved, either to procure a Peace, if possible, between the two Kings, or secure himself by a Neutrality. Such a design was to be managed with great Prudence and Caution, for fear both Parties should agree to his prejudice, or the English grow more reserved, if they knew his Intention.

They begin to talk of Peace. Montrelet. Du Tillot. Ad. Pub. X. p. 683, 684, 707, 708. Montrelet.

Whilst the Duke of Burgundy was possessed with these Thoughts, the Pope exhorted the two Kings, by the Cardinal of Santa Cruz, to put a Stop to the Effusion of Christian Blood shed in their Quarrel. At the same time, he writ to the Duke of Bretagne, desiring him to be Mediator of Peace. The Duke sending to both Kings, found them equally inclined to enter into Treaty, and the Duke of Burgundy received the proposal with Joy. The Duke of Orleans took this Opportunity, to offer his Mediation to the King of England, jointly with the Duke of Bretagne; and to that end, renewed his Instances for leave to confer with the Duke at Calais. This was granted him, though the Duke of Gloucester opposed it with all his Power, because he plainly saw, that Prince could not be an impartial Mediator. But for some time past, the Duke of Gloucester had lost his Interest in the Council, where it was even affected, upon all occasions, to proceed contrary to his Opinion. Besides, the Counsellors were so desirous of Peace, that they forgot, or were willing to forget, that the false Step taken in sending Ambassadors to Arras, was entirely owing to the vain Hopes given the Duke of Orleans. So the captive Prince was looked upon as a disinterested Mediator, though it was easy to perceive, he was entirely biased in favor of King Charles. The Duke of Burgundy saw, with pleasure, the Preparations for a Conference, which would either end in a Peace between the two Kings, or afford him a pretence, to conclude a separate Truce with England. The two Courts being thus disposed, Commissioners were appointed on both Sides (1), to settle the preliminary Articles of the Congress. These Commissioners being met, judged, that in order to succeed in a negotiation of Peace, a Truce was absolutely necessary. Whereupon Henry empowered his to consent to it, but some Obstacles occurred, which hindered the conclusion. What has been said concerning a Peace, was transacted in the foregoing Year 1438. But I thought fit to defer speaking of it till now, that I might not interrupt the Recital of what relates to this Affair.

The Place of Congress approved. p. 718. The Duke of Bretagne and Orleans Monarchs. Ad. Pub. X. p. 720, 725, 730, 732, 756, 763, 767. Montrelet. Hall.

By the Month of January, 1439, Isabella of Portugal, Duchess of Burgundy, and the Cardinal of Winchester, conferred together between Calais and Gravelines. The Result of their Conference was, that the two Kings should appoint a proper Place to treat of a Peace, with the Mediation of the Dukes of Bretagne and Orleans, and should send their Plenipotentiaries thither. Pursuant to this Agreement, the very Place where the Dukes and Cardinal were, was chosen, and Ambassadors were nominated on both Sides (2). They were all chosen out of the Princes and greatest Lords of the two Kingdoms. But, before we proceed to the Success of this Congress, it will not be amiss to see how the Council of England stood disposed, with regard to a Peace. Now this evidently appears in the Ambassadors Instructions, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Hence we shall be able to judge, which of the two Parties is to be blamed for breaking off the Conference, and rectify several mistakes of the Historians.

In the first Place, the Ambassadors were ordered to demand, that the King's Adversary should leave him in peaceable possession of the whole Realm of France. They were to support this Demand with several reasons mentioned in the Instructions, but too long to be inserted here. Besides, the Reader knows very well, on what the Pretensions of the Kings of England were founded.

II. If the French should expostulate against this Demand, and think it unreasonable, the Ambassadors, after a previous Protestation, were to offer Charles the Provinces beyond the Loire, which were of the King's Demesne, but on condition of Homage.

III. If the Adversaries refused this Offer, the Cardinal of Winchester, as a Clergyman, was to enlarge on the Considerations proper to persuade the two Nations to Peace. These Considerations being many and long, I shall only relate the Substance of the three principal. The first was, that the War undertaken for the Title of King of France, claimed by each of the two Kings, had destroyed more Men than were, at that present, in both Kingdoms. The second was, that the two Princes ought seriously to consider, that God made not the People for the Sovereign, but the Sovereign for the People; that is to govern them with Justice and Peace, to the end the Subjects may be the better able to serve him. The third was, that France had not always been governed by one single Monarch, but, before and after Charlemain, there were often two, sometimes three, nay, four Kings at the same time.

IV. This last Consideration was in order to proceed, in the fourth Place, to another Offer, which the Ambassadors had power to propose; namely, that Henry would resign to Charles all the Provinces beyond the Loire in full Sovereignty. He expressly reserved however Guienne, Poitou, and whatever was possessed by his Ancestors in France, before the Crown of England devolved to them.

V. If this was rejected, the Ambassadors had Power to offer from the King their Master, that he would be satisfied with what his Ancestors enjoyed in France by Right of Inheritance, provided Calais, Guisnes, and the adjacent Marches were added; the whole in full Sovereignty, without any Dependence upon the Crown of France, or any Person whatever, but God alone.

VI. If the French insisted, that Normandy should be restored to Charles, in the State it was in before the Conquest thereof by Henry V; that is, notwithstanding the Grants of several Lordships to private Persons, as well by the late as the present King, rather than break off the Conference, this Article might be allowed.

VII. If Charles were brought to be satisfied with this Offer, provided Henry would quit the Title of King of France, in that case the Instructions furnished the Plenipotentiaries with many Reasons and Arguments to be alleged against that condition. But in short, they had Orders to leave this Matter to the Cardinal of Winchester, to whom the King had made known his Pleasure.

It is manifest the Council had resolved to submit to this, if the Peace could not otherwise be made. For if Henry had absolutely refused to quit the Title of King of France, there was no secret to be kept, and the Instructions would have contained an express Order to reject the Proposal.

The VIIIth Article was concerning the King's Marriage with one of Charles's Daughters.

IX. If the French rejected all these Offers, and made any Proposals on their part, the Ambassadors, without accepting or refusing them, were to reply, that they had no Instructions to treat of a Peace upon those Grounds, but would signify them to their Master.

X. Mean while, they were to propose, by the Dukes of Burgundy or the Duke of Orleans, a fifty Years Truce, with a free Communication between the two Nations. They had likewise Power to reduce the Truce to forty, thirty, or twenty Years; and rather than fail, they might limit it from three Years, to eight, provided it was without Communication.

XI. In case the Truce was accepted, they were to represent, that for the better Observance thereof, it would be proper to make an Exchange of some Places. To that end, they were ordered to offer Meaux, Creil, St. Germain en Laye, which were in the hands of the English when these Instructions were drawn, for Dieppe, le Mont St. Michael, and Harfleur, which Talbot had not yet taken.

XII. Lastly, the King willing to facilitate the Exchange of these Places, agreed to release the Duke of Orleans, for a Ransom of a hundred thousand Marks, and to abate fifty thousand, on account of the proposed Exchange.

These Instructions were drawn May the 21st, 1439. If we had likewise those of Charles's Plenipotentiaries, perhaps we should find, that the two Kings were not at so great a Distance from one another, as it seemed in the Conference. But as, on these occasions, the chief Care of the Managers is to be upon their Guard, for fear their secret Instructions should be discovered, it often happens, that the Negotiation is broke off, before there is occasion to shew all their Concessions; so apprehensive are they of giving their Adversaries any Advantage. This was really the Case in the present Treaty. The English did not think proper to Montrelet go beyond the second Article of their Instructions, namely, that Charles should have the Provinces beyond the Loire, on condition of Homage to Henry. They expected, the French would give them room by their Offers to make some farther Advances. For the same reason, the French kept to the Proposals made at the Congress of Arras, to wit, that their Master remaining sole King of France,

at

It was almost impossible, for a Peace to be concluded on the Terms proposed on both Sides. Each Prince offered to resign only what was out of his Power, and by Virtue of this pretended Cession, expected the other should divest himself of what he actually possessed. This was properly, to desire to gain with the Dash of a Pen, what they could not hope to obtain, without many successful Sieges and Battles. So, after the Ambassadors of the two Kings had long tried to discover, how far their Adversaries Instructions allowed them to advance, they parted without coming to any Conclusion. Each was delirious to wait, till room was given to make more reasonable Proposals.

The Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans were the only Gainers by this Congress. The first desired, at any rate, to save his Subjects in Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zeland, who were great Sufferers by the Interruption of their Commerce with England. To this end, he employed his Dukes, who being a near Relation of Henry, was not suspected by the English. Under colour of doing the Office of a Mediatrice between the two Kings, she had frequent Conferences with the Cardinal of Winchester, and negotiated a Trading-Truce between England and the Low-Countries. This appears in several Papers of the Collection of the Publick Acts. And indeed, this Truce was concluded presently after (1).

The History of Henry and his Court.

But the Duke of Orleans reaped the most Benefit from the late Congress, since it procured him his Liberty, after a twenty five Years Captivity. It has been frequently observed, that there were two Parties in the Court of England, namely, the Duke of Glocester's and the Cardinal of Winchester's; and that the latter gradually prevailed, since the King began to take notice of his Affairs. This Prince, now nineteen Years old, had a very mean Genius, and but little like his Father's. He easily suffered himself to be governed by those about him. Instead of having the Prejudice very common to young Princes, he was ever distrustful of himself, and chose rather to follow the Counsels of others, than his own. With this Weakness, he had Principles of Honour, Virtue and Religion, which indeed made him with, he could always act justly, but often served for Foundation and Pretence to his Counsellors, to draw him into many Injustices. As he wanted Penetration, he was deceived with Appearances. Of this his Ministers knew how to take advantage, assured as they were of his Incapacity to discern their self-interested Counsels. During his Youth, he had contracted a Habit of blindly following the Suggestions of the Duke of Glocester's his Uncle, who governed in his Name. But when he was of a more advanced Age, the Cardinal of Winchester and his Party insinuated to him, that his Uncle intended to keep him always in Guardianship, and had designs destructive of his Quiet. These Discourses frequently repeated, produced at length the Effect the Duke's Enemies expected. By degrees, the King had such an Aversion for his Uncle, that he would no longer regard him. It was made a sort of Rule to mortify him upon all Occasions. His moving any thing in Council was sufficient to have it strongly opposed, and the King generally countenanced the contrary Party to the Duke, out of Fear of giving him room to execute the pretended Design of keeping him in Subjection. Such for some time had been the Disposition of the King and Court.

The Duke of Glocester is a cruel revolving Duke of Orleans.

The Duke of Glocester had always opposed the Duke of Orleans's release. The late King his Brother's Will, was to him an inviolable Law. Besides, he was persuaded, the giving Orleans's his Liberty, would only increase the Number of the Enemies of England. But his Opposition was of no great weight; it rather served to induce his Enemies to favour the Duke of Orleans, had there been no other Reason. We have seen what this Prince offered before the Congress of Arras. The Duke of Bedford, and the Council, had accepted his Offers, which seemed very advantageous, because their Aim had not yet been discovered. After the Treaty of Arras, he perceived it was no proper time to solicit his Liberty. But when he saw that they began to talk of a Peace, he renewed his Instances, and offered to become joint Mediator with the Duke of Bretagne. He found in the Council the same favour as before, and in spite of the Duke of Glocester's Opposition, it was resolved to accept of his Mediation, and to treat with him afterwards concerning his Liberty. He had leave therefore to repair to the Congress, where he appeared very zealous to procure a Peace between the two Kings, and, by help of the Dukes of Burgundy, found means to be reconciled with the Duke her Husband. The Cardinal being returned into England, spoke very much to his Advantage, and represented to the Council, that since it was not his Fault, that the Peace was not concluded, it was unreasonable he should suffer by the Rupture. His Friends urged, on this occasion, the two Reasons already made use of, to colour the Favour that was intended him. The first was, that the Diffusion between the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy might rekindle, and turn very much to the Advantage of the English. The second, that the captive Prince might pay a large Ranom, which would help to carry on the War. In a word, they intimated, that before his release, he would be obliged to take the Oath to the King, and thereby hindered from assisting King Charles. So, in spite of whatever the Duke of Glocester could say, it was resolved to treat with him for his Liberty.

(1) This Year a Parliament met at Westminster, on November 12, which granted the King one Tenth, and one Fifteenth, and half of a Fifteenth, to be levied on the Luty; and the Subsidy of thirty three Shillings and Four-pence from Denizens, and forty six Shillings and Eight-pence from Aliens, for every Sack of Wool; 24 also Tunnage and Poundage, for which Aliens were to pay seven Shillings and Eight-pence. The Commons also granted, That if Aliens with the Realm, who were not Denizens, should pay to the King sixteen Pence, if they were Householdiers; and if not, then but six-pence. Cal. of Ab. 1439, p. 623, 622. In this Parliament it was enacted, That no Person should be made a Justice of Peace, in any County, who had not Lands or Tunes, nor been of late appearance Justice, who, on account of their small Behaviour, could not govern or rule the People; and officers, by reason of their Notoriety, committed great Extortions and Oppressions. It was also enacted, that no Citizen should play at his Soldiers Weights, or be paid at twenty Pence for every Spear, and ten Pence for a Bow, to be paid to the King. Statuta 18 Henry VI. c. 11, 12.

This Resolution being taken, the Duke of Glocester thought himself bound, both in Duty, and for his own Security, to make a formal Protestation, to shew the Publick, that he had opposed it to the utmost of his Power. The Protestation contained the Reasons, why he believed the Council's Resolution might be very prejudicial to the King and State. Though it be somewhat long, it will be necessary to insert the Substance, because it may be of Service in clearing several Facts. Besides, it shews the Disposition of the Members of the Council, who, to mortify the Duke, scrupled not to sacrifice the King's Interest to their Passion. This Knowledge is the more requisite, as it will be seen in the Sequel, that to the fatal Enmity between the Duke and the Cardinal, is to be ascribed the unfortunate Success of the War in France. The Sum of the Duke's Protestation was as follows:

"My first Reason for opposing the Duke of Orleans's Release, is taken from the known Incapacity of King Charles, and the Dauphin his Son. Therefore, considering the great Subtlety, and cautious Disposition of the Duke of Orleans, with his extensive Knowledge, it is to be presumed, the States of France will entrust him with the Administration of the Affairs of the Kingdom. Now, nothing can happen more prejudicial to England, since that Prince is perfectly acquainted with the strong and weak Side of the Kingdom, during a twenty five Year's Residence.

"II. The Diffusion between King Charles and the Dauphin his Son being no Secret, it ought to be feared, as it is but too probable, that the Duke of Orleans, when in France, will be a proper Mediator, to procure their Reconciliation.

"III. Normandy being the Province which contributes most towards carrying on the War, it is to be feared, the Normans, seeing the Succours, so often promised both by Word of Mouth and Letter, not sent, and on the other hand, the Duke of Orleans released, will imagine they are designed to be abandoned, as well as the rest of the Conquests. As to its being said, that twenty thousand Marks may be taken out of the Duke of Orleans's Ranom, for the Defence of that Province, I leave it to be considered, whether that Sum is sufficient for that purpose.

"IV. The King and Council are very sensible, the Duke of Orleans acknowledges King Charles for his Sovereign. Let it be considered then, whether having taken two opposite Oaths, the one to a Prince whom he looks upon as a Foreigner, the other to him whom he believes to be his lawful King, he will choose to keep the first rather than the last. This is the more improbable, as he will always consider the first as extorted, whilst he was actually a Prisoner, and moreover cannot stand to this Engagement, without forfeiting his Possessions in France.

"V. It would be proper to see what Security may be taken, in case he breaks his Oath, under colour of obeying the absolute Command of his Sovereign.

"VI. The Earl of Huntington, who commands in Guienne, will probably be obliged to quit his Govern-1440. "ment, because the King performs not what was promised him by Agreement. That Province being thus abandoned, and the Duke of Orleans in Alliance with the Houses of Albret and Armagnac, it should at least be considered, how that ancient Inheritance of the King will be defended, in case the Duke of Orleans joins Forces with those two Houses.

"VII. The King has no Ally in all Europe, but only the King of Portugal. Now if he will make Alliances with other Princes, how shall they be brought to hearken to his Proposals, when they shall come to know, that he had no other way to preserve his Father's Conquests, but by setting at Liberty one of his mortal Enemies?

"VIII. The late Reconciliation between the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy at Calais, ought to create a dread of their joining Forces to drive the English out of France, (as they certainly may do, unless God interposes,) instead of expecting any Advantage by their Diffention. If any stress is laid upon the Oath to be taken by the Duke of Orleans, before he leaves England, let a Man examine by the Civil Laws, how far the Oath of a Prisoner is to be depended upon.

"IX. If any of the Princes or Lords, who serve the King in France, chance to fall into the Enemies Hands, as it may easily happen, four or five might be exchanged for the Duke of Orleans alone. But in case that Prince is released, the English Princes and Lords cannot fight for the King, without being liable to utter Ruin.

"X. If, as it is likely, the Release of the Duke of Orleans occasions the loss of Normandy, and the rest of the King's Dominions in France, what will the King's Counsellors be able to say for themselves? What Murmurs will there be among the People, when it shall be considered, that these Conquests, purchased with the Lives of the late King, the Duke of Clarence, the Duke of Bedford, and an infinite Number of Princes, Lords, and Gentlemen, shall have been all lost by this fatal Counsel?

"XI. Lastly, Every one knows, the late King, wisely weighing the Danger which would arise from the Enlargement of the Duke of Orleans, forbid upon his Death-bed, to release that Prince till a Peace was concluded.

"And, as possibly, after my Death, I may be accused of consenting to this Resolution, I humbly entreat the King, that this my Protestation may be recorded, and an authentick Copy given me under the Great Seal, to serve for my Justification."

The Duke of Glocester's Request was granted, but his Protestation did not hinder the Execution of the Council's Resolution. The 2d of July the Agreement for the Duke of Orleans's release was signed by the King and the Duke, in two Originals, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

The Terms required of the Duke were much easier than those offered by himself before the Congress of Arras. He was not bound to acknowledge Henry for King of France, or to swear to him, much less to give him any Towns in Hostage, as he had formerly offered. Only his Word and Oath were taken for the Payment of his Ransom, let at a hundred and twenty thousand Crowns. It is true, by this Agreement he engaged to give Obligations from the Dauphin, the Duke of Bretagne, and some others, for the Sum of sixty thousand Crowns, which he was not to pay till after his Liberty. Moreover, he promised to procure the King's Letters Patents from King Charles authorizing the Agreement, and promising not to hinder the Execution, and to account the Duke of Orleans safe and infamous, if he violated the Articles. Finally, the Duke protesting, that as for the half of his Ransom, which he was to pay before he left England, it was impossible for him to perform his Engagement, without going to France, Leave was granted him for a Year.

The Council consisted then of Persons who blindly followed their Passion, without regarding the Interests of the King and State. Of this we shall quickly see very evident Proofs. The only thing that gave them any Uneasiness, was, that the Enlargement of the Duke of Orleans seemed directly contrary to the late King's Will. For, that Monarch had expressly enjoined by his last Will and Testament, that the Duke of Orleans should be kept Prisoner, till the King his Son was of Age, unless his Liberty should be a means to procure a Peace; but the King found an Expedient to screen themselves from the Murmurs of the People. The King declared by a Publick Act, that in releasing the Duke of Orleans, he meant not to contradict his Father's Will, but only to attain to a speedier Conclusion of a Peace. To shew more plainly this was the King's Intention, the Duke was bound by fresh Articles, to use his utmost Endeavours, to procure a Peace between the two Kings; and in case he succeeded, his Ransom was to be forgiven, and what he should have paid, to be restored. But if, on the contrary, his Endeavours proved fruitless, he was to return into England, and remain a Prisoner as before, but the Money advanced towards his Ransom, to be repaid. It is evident, these new Articles were only to throw dust in the People's Eyes, since they were directly contrary to the others, and a Condition was added, not in the Duke's Power. In the next Place, this appears still plainer, in that, the Peace not being concluded, the Duke did not return into England, nor was ever called upon. But he punctually performed the first Agreement.

All the French Authors have done the Duke of Burgundy the Honour to say, that he lent the Duke of Orleans Money to pay his Ransom; but we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that all he did in favor of his newly-reconciled Enemy, amounted to no more than this. He consented, that his Dukes should promise in her own Name, to send the King the Obligation for thirty thousand Crowns, which the Dauphin was to give, or, in case of refusal, to become responsible. But as the Dauphin made no scruple to give his Obligation, the Dukes of Burgundy's Promise became of no use. It is true, the Duke of Burgundy magnificently received the Duke of Orleans at Graveline, where they confirmed their Reconciliation. I have dwelt the longer upon the Duke of Orleans's Release, because it discovers the Disposition of the Court and Council, on which depend all the future Events of this Reign. Let us return now to the general Affairs.

The Duke of Bretagne pretended all along to observe a Neutrality, though the Succors brought by the Countess his Brother, from time to time, to King Charles, could the Duke of Bretagne neither be levied in his Country, nor led from thence without his Leave or Connivance. If the English had been in better Circumstances, they would doubtless have shewn their Repentment; but in the present Situation of their Affairs, they thought it no small Advantage, that the Duke of Bretagne did not openly declare for their Enemies. Mean while, as the English and the Bretons annoyed one another at Sea, contrary to the Interest of both Nations, the King and the Duke thought fit to conclude a Treaty, mutually promising, not to suffer any naval Armaments to be made in their Ports, to the detriment of each other's Subjects.

Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and Regent of France, dying in the beginning of the Summer, the Duke of York was sent thither again in that Quality (1), though he had been recalled, to give place to the Earl of Surrey (2).

If the English had been strong enough in France to improve the present opportunity, never had a fairer offered to repair their past Losses. The Dauphin, and all the Princes of the Blood, except the Duke of Burgundy and the Earl of Eu, were joined in a League against the King. This League tended to no less than to dethrone him, and set the Crown on the Head of the Prince his Son. But happily for him, the Confederates had engaged La Trimoille in their Party, and thereby entirely lost the Constable. As he mortally hated that Lord, his hatred extended to the whole Party, and induced them to bring the King a powerful Aid, which enabled him to give Law to the Princes. This Civil War was called La Praguerie, but for what reason I know not (3). The League was so ill managed on the part of the Confederates, that the King's dilatory length compelled them to implore his Mercy. Mean while, time, the English, who carried on the War very faintly, made some Incursions about Paris. But the Bastard of Orleans, who after siding first with the Dauphin, was returned to the King, stopped their Progress, which was not very considerable, by reason of their Weakness.

1440. After Charles had put an end to this dangerous War, he approached Paris, and in his way became Master of La Charité, by bribing the Governor.

Mean while, the Duchess of Burgundy never ceased her Endeavours to renew the Conferences for a Peace. At length, after labouring the whole Year to accomplish this Project, she prevailed with the two Kings, to appoint Plenipotentiaries to meet at St. Omer. The Duke of Orleans was chosen to be one of the Mediators.

This new Congress had no better Success than the former. The Ambassadors were now all at St. Omer; but the Earl of Vendôme, Head of the French Embassy, refused to treat with those of England, on pretence of their inferior Quality. They were however Peers of the Realm, namely, the Bishop of Rochester, and the Lord Fanhope (1). In the Reign of Henry V, the French did not stand upon such Punctilios. They readily conferred with bare Doctors in Law, provided they were duly impowered. It is true, the Ambassadors for this Congress were not of so high a Character as the former. But as there was no likelihood, the French would be more moderate in their Demands, the Council did not think proper to put the King, or the Princes, or any of the most considerable Lords, to a needless Expence. However, Charles took occasion from thence, to revoke the Powers given to his Ambassadors. Thus the Congress broke off without being ever opened. The French blamed the English, pretending the Court of England had designedly chosen Persons of no Birth or Note, that they might not be treated with. The Truth is, both Parties generally aimed only at amusing each other by these Conferences. They both guessed what their Adversaries were to demand, and, as they were resolved not to grant it, could expect no great Benefit from these Negotiations. They consented to them however, as well to justify themselves to the Publick, as to try to amuse each other with the hopes of a Peace.

Whilst the Ambassadors were repairing to St. Omer, Charles was assembling an Army to make a powerful Effort, and take advantage of the Indolence of the English. As soon as he was ready, he ordered Admiral de Coigny to invest Creil upon Oise, with a Detachment of the Army. The Constable joining him, with the rest of his Troops, the Siege was regularly formed, and the King came about the end of April, to receive the Town by Capitulation (2).

This was only a Preparative to a more considerable Undertaking, namely, the Siege of Pontoise, which Charles formed, the beginning of July (3), with an Army of twelve thousand Men. He had with him the Dauphin his Son, and all the Generals and Officers of Note in France. This Siege was at first carried on very vigorously, but the Besiegers showed no less Bravery. Talbot, whom the most difficult Enterprises could not discourage, being commissioned by the Duke of York to introduce a Convoy into the Town, attacked one of the Enemy's Quarters (4), and forming it, sent in his Convoy. This seasonable relief inspired the Garrison with fresh Courage, who made so brave a Defence, that the Siege proceeded but slowly. Though the Besiegers were executing watchful, having to deal with so experienced a Warrior as Talbot, they could not hinder him from throwing Scaquins into the Town, three several times. However, Charles obstinately resolved to continue the Siege, undertaken at the Instance of the Parisians, who defrayed all the Charges. But at length, the Duke of York, receiving from England a Reinforcement (5), which increased his Army to twelve thousand Men, approached the Town (6), and sent a Herald to the King to offer him Battle. Charles answered, he should see what was to be done, and meant not to regulate his Time, by that of his Enemies. He saw the English Army on the other Side the Oise, which they could pass only by a Bridge, guarded by a Detachment of a thousand Men. So, without any Apprehension of a sudden Attack, he leisurely continued the Siege. Mean while, the Duke of York, resolving at any rate to relieve the Place, found means to pass, in the Night, five or six hundred Men, in Boats of boiled Skins. This Detachment suddenly falling upon the Guard of the Bridge, and cutting them in pieces, opened a Passage for the Duke, who immediately came on the other Side with his whole Army. Charles was so astonished at this unexpected Action, that he suddenly raised the Siege, and retired under the Canon of Poissi. The Duke of York followed him, and offered him Battle in vain. At last, after braving him for some time, and plundering before his Face, the Abby of Poissi (7), he retired, not thinking proper to attack him in that Post.

The hasty Retreat of King Charles, before an Enemy much weaker than himself, was extremely injurious to his Reputation. All the French loudly murmured, but the Parisians more than all the rest. The King's best Friends were all dismayed, and openly shewed their Fear, that so general a Discontent would prove fatal to him. In short, those nearest his Person, intimating to him, how he had exposed his Reputation, by so inglorious an Action, he resolved to retrieve his Credit, let what would be the Consequence. So, when least expected, he returned before Pontoise (8), and carried it by Storm (9). He so immortalized himself in the Assault, that all the Impressions caused, by his former Conduct, to his Disadvantage, were effaced. He was seen on the Breach, Sword in Hand, fighting with an undaunted Courage, and exposing his Person like a common Soldier. By this vigorous Action, he plainly discovered, if he delighted not in War, it was not so much for want of Courage, as from a too great Attachment to his Pleasures. Some time after, the Town of Evreux was taken from the English, by the help of a Fisherman, who found means to introduce the French.

Whilst these Things passed in France, a very strange Spectacle attracted the Eyes and Attention of the People of England. I have frequently observed, that the Duke of Gloucester's Credit sensibly declined, or rather, was entirely sunk. Of this was seen a notable Proof in the Course of the present Year. This Prince was unblemishable in his Conduct, with regard to the King. Whatever Spies were placed about him by his Enemies, they could discover nothing that might serve for a Pretence to the least Charge against his Person. But at length, by narrowly observing what passed in his Family, they learnt, that his Duchess had frequent Conferences with [one Sir Roger Baldinoke] a Priest, who was reckoned a Necromancer, and a certain Woman (10), who was counted a Witch. This was sufficient to form a Charge of High-Treason against her. She was accused of mixing, with these two Persons, the King's Image in Wax; and that, placing it before a gentle Fire, she intended, the King's Strength should waste insensibly, as the Wax melted, and his Life be at an End, when the Image was all dissolved. By this Accusation, it was intended to shew, the Duchess's design was to destroy the King, that the Crown might fall to the Duke her Husband. At the same time, Suspensions were infused into the Duke himself. When the Parties accused were examined, the Priest denied all; but the Duchess confessed (11), she had desired the Woman to make her a Love-Potion for her Spouse, who sometimes went astray. Though this Confession did not make her guilty of the Crime she was accused of, the Duke's Enemies had taken such measure, that the Priest was condemned to be hanged, and the Woman to be burnt. As for the Duchess, though she would have been the most guilty, had the Thing been well proved; yet, out of a pretended regard to the Duke, she was only condemned to do publick Penance (12) in St. Paul's Church, and to be imprisoned for Life (13). This was a terrible Mortification to the first Prince of the Blood, who had been Protector of the Realm, and always shown an ardent Zeal for the King's Interest and Honour. But his Enemies were so powerful, that he was forced to be silent, for fear of giving them occasion to fall directly upon his Person.

Charles had scarce taken any Repose, after the Siege of Pontoise, before he saw himself extremely embarrassed. All the Princes of his House were in a fresh League against him, with the Duke of Orleans at their Head. This Prince was highly offended at the King's cold Reception, after a

Probably, this League would have entirely ruined the King's Affairs, if, by a fortunate Advice, he had not gained the Head by considerable Favours. The Duke of Orleans's Defection breaking all the Confederates Measures, they were forced to throw themselves upon the King's Mercy. Thus ended the League, and thus end generally all Leagues of Subjects against their Sovereigns, when the Sovereigns find means to content the Leaders.

1442. Charles having all the leisure necessary to prepare, spent the Winter in Poitou, where he assembled a considerable Army, consisting of four hundred Lances, eight thousand Cross-Bow-Men, and as many Archers. All the Lords of the Kingdom repairing to him, he counted one hundred and sixty Banners in his Army (1). Mean time England made no effort to defend Guienne, or give the Enemy a Diversion elsewhere. The Council, since it was no longer influenced by the Duke of Gloucester, seemed to be grown inconsiderate and thoughtless.

With the Forces assembled by Charles in Poitou, he humbled some tyrannical Lords of that Country, and from thence came to Limoges, where he made some Stay. After that, he passed some time at Montauban. There he lost the brave La Hire or Vignoles, one of his best Generals. The Relief of Tartas was not the sole Motive of his Journey. There was another, which touched him more nearly, and that was, to become Master of the Earldom of Cominge, which he had claimed by virtue of a Settlement in his favour. As this Affair has some relation to those of England, it will be necessary to show the Ground of his Pretensions.

Margaret, Heiress of Cominge, had two Daughters by her first Husband John III, Earl of Armagnac, who died in 1391; and the two Daughters died likewise soon after. The Countess was married afterwards to John d'Armagnac Earl of Fersenquet. But by an Outrage unheard of in France, the divorced her second Husband, who died with Grief in 1404. Then she espoused Matthew de Grailley Brother of John Earl of Foix, and by him had a Daughter, but of so weak a Constitution, that Matthew her Father was afraid, the Death of the Mother and Daughter would deprive him of the Earldom of Cominge, of which he was in possession. For this reason, he pressed his Counts, who was much older than himself, to make a Will, and settle it upon him after their Daughter. But the Counts refused it. Margaret's Obstinance occasioned such a Quarrel between her and her Husband, that he resolved to dispossess her, with the help of the Earl of Armagnac, who was very ready to join in the Project, on condition of going shares with him. Whereupon the Earl of Armagnac attacked, vanquished, took the Counts Prisoner, and with her Husband's Consent confined her in a Castle, where she remained twenty two Years. This rigorous Usage served only to exasperate the old Counts the more. At last in 1435 she found means in her Confinement to make a Will, where she nominated her Daughter Jane for her Heir, and after her settled the Earldom upon King Charles VII. Jane dying some time after, Charles heard of this Settlement, and as the Countess was still living, formed a Design to free her from Imprisonment, and cause her to confirm her Will. After he had made some stay at Montauban, he came to Toulouse, and ordered the Earls of Armagnac and Cominge to be summoned before the Parliament of that City. The two Earls made their Appearance, not daring to resist a Prince so well armed, who was able to compel them. Besides, since the Earl of Armagnac's Ancestors had voluntarily owned the Kings of France for their Sovereigns, there was no room to decline the Jurisdiction of their Parliaments. He was forced therefore to bring the old captive Countess, now fourscore Years of Age, to Toulouse, where the Parliament decreed the Settlement upon the King to be good and valid. Pursuant to this Decree, the King took possession of the Earldom of Cominge. But for the sake of Gaston Earl of Foix, who had succeeded his Father John in 1437, he was pleased to consent, that Matthew his Uncle should enjoy his Part of the Earldom during Life. The Earl of Armagnac was treated more rigorously. The King not only dispossessed him of the Part he had usurped, but stripped him of the Privilege of the Regale (2) in his Territories, and forbid him to stile himself, John by the Grace of God, Earl of Armagnac, as he, and his Ancestors before him, had done.

The Earl of Armagnac did not think he deserved such Usage, after all the Services his House had done the Kings of France. If, to espouse their Interests, his Ancestors had cast off the Dominion of the Kings of England, he would not have been liable to appear before the Parliament of Toulouse, nor have lost the Privileges, which the Kings of England, Dukes of Guienne, had never disputed with his Predecessors. So, he was extremely concerned to see the Zeal of his Ancestors for the Interest of France, become the occasion of his Oppression. He burned with Desire to free himself from this Yoke and be revenged: But as he was sensible, his Forces alone were not capable to procure him that Satisfaction, he resolved to cast himself into the Arms of the King of England. Shortly after, he sent to desire his Protection, with an Offer of one of his Daughters in Marriage. The Proposal being considered in the Council, it was judged, that in the present Posture of the King's Affairs in France, the Alliance proposed by the Earl of Armagnac could not but be very advantageous. So, without Loss of time, Ambassadors (3) were dispatched to the Earl of Armagnac, to settle the Marriage-Articles, and affianc one of his Daughters, in the King's Name.

Mean while, Charles appearing before Tartas, on the 24th of June, and no Enemy offering to give him Battle, the Place was restored to the Lord d'Albret, according to the Capitulation. The Preparations of the French were not unknown in England, and yet no measures were taken for the Defence of Guienne, which was going to be invaded. Charles taking advantage of this Negligence, became Master of St. Sever (4). Then he laid Siege to Ales, one of the strongest Places in those parts, which held out seven Weeks (5). The Siege was carried by Storm, and Marmande fell likewise into the hands of the French. During the Winter following, which was exceeding sharp, Ales and St. Sever opened their Gates to the English, but the Earl of Foix retook St. Sever. Charles passed the whole Winter at Toulouse.

Whilst these things were transacting at one end of the Kingdom, the English were thinking of making a Diversion at the other. They should have thought of it sooner, in order to hinder Charles's March into Guienne. By that means, they would have infallibly preferred the Places of Orleans lately lost. But however, Orders being given to raise five thousand Men in England, the Command was conferred on Talbot, whom the King had now created Earl of Shrewsbury (6). Talbot landing in Normandy, soon made the Earl of Baufford Orleans quit the Field, who had likewise a new Title, being made Earl of Dorset. He presently besieged the Castle of Conches, and to make a Diversion, the French General invested Galarde. Talbot having taken the Castle in a few Days, the Earl of Dorset did not think fit to expect his Enemy, who was marching directly to give him Battle. Then, the Earl of Shrewsbury advanced towards Dieppe, a Place of great Importance, which the French still held in Normandy. He made such haste, that Estouteville, who was marching with the utmost Diligence, to throw in a Supply of Troops, could not arrive in time. When he was before the Place, he formed the Siege, tho' with an Army little proportionable to such an Undertaking, and especially in November. Indeed, he did not expect to be Master of the Town during the Winter, and without more Forces. But his Design was to take the Fort of Charles-Maignol, situated on Mount Pelot, which defended the Passage to Dieppe. After that he hoped to press it so closely, that it should be forced to surrender. Having thus taken his Measures, he attacked and carried the Fort, which he ordered to be made larger and stronger. Then mounting his Batteries, left the Management of the Siege, or rather Blockade, to his Bastard Son, and returned into England (1), to solicit a Supply (2).

As Matters then stood at Court, it was no very proper Season for the Earl of Sbreshbury to obtain the Success he desired, at least so soon as was necessary. The Duke of Gloucester perceiving the King's Affairs daily declined, brought at this very time before the Council, an Accusation of High-Treason, against the Cardinal of Winchester. Probably, his Enmity to that Prelate made him think, he was the sole Occasion of all the Misfortunes, befalling the English. It may be, he only designed to clear himself to the Publick, by accusing his Enemy. And indeed, so well acquainted, as he doubtless was, with the Members of the Council, he could not flatter himself, with the least hopes of succeeding in an Affair of that Nature. However this be, the Charge consisted of fourteen Articles, the Substance whereof, was as follows:

I. That the Bishop of Winchester had taken upon him the Dignity of Cardinal, contrary to the late King's Orders, and in derogation to the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury.

II. That, by the Statute of Provisors, having forfeited the Bishoprick of Winchester, he had procured the Pope's Bull to secure it, contrary to the Laws of the Realm, and particularly to the Statute of Premunure.

III. That jointly with John Kemp Archbishop of York, he had assumed the Government of the King's Person, without being authorized.

IV. That he had defrauded the King of his Jewels. This Article was grounded upon the Cardinal's lending the King Money upon Pawn (3).

V. That being Chancellor of the Kingdom, he had sealed an Order for the Release of the King of Scotland, and another to forgive that Prince part of his Ranfom, on condition of marrying his Niece.

VI. That he had defrauded the King of his Revenues, by applying to his own Use, the Customs of Wools at the Port of Southampton.

Probably, the Cardinal stopped by that Means the Money, he had lent the King.

VII. That he had the Confidence to summon People before him, in derogation of the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Authority Royal.

He did this probably, as Legate: But he could not do it according to Law, without the King's Licence.

VIII. That he had procured from Rome, an Exemption for his Diocese, from paying Tenths to the King; and thereby, given a pernicious Example to the rest of the Bishops.

IX. That he had been instrumental in reconciling the Duke of Burgundy, to King Charles and the Duke of Orleans, to the great prejudice of England.

X. That being the King's Ambassador and Plenipotentiary to treat of a Peace, he had sent the Archbishop of York to the King, to persuade him to quit the Title of King of France, to the Dishonour of the King, and his illustrious Ancestors.

XI. That the Duke of Orleans's Release, had been procured by him, and the Duke of York's Intrigues, contrary to the express Order of the late King.

XII. That being Chancellor, he had himself purchased Crown-Lands, instead of preventing such Alienations, according to the Duty of his Office.

XIII. That by commissioning such Officers only in the Army, as were his Creatures, he had been the Cause of all the Losses sustained in France.

XIV. That he had sold Captains Commissions, and thereby, introduced into the King's Service, such as were incapable of doing their Duty.

These Accusations were read in Council. But the Council, for some time, had consisted only of the Cardinal's Creatures, and the Duke of Gloucester's Enemies. So, under colour of being unwilling to meddle with the Prerogative Royal, the Pardon granted to the Cardinal, in 1437, was urged. The Duke of Gloucester, perceiving there was no possibility of causing his Enemy to be condemned, dropped the Prosecution, and the King gave the Cardinal a fresh Pardon.

Certainly the Duke of Gloucester was in a sad Situation. Besides his Vexation, to see those who were at the Helm, steering a Course, directly contrary to that marked out by the glorious Henry V., his Brother, he perceived there was a settled Design to mortify him on all Occasions. The King his Nephew, who was so much obliged to him, suffered himself to be misled by the Artifices of his Enemies; not having penetration enough to discern those, who had only their own Interest in View. He was made to consider his Uncle as a secret Enemy, that would rejoice at his Destruction, because he was his next Heir. What is more, they inspired him with strong Suspicions of him, by representing him as a Counsellor, whose Interest it was to engage him in wrong Courses, in order to render him contemptible and odious to his Subjects, and thereby, pave his own way to the Crown. It is no wonder, a young Prince of so mean a Genius as Henry, should be blinded by such Insinuations. He had none about his Person to undeceive him, and for some time, had seen only his Uncle's Enemies. The Cardinal was ever watchful, not to suffer any Person at Court, or in the Council, but what was devoted to him; and this he made his chief Business. He it was, that had introduced to Court, the Earl of Suffolk (4), for whom, the King had conceived so strong an Affection, that he saw nothing but with his Eyes, and did nothing but by his Advice. As the new Favorite wholly owed his fortune to the Cardinal, he missed no opportunity to insinuate to his Master, that of all his Subjects, the Cardinal was most safely to be trusted. By this means, he daily sunk the Duke of Gloucester's Credit, whose Counsels were always directly contrary to those of his Enemy. John Kemp Archbishop of York and Cardinal (5), was also a Counsellor entirely devoted to the Cardinal of Winchester, and his Instrument to confirm the King in his Suspicions of the Duke of Gloucester. Thus these three Ministers, being strictly united together, so ordered it, that the King daily gave his Uncle some fresh Mortification. On the other hand, the haughty and impatient Temper of the Duke of Gloucester, not suffering him to bear Indignities, without complaining and threatening the Authors, he promoted his own downfall, by the continual Faults his impatience caused him to commit.

In September this Year, the Dukes of York was delivered of a Prince, whom we shall see hereafter mount the Throne by the Name of Edward IV (6).

John V. Duke of Bretagne, dying the 28th of August, Francis his eldest Son, succeeded him in the Sovereignty of that Duchy (7).

The Year 1443, began with a private Negotiation between the King and the Duke of Burgundy. The Duke finding the Affairs of the two Kings to be in such a way, as not likely to be decided, either by War or Peace, thought it advisable to secure himself, by a separate Truce with England. He was not pleased with King Charles upon several Accounts, too tedious to be related. On the contrary, he had reason to fear, Charles was reconciled to him only out of Policy; and in case his Affairs should once be restored, might resume his old Enmity against him. For this cause chiefly, he judged it against his Interest, to assist him any longer to finish a War, the prosperous Issue whereof might render him too powerful. These Considerations induced him to give his Dukes full Power, to conclude with the King of England a general Truce, for all their respective Dominions. The former concerned only the Trade between England, and the Low-Countries; but this, signed the 23d of April, included Burgundy, and all the Duke's Territories in general. It was to last till one of the Parties should put an end to it; in which Case, the other was to have three Months notice.

The Blockade of Dieppe was still continued, in expectation of Supplies from England, to press the Town more vigorously. Charles perceiving, it would be in great 445. danger, if not relieved before the Arrival of the English Troops, resolved at last to send the Dauphin his Son, who pressed him to commit this Expedition to his care. It was however with unwillingness, that he granted him this Favor. He was not only afraid to trust out of his Sight this young Prince, who had several Times given Proofs of a turbulent Spirit, but moreover, did not care to afford him opportunities of acquiring Glory. These Considerations, however, gave place to the Necessity of relieving Dieppe, which was reduced to Extremity, by an eight Months Blockade. The Dauphin departed from Guienne, with four thousand Horse, and marched towards Normandy. When he came within Sight of Dieppe, he easily saw, the Fort of Charles-Mesnil, where the English had fortified themselves, was impregnable on the Side next the Country; and therefore, without hesitation, resolved to enter the Town, and, in spite of the English, executed his Design. Hardly was he entered, when without giving them time to come to themselves, he sallied out with all his Troops, and stormed the Fort on the Side next the Town. He was thrice repulsed, but, the fourth time, carried it Sword in Hand. The English finding they were unable to continue the Blockade, after the loss of their Fort, raised it, and retired in good Order. John Duke of Somerset (1), arrived five Days after, with a Reinforcement of five thousand Men (2). Had he come sooner, the Dauphin would not perhaps have performed this Enterprize with so much Honour. As the Duke found the Blockade raised, he could do nothing more than ravage Part of the Enemies Country (3), after retaking some Castles in Normandy.

After the Dauphin's Departure, Charles, at last, quitted Guineve, and came to Tours, where he diverted himself after the Fatigues of the War. But his Pleasures were somewhat disturbed, by the News of the Earl of Armagnac taking Arms, and seizing that Part of the Kingdom of Comings, of which, he had been lately dispossessed. The voluptuous Life Charles led at Tours, was so alluring, that he could not resolve to interrupt his Pleasures so soon. He waited till the Dauphin's return, and, as he had gallantly behaved in the Affair of Dieppe, sent him, immediately after his Arrival, to chastise the Earl of Armagnac. Upon the Dauphin's Approach, the Earl saw himself deserted by all his Friends, and unsupported by the English, though the King was affianced to his Daughter. So, the Dauphin with ease became master of Rovergne, and of all, in general, that belonged to the Earl, who had nothing left, but the little Town of Lisles en Tourdain, about twelve Miles from Toulouze. The Dauphin held it long besieged in vain. At length, despairing of putting an honorable end to the Siege, he artfully drew the Earl to a Conference, upon the promise of a safe Conduct, and when he had him in his Power, sent him to the King his Father, who made no scruple to detain him (4). Two Years after, he restored him his Territories, at the Request of the Kings of Castile, Navarre, who interceded in his Behalf.

The Earl of Armagh's Misfortune, caused the King and Council of England, to grow cold with respect to the Marriage, of which, there was no further Talk. It was not scrupled, to put that Affront upon an unfortunate Prince, who was unable to be revenged (5).

Since the Duke of Burgundy's separate Truce with Hon-ry, the French were not so eager to continue the War. The truth is, they had no less need of Repose than the Engl^{ish}. France was utterly ruined, by this fatal War, which had lasted twenty Years, without Interruption, and by the intestine Troubles, raised several Years before the breach of the Truce, by the Quarrel between the Houses of Orleans and Burgundy. The Princes and great Men, were distressed at the Fatigues and Losses, they so long sustained. The Country and Towns were become desolate; France, though generally well peopled, could no longer find Soldiers. Besides, the Duke of Orleans, who had promised to use his utmost Endeavours to procure a Peace, being willing to keep his word, never ceased to solicit King Charles upon that head. The Duke of Burgundy pressed him likewise on his Part, and the whole Kingdom in general, ardently wished to see a Cessation of so many Calamities. In England, a Peace was no less earnestly desired. All the Money levied there, was swallowed up in France, as in a bottoniſſes Gulf, from whence it never returned. In a word, the King was no Warrior, and his Council conſiſted, for the moſt Part, of Eccleſiaſtics, introduced by the Cardinal of Wincheſter, to ſtrengthen his Party. The Council was very ſenſible, the Continuance of the War would, by no means, recommend them to the People. As the War had, for ſome time, been diſadvantageous to England, it was natural to throw the Blame, upon thoſe that ſat at the Helm, rather than upon the King, who only approved of what was ſuggeſted by his Miniſters. The Duke of Glouceſter alone was of Opinion, that freſh Efforts ſhould be made, to take the Advantage of King Charles's Weakneſs, and of the late Truce with the Duke of Burgundy. But this Principle was no longer in Vogue, nor were his Councils regarded.

These Considerations, which were very weighty on both Sides, prevailed at length with the two Kings, to hearken to the Instances of the Duke of Burgundy, who pressed them to consent to a Truce, in order more calmly to endeavour a Peace. It was agreed, the Negotiation should be at Tours, where King Charles resided, though by that, the English seemed to be going to beg it. At any other time, the bare proposal of treating at Tours, would have been sufficient for a Rupture; but Henry's Council were not so nice. They were for having a Truce at any rate, and nothing appeared dishonourable to attain that end. We shall even see presently, that almost every thing was settled in private, before the Ambassadors set out for Tours. This Truce, which seemed to be founded on the publick Good, was properly designed only for the Support of the Ministers, who had nothing left in View, than the Kingdom's Advantage. Henry understood nothing of it, but suffered himself to be guided, according to Custom, by his Counsellors, who made him believe, they had his Interest at Heart, when in reality they were working only for themselves.

William de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, was appointed head of this Embassy (6). The Earl had more Reasons than one to desire this Office, as will be seen presently. Mean while, as he was not ignorant how ticklish a Service he was going to make, and how liable to be strictly inquired into, he presented to the King a Petition, which, probably, had been concerted with the principal Members of the Council. He showed in this Petition, a great Scruple with regard to his Instructions, pretending they were beyond his Capacity, though, it is likely, he was himself the Author. Then, he modestly begged to be eased of the burthen of the Negotiation; or at least, if the King did not think proper to grant him that Favour, he would be pleased to secure him against all Imputation. Whereupon the King, by the Advice of his Council, caused to be drawn an authentic Order, to execute fully, whatever was contained in his Instructions: As, probably, this Order was to be shown, only in case of necessity, and after the Execution, the King said in it, that the Instructions concerned not only the general Good of the Kingdom, but also his own Person and Marriage. A clear Evidence, that the Marriage, spoken of presently, was already resolved.

The Ambassadors of England being come to Tours, ^{AT-108} entered immediately into Negotiation with King Charles's ^{consulted} Commissioners, concerning a Peace. But after some mutual and fruitless Proposals, they were content with a ^{Tours,} Truce, which was signed the 28th of May. It was to ^{the 29,} commence the 7th of July (7) this Year, and end the ^{the 11th,} first of April 1446.

At the same time, the Truce between England and Scotland, was prolonged at Edinburgh for seven Years, to begin the 1st of May 1447, which was the Day, the former was to expire.

The Affair of the Truce with France being ended, the Earl of Suffolk proposed, or caused to be proposed, the King's Marriage with Margaret of Anjou, Daughter of René of Anjou, who bore the Title of King of Sicily, after the Death of Lewis III., his elder Brother. This English tax the Earl of Suffolk, with making this Proposal of himself, without any Authority; but we have seen the contrary above. Not but that, probably, he was the first Contriver, but he had taken the precaution to procure the King's Approbation. He was willing to keep in his present Post, and nothing was more proper to support him, than this Marriage. He knew, that, was himself incapable of governing; and consequently, it could not be, but that his Ministers would be liable to Envy, and bear the blame of whatever was not agreeable to the People. In this belief, he fancied, the best way to support himself, was to give the King a Wife, and at the same time, the Kingdom a Governess. To that end, it was necessary, the Princess who was to mount the Throne, should be of an Understanding, proper to supply the Defect of the King her Spouse, and of a Resolution, to protect the Ministry. It was necessary moreover, that she should be of a Rank not to disparage the King, but withal, should have no ground naturally to aspire to such a Marriage; that being entirely indebted for it to the Managers, she might be always ready to support them. The Earl of Suffolk's Aim was likewise to be strictly united with the Queen, in order to complete the Ruin of the Duke of Gloucester, who was a perpetual Obstacle to the Designs of the Ministry. All these Requisites were found in Margaret of Anjou, Daughter of René King of Sicily, and Niece of the Queen of France. She was a Princess of a lively, daring Spirit, of great Penetration, uncommon Resolution, and not to be frightened by Opposition or Difficulties. On the other hand, the Marriage proposed by the Earl of Suffolk was so advantageous, that she could not have expected it, without the Concurrence of several Circumstances in her favour. I do not speak of her Birth, which certainly was illustrious enough to give her a Pretension to this Honour. But she was so destitute of the Goods of Fortune, that her Parents could not give her any Dowry. To supply this Defect, the English Ministers extolled her noble Qualities, which, they said, were more valuable than all the Money in the World. But they chiefly insinuated to the People, that this Princess being Niece to the Queen of France, and to King Charles's Favorite, would be very instrumental in procuring a Peace. This was plainly shewing how much this Peace was wanted. Accordingly, the Court of France, who had perfect Intelligence of what passed in England, made their advantage of it, by engaging the Earl of Suffolk to promise, in the King's Name, to deliver Maine, and the whole Province of Maine, to the King of Sicily; on condition, he should present them to Charles of Anjou his Brother. Thus, instead of receiving Margaret's Dowry, Henry purchased her with the Restitution of one of the strongest Places in France, or rather, with the whole Province of Maine.

The Terms being thus settled, the Earl of Suffolk returned to England, to propose them to the King, and cause them to be approved. This was no difficult thing, since the principal Counsellors were in the Secret, and had already given their Consent. The Duke of Gloucester, who had never heard of it before, strongly opposed it, for two Reasons, which seemed unanswerable. The first was, That the King being already engaged to the Earl of Armagnac's Daughter, it would be very dishonourable to violate his Faith, without alleging the least Excuse. The second was of no less Force, namely, that Maine, being as it were the Bulwark of Normandy, could not be abandoned, without putting Normandy in manifest danger, as soon as the Truce should expire. But these Reasons were not regarded. So, by the Advice of the Council, the King empowered the Earl of Suffolk, to espouse the Princess Margaret in his Name.

For Joy the Marriage was concluded, the King created the Earl, his Ambassador, Marquis of Suffolk, and upon John Holland Earl of Huntingdon, conferred the Title of Duke of Exeter (1). At the same time he created Humfrey Earl of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, and Henry de Beauchamp, Son of the late Earl of Warwick, Duke of Warwick (2).

In Consideration of his Father's great Defect, the King granted him Place in Parliament, and all other Meetings, next the Duke of Northfolk, and before Humfrey Duke of Stafford Duke of Buckingham; which occasioning great Animosities between them, by a special Act made in Parliament, it was established, that they should have Precedency by Turns yearly, the Duke of Warwick to begin the first Year: But his Death, shortly after, put an end to this Matter. Dugdale's Barons. They also granted Tunnage and Poundage as before (on Demizens, but double on Aliens: And gave a Subsidy of thirty four Shillings and Four-pence on Demizens, and fifty three Shillings on Aliens, for every Sack of Wool, for four Years. Cotton's Abridg. p. 629, 630. In this Parliament it was enacted, That to prevent Opposition, and Exactions, no Men should be Sheriff or Under-sheriff, above one Year, upon pain of forfeiting two hundred Pounds. Statute.

(9) A whole Fifteenth. Hall, fol. 148.

The King's Marriage was solemnized by Proxy at 1444. Tours, in the Preface of King Charles and his whole Court (3), in a splendid manner, little suitable to the present Circumstances of the two Kings, and the Indigence of the new Queen.

Though the Nuptials were celebrated in November, the Queen came not into England till the May following (4), and on the 30th of the same Month, was solemnly crowned. She was no sooner with the King, but perceiving his Weakness, she ruled him with an absolute Sway. By that means the Marquis of Suffolk, the Cardinal of Winchester, and the Archbishop of York, had the same Credit as before the King's Marriage. They stood in need of the Queen, as she did of them, since she had yet no other Creatures, but what they had procured her. For this reason, a very strict Union was formed between the Queen and the Ministers, which could not but end in the Ruin of the Duke of Gloucester, whom they all looked upon as their common Enemy.

The Truce being made only in order to a Peace, this whole Year was spent in several Negotiations, concerning the Time and Place of a new Congress. It was thought of the likewise, that an Interview of the two Kings might promote the Conclusion of a Peace. So the Ministers of both Courts agreed, that the two Monarchs should meet somewhere in France; and for that purpose, Henry should repair to Calais, in order to be near the Place to be chosen for the Interview. But several Difficulties occurring about the choice of the Place, the Truce was prolonged till November the 1st, 1446.

Henry Chicheley, who held the See of Canterbury thirty Years (5), died this Year, and was succeeded by John Stafford, Bishop of Bath and Wells.

The Duke of York having no farther Business in France, came into England, where he was very civilly received, and thanked by the Court, for his Services to the State. The King, willing to shew his Gratitude, granted him a Patent to be Regent of France, another five Years. We shall see hereafter, his Enemies would not suffer him to enjoy that Dignity so long.

The Parliament which met the beginning of the Year 1446, granted the King a considerable Subsidy, for a vigorous Prosecution of the War in France, as soon as the Truce was expired (6). But this pretended design of continuing the War, was only a Decoy to draw Money from the Parliament. Instead of Preparations for War, Negotiations for the Interview of the two Kings, and for a Congress of Ambassadors to conclude a Peace, were zealously continued. Mean while the Truce was farther prolonged to April the 1st, 1447. This shews, the Council intended not to carry on the War, though the Parliament was called on that Pretence. We shall see presently, the Truce was again prolonged, and interrupted only by an unexpected Accident, contrary to the Intention of the English Ministry (7).

The Parliament might easily have perceived the Devices made use of to procure Subsidies, if they had not voluntarily shut their own Eyes. This was one of those Parliaments that are managed, as it is but too often the case, by the Intrigues of the Court. This plainly appeared, in a Resolution to return the Marquis of Suffolk publick Thanks, for his great Service to the Kingdom, in negotiating the King's Marriage (8). Mean time, the Advantages accruing to the King or State, from an Alliance with the Family of the most mortal Enemy to both, had not hitherto been perceived. Neither was the Parliament contented with this. They addressed the King, praying him to reward the Marquis; and even granted a Subsidy (9) on purpose to satisfy him for the Expences of his Embassy.

The Queen, the Cardinal of Winchester, the Marquis of Suffolk, and the rest of that Party, finding themselves sufficiently established, and having nothing to fear from a Parliament so much at their Devotion, began to contrive the ruin of the Duke of Gloucester, who was ever formidable to them. The People, for the most part, were in his Interest. Besides, as hitherto he was presumptive Heir of the Crown, they had reason to fear, in case he should one day mount the Throne, he would call them to an account. Their first Step was to remove him from the Council. To give some Colour to this Injustice, Persons were suborned to accuse him of divers Crimes, the Principal whereof was, that being Protector of the Realm, he had put several to Death by his own Authority (1), and aggravated the Condemnation of many others. Upon these Accusations, about which a great Noise was made, he was summoned before the Council. But he cleared himself with such Evidence, from all that was laid to his Charge, that the Council, though entirely composed of his Enemies, thought not fit to prosecute him thereon. It is not in England as in other Countries, where the Lives of the Subjects depend in some measure on the Will of the Sovereign, who appoints such Commissioners as he pleases, to prosecute those he has a mind to destroy. To take away the Duke of Gloucester's Life in a legal manner, he must have been tried by his Peers. But his Enemies were well aware, how great soever their Credit might be, the Body of the Nobility was not so corrupted, as to hope to cause the first Prince of the Blood to be condemned, upon forged Crimes. Mean while, this Proceeding so moved the Londoners, that nothing was heard, but Praises of the Duke of Gloucester, and Curses against those who governed in the King's Name. These Murmurs, which were plain Indications of the People's Affection for the Duke, convinced his Enemies, there was no Medium between him and their Ruin. Accordingly, without further Consideration, they resolved to dispatch him out of the way. The Queen, who was of a bold and enterprising Genius, was the Person that first encouraged this Resolution. At least, the Historians insinuate as much, if they have not expressly said it. And indeed, the Ministry would never have ventured upon such an Action, without having her at their Head.

It was not possible, as was observed, to put this Prince to death, by the usual Course of Justice; and it would have been very dangerous to murder him openly. His Enemies were bent to destroy him, but would conceal the Hand that should give the Blow. To execute their design with all possible Secrecy, they devised a Means, counteracted, if not contrived, by the Queen. This was, to accuse him of some Crime, in order to have a pretence to imprison him, and then their Plot might, with great privacy and ease, be accomplished. For this purpose, it was rumoured, that a very important Affair required the speedy meeting of a Parliament. Accordingly, one was called for the February following (2). In the mean time, the Queen and Ministry affected to load the Duke of Gloucester with Honours and Cares, not to inspire him with Confidence, but with Suspensions. They would have been glad at his absencing himself, or taking some other Course, that would have given them an Advantage against him. To that end, they endeavoured, by secret Emisaries, to terrify him, in warning him to take care of himself, and hinting a design to accuse him before the Parliament of sundry Crimes and Misdemeanors; and that every thing was prepared for his Condemnation; that St. Edmundsbury was purposely chosen for holding the Parliament, as a Place more proper for this Design than London, where he was supported by the People. All this was only to induce him to withdraw, and thereby give himself some appearance of Truth to the Calumnies, wherewith it was intended to blacken him. But as he knew his own Innocence, he would not, by absencing himself, give occasion to the World, to believe him guilty. However, he could not, after all, avoid falling into his Enemies' Snare.

The first Day of the Session, the Duke was apprehended (3), and put into close Confinement, without being allowed to keep any of his Domesticks. To give a plausible colour to this severe Usage, Care was taken to publish, that he was accused of conspiring to kill the King, in order to seize the Crown; and with an armed Force, to deliver his Duchies out of Kenilworth Castle, where she was imprisoned. The first of these Accusations found no Credit at all with the People. On the contrary, there was presently a Commotion in the City in his favour, but which was soon appeased. As the People thought him Innocent, they imagined he would clear himself from these, as he had from the former Charges. But he was allowed neither time nor Opportunity to make his Defence. On the Morrow, he was found dead in his Bed, without any Signs of Violence on his Body. However, the People were convinced he was murdered. Some say, he was smothered between two Feather-beds; and others, that he underwent the same Fate with Edward II. To remove these Suspensions, his Body was shewn to both Houses of Parliament (4), and exposed, for some Days, to public View. But a Man must have been very bold, to charge with this Murder, those that were considered as the Authors. These were no less than the Managers of the Affairs of the Kingdom, who, in sacrificing the first Prince of the Blood to their Malice and Vengeance, plainly shewed, what Enemies of an inferior Rank were to expect.

Mean while, to make good, in some measure, the Impeachment against the deceased, several of his Domesticks were apprehended, and accused of being in the Plot to kill the King. Whereupon they were all sentenced to die, by Judges appointed by virtue of the King's Commission, of whom the Marquis of Suffolk was chief. But, though the Crime for which they were condemned was the most heinous, the King pardoned them all without Exception (5). This Act of Grace was founded upon the Consideration of Good-Friday, and the Assumption of the Virgin, with the like pious and religious Motives. This gives occasion to presume, these People were bribed to confess themselves guilty, upon Assurance of their Pardon. However this be, there was no Enquiry made after the sudden Death of the Duke of Gloucester. Nay, it was pretended, he was notoriously guilty of the Crime, for which his Domesticks were condemned, though they had never been confronted with him. But as these Domesticks were not those whom he most trusted, nor even some of the principal, it could not be thought, that he would have been so imprudent, as to make them his Instruments, or communicate to them such a Design, if he had really conceived it.

The Outrage exercised upon a Prince of this Character, so universally beloved and esteemed by the People, drew upon the Queen and the Ministers an almost universal Hatred, which time could never efface. The Queen especially was publicly charged with the Murder, and the Respect due to her was not capable of bridling People's Tongues. This however is the very Queen, whom the French load with excessive Commendations, probably because she was of the Royal Family of France. It is true, they very slightly pass over the Duke of Gloucester's Death, without endeavouring to justify her. As for the King, very likely, he was not consulted in this infamous Action. But whether he did not so much as suspect the Authors of the Murder, or had not the Courage to punish them, he can in some measure be excused only on account of his natural Weakness. I cannot leave this Subject, without remarking, how short-sighted human Policy is. The Queen and the rest of the Duke of Gloucester's Enemies thought, his Death had secured them from all Opposition. But by the just Judgement of God, the Duke's Death was the very Cause of the Ruin of the King, Queen, and all that were concerned. The Duke of York thereby gave himself at Liberty to assert his Claim to the Crown, a Claim which occasioned Torrents of English Blood to be shed, and of which doubts he would never have thought, if there had been such a Competitor as the Duke of Gloucester (6).

When this Tragedy was acting in England, the Negotiations for a Peace were carrying on in France. But as

The Vault wherein his Body was deposited, and the exact Place of which was, it seems, then unknown, was discovered in the late Queen Anne's Reign. He was called, The Good Duke of Gloucester. He gave his Education in Balliol College, he became a great Professor in Learning, and was a great Favourite of learned Men. He laid the first Foundation of the famous Library at Oxford, since known by the Name of Bodleian, from Sir Thomas Bodley, by whom it was wonderfully increased. Sir Thomas More gives an Instance of this Duke's Sagacity. The King coming one time in Progress to St. Albans, a Beggar born blind, as he said, recovered his Sight at the Shrine of St. Alban. The Miracle being noised about, the Duke being there with the King, desired to see him. The Beggar being brought, he asked him, whether he was born blind? He answered, Yes truly. And can you now see, says the Duke? Yes, I thank God and St. Alban, replies the Beggar. Tell me then, says the Duke, what Colour is my Gown? The Beggar readily told him the Colour. And what Colour, says the Duke, is such a one's Gown? The Beggar likewise told him; and so of several others. You counterfeit Knave, says the Duke, how came you that were born blind, and could not see till now, so suddenly to know the Difference of Colours? And thereupon, instead of an Alms, ordered him to be let in the Stocks.

 Mean time, the Duchess of Burgundy, by virtue of the Power received from the Duke her Husband, prolonged the Truce with England till 1459, on condition that, which of the two Princes should desire to break it, should give the other twelve Months notice. After that, a new Treaty was made, May the 4th, whereby both Parties agreed, that the Truce should not be broke within the first four Years.

The Death of the Cardinal of Winchester. Hall. Sausford.
 The Cardinal of Winchester, one of the principal Authors of the Duke of Gloucester's Death, enjoyed but one Month the Satisfaction of his Enemy's Fall (1). He was a Prelate much more proper for the World than the Church. Accordingly he remained, to his last Breath, attached to the former. He is said to die in a fort of a Passion, that his Riches were not capable of exempting him from the common Fate of all Mankind, and to see himself thereby upon a level with the most miserable.

The People murmur against Suffolk.
 Mean while, the People perceiving, the time designed for procuring a Peace was spent in vain, loudly murmured against the Marquis of Suffolk. It was openly said, he had betrayed the King and the State; that his Treaty with the French tended only to a Truce destructive to England, as it afforded the Enemy time to fortify himself; that he had engaged to deliver Maine to the French, in order to marry the King to a Princess, who had given sensible Proofs of the Calamities the English were to expect under her Government. These Murmurs were so publick, that the Marquis could not help taking notice of them; and in order to silence them, requested the King to hear his Defence, that he might satisfy him of his Innocence. Whereupon the King let him a Day to clear himself, and heard him in his own Apartment, in the presence of several Lords,

He asks the Duke of Suffolk to be his Secretary. p. 172.
 none of whom were there with a design to refute him. He related all he had done in France, and could easily justify himself, since he had taken care, before his Departure, to be fortified with the King's Orders. Having finished his Speech, the King declared himself satisfied, and gave him Letters Patents under the Great Seal, acquitting him from all Imputation of Misdemeanor, and forbidding all Persons, on pain of his Displeasure, to accuse or speak ill of him. But this was not capable of putting a Stop to the People's Murmurs. It was not doubted that the King would be satisfied, but this was not thought a sufficient Reason to satisfy the Nation. Notwithstanding the Marquis's pretended Defence, he was looked upon with Horror, as he was believed to be the principal Author of the Duke of Gloucester's Murder. Besides the King's Marriage, procured by his means, was considered as one of the greatest Calamities that could befall England. This was the general Opinion of Town and Country: But the Court, where the Queen would suffer none but her Creatures, stood otherwise affected. The Ministers had likewise for Adherents, throughout the Kingdom, such as found their Account in their Attachment to the Court, that is, whoever held any Post or Office under the Ministry. These employed their Authority and Endeavours, to stifle the Complaints and Murmurs of the People, who could not bear to see the Administration of the publick Affairs in the Hands of a Foreigner. Indeed, the King, incapable of holding the Reins of the Government himself, only lent his Name to the Queen, who made use of it as she pleased. For his Part, he minded nothing but his Devotions, wherein the Queen took care to make him spend his whole time, as in the only thing he was fit for, in order to divert him entirely from the Government. Some have made a Saint of this Prince. But he may be said to be one of those Saints, more commendable for the Vices they have not, than for the Virtues they possess, and to whom a great Weakness of Mind is instead of Merit and Worth.

The People's Disposition with regard to the Queen.
 It was impossible for the Queen, and the Marquis of Suffolk, to govern the Kingdom alone, without raising Jealousy. It was not customary to see the Queens take upon them the Government. Accordingly, this was perceived with Uneasiness to usurp an arbitrary Power in the King's Name, who had no farther concern in the Affairs, than to sign, without Examination, the Orders that were brought him. The Queen's haughty Carriage, her Partiality in disposing of Places, and above all, the Duke of Gloucester's Murder, had drawn upon her the Hatred of the Nation to such a Degree, that she was every where talked of with very little Respect. Her intimate Union with the Marquis of Suffolk, gave her Enemies a fresh occasion to spread Reports not much to her Honour. The Marquis was no more beloved than the Queen. It was he that had brought her into England, and, to accomplish the Marriage, sacrificed the Interests of the Kingdom. But the King's Name was so revered, that besides those who were by Interest attached to the Court, many others were of the same Party from a Motive of Duty. It was therefore no easy Matter, to wrest from the Queen and the Favorite the Authority they enjoyed.

The Disposition of most People with regard to the Queen and the Ministers, inspired the Duke of York with hopes, he should one Day be able to assert his Title to the Crown. He was, by his Mother, the only Heir of the House of Mortimer or March, descended from Llewellyn, third Son of Edward III, and elder Brother of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, whose Posterity was in possession of the Throne. But probably, he would never have formed such a Design, if the Duke of Gloucester had been alive, or the People not disaffected to the Queen and the Ministry. Mean while, as it would have been very dangerous to discover his Intentions, before the People's Inclinations were sound, he took care so to proceed, that it should not be possible to convict him of the least Step to that end. He contented himself with making use of secret Emisaries, who industriously spread among the People, Discourses proper to turn their Thoughts to his Title to the Crown: It was whispered about, that the House of Lancaster had usurped the Throne. That indeed the Usurpation had been tolerable, whilst the Kings of that House were Princes of distinguished Worth; and had acted for the Welfare and Honour of the Nation; that even, during the Non-age of the Present King, there had been hopes of his treading in the Steps of his Ancestors, and his being a worthy Follower of the King his Father; but that since he became of Age, nothing glorious was to be expected from him: That therefore the English could have no reason to support any longer the Usurpation of the Crown, for the Sake of a Queen, who, being sprung from the Blood of their most mortal Enemy, ruled the Kingdom with an arbitrary Power: That, in viewing the Posterity of Edward III, it was evident, the House of March had been unjustly deprived of the Crown: That the Duke of York being the sole Heir of that House, and descended from Edward III by his paternal Ancestors, ought to have his due Right. In fine, that his noble Qualities, his known Virtue, and his signal Services to the Nation, very strongly supported the just Title given him by his Birth. These Discourses, artfully spread among the People, began to gain the Duke of York a Party. But he appeared not himself: All was done in private by his Friends.

The Court takes from the Duke of York the Regency of France, and gives it to the Duke of Somerset.
 Mean while, the Queen, the Favorite, and all the House of Lancaster, failed not to take notice, of what was divulged concerning the Pretensions of the Duke of York. He might indeed keep himself concealed from others; but it was not easy to deceive such quick-sighted Persons, who were so greatly concerned in the Affair. As they did not question, that all these Discourses were divulged with his Sanction, they believed it requisite to lessen his Credit, by giving him some Mortification. John Duke of Somerset dying during these Transactions (2), Edmund his Brother (3), who succeeded him, seemed a very proper Person to oppose to the Duke of York. So, without any Pretence, the Queen and the Marquis of Suffolk caused the King to remove the Duke of York from the Regency of France, before his Term was expired, and conferred it on the new Duke of Somerset. This last was of an exceeding haughty Temper, and as his Brother had been engaged in great Contests with the Duke of York, he behaved to him upon this occasion, so as to make him his implacable Enemy. On the other hand, the Duke of York very highly resented this Affront: But, as it was not in his Power to be revenged, dissembled his Resentment, in expectation of a more favorable Opportunity to shew it.

1448. The Duke of Somerset's Disposition with regard to the Duke of York.
 In the Beginning of the Year 1448, the King, who acted only by the Queen's Suggestions, created the Marquis of Suffolk, Duke of Suffolk (4). The Queen seemed to intend to brave the People, by daily showering her Favours

Before he entered into Orders, he kept by Alice, Daughter of Richard First, Earl of Arundel, a natural Daughter called Joan, married to Sir Edward Streteley. 1448. upon a Lord so extremely odious to the whole Nation. She thereby gave her own Enemies a great Advantage, who only wanted occasions to stir up the People against her. It is an Error, to which those at the Helm are frequently liable, to disregard the Complaints of the People. As they are always surrounded with Flatterers, or ignorant of what passes any where but at Court, or imagine that having most of the great Men for them, the rest of the People are to be counted as nothing: But it often happens, they find it to their Cost, that the great Men, and Kings themselves, have no more Power than private Persons, when unsupported by the People. This is what we shall have occasion to see more particularly in the Course of the present Reign (1). But we must first return to the Affairs of France, which will yet afford us Matter for several Years.

In the Negotiation concerning the King's Marriage, it was agreed, that the City of Mans, and whatever the English held in Maine, should be delivered to Charles of Anjou, the future Queen's Uncle. But the Noise this Article made in England, and the Duke of Gloucester's Opposition, caused the Restitution to be deferred till this Year. In February, Charles of Anjou, at the head of some Troops, appeared before Mans, in order to take possession. The French say, he besieged the City, and that the Duke of Exeter the Governor, not daring to stand an Assault, surrendered by Capitulation (2). But it is certain, the Duke of Exeter was not then in the Place, neither was there any Appearance of a Siege. The Restitution was made (3) by Agreement between the two Courts, and Henry sent to Mans two Commissioners to deliver the City to the Prince of Anjou. As he was entering, the two Commissioners met him upon the Bridge, and before a publick Notary made a formal Protestation, declaring that the King of England's sole Intent in restoring that Place, was to procure a final Peace between him and Charles his Uncle, and only during the Truce. Moreover, he reserved to himself the Sovereignty of the City and Province, and, in case of any Attempt upon the Right of this Sovereignty, claimed a Power to revoke the Cession without injuring his Honour. Charles of Anjou heard the Protestation without approving it, and took possession of the Place.

After the Surrender of Mans to the French, the Negotiations for a Peace, and the Interview of the two Kings, were continued: But by reason of some Difficulties, the Truce was forced to be farther prolonged to April the 1st 1449. It did not last however so long; an unforeseen Accident put an end to it sooner than was expected.

About the middle of this Year (4), Surienne an Arragonian, who had served the King of England twenty Years, and was Knight of the Garter, and Governor of lower Normandy, scaled, in the Night, the Town of Fougères, belonging to the Duke of Bretagne, and took a great Booty. Whereupon, the Duke of Bretagne sent a Herald to the Duke of Somerſet, then at Roan, and demanded the Restitution of the Place, with all the Plunder. The Regent answered, he was extremely displeased with this Action, and would give the Duke of Bretagne all the Satisfaction he could reasonably expect.

Mean while, as it would require some time to be informed more particularly of this Affair, and to notify it to the Court of England, the Duke of Bretagne, impatient of this Delay, complained to the King of France of the Breach of the Truce, wherein Bretagne was expressly included. Charles considering, his Affairs were in a good Situation, and those of the English in great Disorder, as well by reason of the King's Inability as of the People's Discontent, took fire at this News, as if the Injury had been done to himself. And yet, to look back on the Duke of Bretagne's Proceedings, during the whole former War, Charles had no great Cause to be satisfied with that House. However, perceiving it to be a favorable Opportunity to renew the War, whilst the English thought of nothing less, he sent a Gentleman to the Duke of Somerſet, and two Ambassadors to London, to demand reparation for this Insult. But at the same time, to make this Reparation impracticable, he insisted upon the Payment of sixteen hundred thousand Crowns to the Duke of Bretagne, for the Damages sustained by the taking of Fougères. This Sum was so exorbitant, that it must not be thought strange, if the Court of England refused to pay it down. Besides, it was almost impossible, that in so short a time a just Calculation could be made of the Damages done by the English. It was also very surprising, that Charles should so eagerly espouse the Duke of Bretagne's Quarrel, who was not included in the Truce as his Ally (5), but rather as a neutral Prince who had frequently been Mediator between the two Kings. The Ambassadors however were told, the King would take care to indemnify the Duke, as soon as it was known, what his Loss might amount to; and if Charles would send Ambassadors to Louviers, the King of England would do the like, in order to settle all things to the common Satisfaction of the two Kings and the Duke of Bretagne (6).

At the Congress held at Louviers upon this occasion (7), the English represented, that the taking of Fougères was without Orders, and unknown to the Regent. They expostulated likewise against the sum demanded, as far exceeding what the Duke of Bretagne could justly require. But the French plainly told them, if the Duke received not the Satisfaction their Master demanded, he deemed the Truce violated. This haughty and peremptory way of negotiating on Charles's Part, seemed very strange to the English, but the French persisting in their first Proposition, the Conference broke up, without any effect (8).

So bent was Charles upon renewing the War, whilst the King of England was unprepared, that in case the English should resolve to give the Satisfaction required, War, they had another pretence for a Rupture. He pretended, they had violated the Truce with Scotland, and he was obliged to undertake the Cause of the Scots. Indeed, there had been a Conflict between the English and Scots, wherein the English had been worsted. Buchanan makes Buchanan a pitched Battle, and says, the English lost three thousand Men. However, this Affair does not seem to have been of so great Consequence, since it was presently suppressed. This Year the two Nations renewed their Truce (9), without fixing the time of its Continuance. Only it was agreed, that, which of the two Kings should desire to break it, he should give the other Notice of twelve beforehand. However, King James had not desired Charles to interpose in this Quarrel, and consequently, it is evident, Charles sought an Occasion of Rupture.

Whilst Charles was making his Preparations, he amused the English with fruitless Negotiations. The Court of England's Imprudence at this Juncture, is very astonishing. They knew neither how to preserve the Truce, nor prepare for War. If they had been willing to avoid a Rupture, they should at least have restored Fougères to the Duke of Bretagne, with promise of amends for all Damages. But they kept the Place, without using any effectual Endeavours to appease that incensed Prince. The Council, where greater care was taken to introduce the Queen's and the Duke of Suffolk's Creatures, than Persons qualified to manage the publick Affairs, seemed to be seized with a Spirit of Inconsideration. To see the Queen's Indolence on this Occasion, one would have thought, that being without Issue, she was in a Plot with the King's Enemies, to dispossess him of all he still held in France. If she, and her Favorites and Ministers, or even the whole Council, had such a Design, they succeeded but too well. However that be, the Faults they committed on this Occasion, are to be excused, only by the Consideration of the Haughtiness wherewith Charles acted, who rendered an Agreement impracticable. But, at the same time, they should have prepared for their Defence.

As soon as Charles was in condition to renew the War, he caused the Castle of Conches, and Pont de l'Arche, in Normandy (10), and, about the same time, Gerbergy in Beauvoisine, Cognac, and St. Maigrin in Guienne to be surprized, in the Duke of Bretagne's Name. The

Cotton's Abridg. Hall, fol. 157.

I. That the Duke of Suffolk had treated with the Barons of Orleans, and the other French Ambassadors, to persuade King Charles to invade England; to the end, he might place his Son on the Throne, whom he intended to marry with Margaret only Daughter of John Duke of Somerset.

II. That being bribed by the French, he had released the Duke of Orleans, against the express Orders of the late King.

III. That Normandy was invaded by his Means, and Advice.

IV. That being Ambassador in France, he engaged to surrender Maine to the French, without the content of the rest of the Ambassadors, and drew the King and Council to ratify his Engagement.

V. That he had informed the Enemies, of the Weakness of the English Towns in France, and encouraged them to assault them.

VI. That he had betrayed the Secrets of the Council to the Enemies of the State.

VII. That he had hindered the Conclusion of a Peace, by discovering the Weakness of England (1).

VIII. That he had made his Boasts, in the hearing of several Lords, that his Credit at the French Court was no less, than at the English.

IX. That he had obstructed the sending of Succours to France, that the Enemies might make the greater Progress.

X. That he had included in the Treaty of Truce, neither the King of Arragon, nor the Duke of Bretagne, and by that affected neglect, England had lost those two Allies.

The Duke's Defence.

The Duke of Suffolk answered these Accusations, by a formal Denial of the greatest Part, and required the Proofs. As to the Articles which he owned, he produced the King's express Orders. But that was not sufficient to justify him, since his chief Crime, was the abuse of his Credit with the King, and his imposing upon the Council. Historians remark, that he cleared himself from all but the last Article, relating to the Duke of Bretagne. Indeed, it is certain, in the first Treaty of Truce concluded at Tours, and in several subsequent Treaties to prolong it, the Duke of Bretagne was included only by France. This is a Mystery, not very easy to be unravelled. The Duke of Bedford, as has been related, obliged the Duke of Bretagne to renounce the Alliance of Charles, and acknowledge Henry for King of France. Since that time, there had been no Rupture between England and Bretagne. And yet, Charles took care to comprize the Duke of Bretagne in the Treaty of Truce, concluded at Tours, whilst the English mentioned him not. Was it through Negligence, Forgetfulness, or designly? The last is most probable. However, the Duke of Suffolk had in some measure repaired this Error, by including the Duke of Bretagne as an Ally of England, in the prolongation of the Truce in 1447, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. But that was not sufficient, it seems, to satisfy his Enemies.

A Sedition in Kent.

The Queen perceiving that Matters were like to go ill with the Duke, ordered it so, that the King sent him to the Tower, not so much with design to punish him, as to give some appearance of Satisfaction to the Commons. Mean while, for fear they should persist in their Prosecution, he caused the Parliament to be adjourned to Leicester (2). Presently after (3), the Duke came out of the Tower, and resumed his old Post at Court. The News of his release raised a Sedition in Kent, headed by a Fuller (4). But before the Rebels could make any considerable attempt, the Ring-leaders were apprehended and executed, and by that means the Sedition was stifled in its Birth.

The Commons offended at the Duke of Suffolk's appearing.

Biondi.

The Parliament being re-assembled at Leicester, the King and Queen appeared, attended by the Duke of Suffolk, as their Prime Minister. The Commons were extremely offended at this Proceeding, which they considered as a Bravado to them. To shew their Repentment, they went in a Body and petitioned the King, that the Persons, who had been instrumental in delivering Normandy (5) to the French, might be punished according to their Demerits. The Queen was alarmed at this Petition. She found, the Commons were bent upon the Duke of Suffolk's Ruin, and that it was not possible to prevent it, without coming to an open Rupture with the Lower-House. Wherefore, to save the Minister some part of the Punishment which, probably, was designed him, she resolved to prevent a formal Sentence, which could not but have been very rigorous in the present juncture. A few Days after this Petition, the King banished the Duke for five Years, and removed all his Creatures. The Duke himself looking upon this Exile as a proper means to secure him from the Fury of the People, speedily embarked for France. But he could not escape his Destiny. He was met in his Passage by an English Ship, called the Nicholas, and the Captain searching the Duke's Vessel, and finding him there, ordered his Head to be struck off, without any further Ceremony (6). Thus fell William de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, who, a few Days before, was the greatest and most powerful Person in the Kingdom. It is uncertain, whether he was guilty of all the Crimes the Commons laid to his Charge. But it cannot be denied, that the Disasters which, one after another, happened to the Affairs of the English in France, are to be ascribed to his ill Conduct; if it be true, that they are not to be deemed the Consequences of a Plot, formed to deprive the King of all his Conquests in France.

By the Duke of Suffolk's death, the Duke of York saw himself freed from a powerful Enemy, who, being attached to the House of Lancaster, would, doubtless, have strongly opposed the Execution of his Designs. Though this Prince was in Ireland, his Friends effectually served him in England, by extolling his Merit, and representing to the People, the King's Incapacity, and the Queen's Male-Administration. These Discourses, joined to the entire loss of Normandy, which happened at the same time, made deep Impressions on the Minds of the People, and daily increased the Number of the Duke's Adherents. He had perfect Information of what passed. But, not to hazard himself in vain, he devised an Expedient, which he thought proper to found the People's Inclinations, in order to take his Measures with more Safety. By his Intigation, Jack Cade an Irishman, assumed the Name of John Mortimer, of the House of March, executed in the beginning of this Reign. Under this borrowed Name he repaired into Kent (7), where the Duke of York had many Adherents, and drew together great Numbers of Male-Contents, using for Pretence, the Necessity of reforming the Government, and easing the People. In the present Disposition of the greatest Part of the Nation, with regard to the Court, the Rebels so increased, that in few Days Cade saw himself in condition to intamp on Black-Heath, near London.

The King having notice of the Approach of the Rebels, sent to know the Reason of their appearing thus in Arms. Cade answered for all, that they had no ill design upon the King's Person: That their Intention was, to petition the Parliament, that the evil Ministers might be punished, and the People rendered more happy than of late Years. A few days after, they presented to the Parliament two Petitions, setting forth the Grievances of the Nation. Among other things, they prayed, that the Duke of Somerset might be punished, as being the principal Author of the loss of Normandy. That the King's Council might be filled with the Princes of the Blood, and other prudent and judicious Persons, and not with vicious and profligate Men, of ill Principles and Manners, and incapable of managing the Affairs of the State. These Petitions being communicated to the King, the Council condemned them as seditious, and resolved to suppress the Rebellion by Force of Arms. Whereupon, the King assembling a Body of fifteen thousand Men, headed them himself, and marched against the Rebels. Upon his approach, Cade, as if he was afraid, retired, and lay in Ambush in a Wood near Sevenoaks, not questioning but the King would follow him. 1450. with sending after them a Detachment of his Army, commanded by Sir Humphrey Stafford (1). This Detachment falling into the Ambush, were cut in pieces, and the Commander himself lost his Life in the Fight (2).

At the same time, Cade began his march towards London (3), whilst the King and the whole Court hastily retired to Kenilworth Castle, leaving a Garrison in the Tower, under the Command of the Lord Scales. Cade's Success against Stafford increased his Army with Multitudes, who flocked from all Parts to join him. The City of London, either thro' fear, or some other Motive, opened her Gates to the Rebels, and Cade entered as it were in Triumph, at the Head of his Troops. But he prohibited, under severe Penalties, the offering any Injury to the Inhabitants. Next day, being informed, that the Lord Say, High-Treasurer, was in the City, he ordered him to be apprehended and beheaded (4). Towards the Evening, he retired to Southwark, on the other Side of the Thames, and continued thus for some Days, to enter the City in the Morning, and go out again at Night, on purpose to take from the Citizens all occasion of Fear.

Cade's Soldiers and the Londoners lived at first very friendly together. But at last, the Soldiers committing some Riot in the City, when they would have entered, according to Custom, in the Morning (5), they found the Bridge-Gate shut against them. Whereupon a Battle ensued between them and the Citizens (6), which lasted all Day, and ended at the Approach of Night, by a Cessation of Arms till the Morrow. Mean while, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Chancellor (7), who had taken refuge in the Tower, observing by their Spies, and the Proceedings of the Rebels, that their Hearts began to fail them, instantly drew up a general Pardon, put the Great Seal to it, and caused it to be proclaimed in the Night, in Southwark. The Pardon produced so sudden and surprising an Effect, that, before it was Day, Cade found himself deserted by his Followers, and forced to fly all alone, and conceal himself in the County of Suffolk. But the King promising, by Proclamation, a thousand Marks to any Person that should bring him dead or alive, he was slain in his retreat (8), by Alexander Iden a Gentleman of Kent, who brought his Body to London (9). The Pardon under the Great Seal did not prevent the Execution of many of his Accomplishes (10). Thus ended this dangerous Rebellion, which might have been attended with worse Consequences, had it been conducted by a more experienced Leader (11).

Whilst these Things passed in England, the War was continued in Normandy, but still to the disadvantage of the English. The Queen perceiving, the People's discontent partly sprung from the ill Success of the Affairs of France, had sent fifteen hundred Men (12) to the Duke of Somerset, under the Command of Sir Thomas Kiriel, who landed at Cherbourg. His design was to lead his Troops to Caen, where the Duke of Somerset then was. But as it was dangerous to march with so small a Body, he was joined upon the Road by several Detachments of the English Garrisons in those Parts. The French Authors say, that by this Junction the English Army amounted to five thousand Men (13), which however is not very likely. Be this as it will, the Constable Richemont, hearing of Kiriel's design, speedily drew together a Body of seven thousand Men, and went and expected him at Roumigni, through which he was to pass. The two Armies engaging, the English, though inferior in Number, long defended themselves with great Bravery. But at length, notwithstanding their obstinate resistance, they were put to rout, and their General taken Prisoner (14). Upon comparing this Battle with a certain Prediction of the Maid of Orleans, that the English should be entirely driven out of the Kingdom, by a Defeat, much greater than those of Orleans and Patay, one is inclined to believe, he was not perfectly inspired. For, in the Battle of Fourmigni, the only one since Joan's Death, the English, even according to their Enemies Computation, were at most but five thousand, and lost but fifteen hundred (15). However, for the sake of the Prophecy, the French Writers talk of the Battle of Fourmigni in very lofty Terms, comparing it to the most famous Battles.

Kiriel's Reinforcement being defeated, the Duke of Somerset could no longer withstand the victorious Arms of the French. It would be needless, to give a particular Account of the Sieges carried on by the French in this second Campaign (16). It will suffice to say in a word, that about the middle of August, Charles saw himself master of all Normandy. The City of Caen was invested the 4th of June, and the 21st of the same Month, the Duke of Somerset capitulated (17), against the Opinion of some of the Officers, who maintained, it was not yet time. P. Montreuil (18), Damfront, and Cherbourg were besieged at once, and the Campaign ended in Normandy with the taking of Cherbourg (19), which surrendered the 12th of August. Thus, in two Campaigns, Charles became Master of the whole Province, without one single Town remaining in the Hands of the English.

The Parliament met at Westminster the 6th of November, and about the same time, the Duke of Somerset having nothing more to do in France came into England. He was blamed for the loss of Normandy, and particularly of Caen, where he was accused of not having done his Duty. These Complaints were so publicly made, that the Commons could not help taking notice of them. They petitioned the King, to send the Duke of Somerset to the Tower, that his Conduct might be examined. Henry not thinking proper to disoblige the Commons at such a Juncture, granted their Request. The Populace of London were so transported with Joy, when they heard the Duke was in the Tower, that they immediately rose and plundered his Palace. They would have proceeded farther, if the King had not speedily put out a Proclamation to disperse them. Nevertheless, some of the most audacious continued the Tumult, till one of the most insolent was beheaded. The Parliament was no sooner up, but the Duke of Somerset was released, and assumed, at Court, the Post enjoyed by the Duke of Suffolk.

The English, not having been able to prevent the loss of Normandy, were still less able to defend Guienne, which was more remote. King Charles improving the present Juncture, had now sent his Troops into that Province, where, this very Year, his Generals took Bergerac, Genstat, Montferrand, Chalais, &c. &c. which made but a very faint Resistance. The Season being very far advanced, hindered them from pursuing their Conquests.

During the Winter, the Earl of Orval, of the House of Albret, making Incursions to the very Gates of Bourdeaux, the Mayor sallied out with ten thousand Men to attack him. How inferior soever Orval might be in Number of Bourdeaux Troops, he stood his ground against this undisciplined Militia, slew great Part of them, and took many Prisoners.

In April 1451, the Army of France, commanded by the Count of Orleans, Earl of Dunnois and Languetille, was forty thousand strong. This General presently became master of Montgion in Saintonge. Then, May the 16th, he besieged Blaye, and carried it the 21st. Not only, there was no English Army in the Field, but moreover, no manner of appearance, that the Court of England effectually thought of defending Guienne. The French General improving so favorable a Juncture, divided his

He desired to be tried by his Peers, in order to gain time; but Cade and his Accomplishes, not admitting of this dilatory Plea, took him by force from the Officers, and hurrying him to the Scaffold in Cheap, cut off his Head, which they set on a Pole, and caused to be carried before them along the Streets. The Inhabitants of Guienne seeing themselves thus deserted by the King of England, thought it time to provide for their Safety. The States of the Province being assembled at Bordeaux in June, resolved voluntarily to submit to King Charles, and avoid the utter Ruin they were threatened with. Pursuant to this Resolution, they concluded, with the Earl of Dunois, a Treaty, promising to submit to the Dominion of the King of France, if before the 24th of the same Month, they were not relieved by an Army able to give Battle. The French General could grant that Condition without Apprehension, since he was well assured there was nothing ready in England, for the Assistance of Guienne. The Army not appearing, all the Towns of the Duchy opened their Gates to the French, except Bayonne, which refused to be included in the Treaty. This Place, the only one the English had left, was invested the 6th of August. The Breach being large enough on the 19th of the same Month⁽¹⁾, the Besiegers were preparing to storm; but the Inhabitants saved them the trouble, by rising in Arms, and obliging the Garrison to capitulate. The French Historians say, that a white Cross was seen in the Air, just over the Town, an evident Sign of God's Protection to France.

The Court of England, with regard to the Duke of York.

Whilst the Court of England carelessly suffered Guienne to be lost, they grew extremely uneasy with regard to the Duke of York. As in the Kentish Rebellion, Jack Cade had assumed the Name of Mortimer, it was easy to perceive, his Aim had been to found the People's Inclination to the House of March. Consequently it might be inferred, that he had been encouraged by the Duke of York, sole Heir of that Family. Indeed the thing was palpable, but there was no Evidence to convict the Duke, because Cade was slain. Besides, in the People's Disposition with regard to the Court, they would infallibly have joined with the Duke of York, if, by being publicly attacked, he had been forced to stand upon his Defence. Mean while, as he was suspected of forming some Plot in Ireland, and of intending to bring an Army of Irish into England, the King sent Orders to the Sheriffs of Wales, Shropshire, and Cheshire, to be in a readiness to hinder his landing. This Precaution produced several ill Effects. In the first Place, it showed, that the Court was afraid of the Duke of York, which it would have been proper to conceal, for fear of giving the People occasion to inquire into the Reason. In the next Place, the Duke found it was his Business to be upon his Guard; whereas, if the Court had feigned not to know his Designs, they might have drawn him into some Snare, or given him room to make some false Step, which would have given them an Advantage. In fine, he was thereby furnished with a pretence to complain, since he was so far from being convicted of any Project against the King, that he had not taken any apparent Step, on which an Accusation could be grounded. Accordingly, he wrote to the King, complaining of this Suspicion, which he feigned to look upon as extremely injurious, and as a mere pretence intended for his ruin. The King sent him a very civil Answer, giving him some sort of Satisfaction, but revoked not his Orders.

Though Cade's Enterprize had miscarried, the Duke of York had reaped the Benefit he proposed. The great Number of People that embarked in it, discovered how much the Nation was displeased with the Queen and the Ministry, and that the Memory of the Rights of the House of March was not entirely abolished. So, instead of being discouraged, he entertained fresh hopes. He judged, if the Shadow only of one of his Family was capable of causing so great a Multitude to take Arms, much more would the People be attached to a Prince of the Blood-Royal, sole Heir of this House. Mean while, not to be too hasty in the execution of a Project of such Consequence, he resolved, before any Thing was attempted, to consult his Friends. The time of his Government of Ireland being expired, he embarked for England, but when he would have landed in Wales, found at the Port the Militia in Arms ready to oppose him. He landed, notwithstanding, at another Place, which was not so strongly guarded. He did this the more boldly, as he had only his own Servants with him, and had yet given his Enemies no hold. After that, he repaired to London, from whence the Court was gone some time before in Progress to the western Counties.

The Duke of York was impatiently expected at London. His Friends had frequently conferred together in his Absence, but could not come to any Resolution without him. His principal Adherents were, John Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, Richard Nevil Earl of Salisbury, Son-in-law to the General of the same Name⁽²⁾, slain before Olone, Richard Nevil his Son, who was shortly after Earl of Warwick, by his Marriage with Anne Beuchamp Daughter of the Earl of Warwick who died in France, Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonshire, though Brother-in-law of the Duke of Somerset⁽³⁾, and Edward Break Baron of Cobham⁽⁴⁾. With these Lords, the Duke, immediately after his Arrival, concerted Measures to accomplish his Designs. The result of their Consultations was, that the Duke should retire into Wales, where the Family of March had always had a great Interest: That he should privately be assisted of seasonably raising an Army, by means of his Friends; That he should then write to the King, to advertise him of the People's dislike of the Ministry; and particularly of the Duke of Somerset.

In pursuance of this Resolution, the Duke repairing into Wales and taking all his Measures, wrote to the King, "that all the Kingdom was dissatisfied, because Traitors were screened from Justice, and that he took the Freedom to advise him to prevent the ill Consequences of this Discontent. That the speediest Means was to order the Guilty to be brought to their Trial, and particularly the Duke of Somerset, who having been impeached by the Commons, was referred to Favour without any Examination. In fine, that if he would give the Nation this Satisfaction, he offered to assist in the Execution of so good a Design." The Ministry easily perceived, the Duke of York sought an occasion of Quarrel. But as in their present Situation, they durst not act haughtily, it was judged proper, the King should send the Duke a civil Answer, which would disappoint him of the pretence he wanted. Accordingly the King in his Letter told him, he had resolved some time since to reform whatever was amiss in the Government; and for that purpose intended to appoint a certain Number of virtuous and able Counsellors, of whom he was designed to be one: That as for the Traitors mentioned in his Letter, he did not mean to let them go unpunished, but the Affair being of very great Consequence, required mature Deliberation: That as for the Duke of Somerset in particular, he should not be excused from answering the Accusations laid to his Charge.

Though this Answer deprived the Duke of York of all Pretence to take Arms, he imagined however, the King's Answer being so far from removing or punishing the Ministers complained of, was a sufficient Warrant. He did not expect to make an Answer. Mean while, as he had taken his Measures to raise an Army, he did not think proper to break them, or suffer himself to be decoyed by a Moderation which might be as well feigned as real. So, putting himself at the Head of his Army, he marched towards London. But he found the Queen had not been so negligent as he expected. Upon notice of the Duke's retiring into Wales, she had ordered Troops to be levied in the King's Name, without discovering however for what they were intended. The Duke therefore was no sooner upon the March, but he heard the King was advancing⁽⁵⁾ to give him Battle. Though he wanted neither Courage nor Experience, he thought he should not venture a Battle with the King, without having a more plausible Pretence than what he would have covered his Designs with. His Aim was to gain the People, but to fight the King without a more specious Reason, was not the way to compass his ends, though he could even have been sure of Victory. Besides, looking upon the City of London as able to incline the Balance to his Side, he judged that, before all things, he ought to secure that Metropolis. For this reason, when he heard the King was coming against him, he suddenly altered his Rout, and by speedy Marches got before him, and appeared before London, where he expected to be received with open Arms. But he had the Mortification to find the Gates shut, the Inhabitants not thinking proper to declare for him, whilst the King was so closely pursuing him with

And John Duke of Norfolk took part with the Earl of Salisbury, as being the Son of his Sister Catherine, but was in the habit of his Father, who was banished, and of his Uncle, who was beheaded at York in the Reign of Henry IV. The two Armies being so near one another, that nothing could prevent an Engagement, the King sent two Bishops (2), to know of the Duke what had induced him to appear in Arms. As the Duke saw himself disappointed of his hopes to gain London, he thought it advisable to show some regard for the Court, for fear of ruining his Affairs by hasty Resolutions. In this Belief he answered, he had never intended to forsake his Allegiance to the King, but only to remove from his Person evil Counsellors, of whom the Duke of Somerset was the chief; and if the King would put him into safe Custody, till he should in Parliament answer to what was objected against him, he was ready to dismiss his Troops. He did not expect, his demand would be granted, since the King and Queen were fully guided by the Counsels of Him, who was most concerned to have it rejected. He hoped thereby to throw all the Blame on the Court, and demonstrate to the People, that the Ministry did not scruple to expose the Kingdom to a Civil War, for the sake of a Man odious to the Nation. But for once he was the dupe of his own Policy. The King took him at his word, promised to send his Enemy to the Tower, and even ordered him to be immediately arrested. The Duke of York was surprized at this Condescension. He would have been very glad to recede from his Engagement. But as he could not do it without laying himself too open, he thought he should run some risk, rather than hazard the Loss of the People's Good-Will, on which he built all his Expectations. So, without Hesitation, he disbanded his Troops (3) and came to Court, not vouchsafing even to take any Precaution for his Safety. When he was in the King's Presence, he accused the Duke of Somerset with great Warmth, and endeavoured to pervert the King, that he was a Traitor, and had sacrificed the Interest of the Kingdom to his Ambition and Avarice. Upon these Words, the Duke of Somerset, who was concealed behind the Hangings, suddenly stepped forth to answer him, and accused him of conspiring him to dethrone the King. The Duke of York seeing his Enemy before him, and in the King's Apartment, whom he thought in safe Custody, found he was amused, and perceived his Danger. Nevertheless, without showing any Concern, he modestly complained of the King's Breach of Promise, he the Suggestions of the Duke of Somerset, on whom he cast the Dismissal of the Bishops of this Fraud. Immediately after, the King dismissed the Duke of York, and ordered him to be apprehended as soon as he was out of his Presence (4).

If the Duke of York's Enemies had dared to gratify their Repentment, he would never have freed himself from the Snare he had imprudently fallen into. But the Posture of Affairs, and the Disposition of the People, affording just Occasion of Fear, they durst not proceed against him. Two other reasons helped likewise to save him. It was rumoured at Court, that the young Earl of March his Son, attended by all the Friends of his Family, was advancing with a strong Body of Troops to deliver his Father. So, for fear the Duke's Army, which was lately disbanded, should join his Son's Troops, the Court was obliged to take a more gentle Course. On the other hand, the Galsons had sent Deputies to the King, to offer to reduce Guienne to his Obedience, if he would send them Supplies. At such a Juncture it was believed, as the Duke of York's Blood could not be spilt without involving the Kingdom in a Civil War, there would be a Necessity of detaining the Troops intended for Guienne, and thereby a favorable Opportunity lost of recovering that Province. These Considerations induced the Queen and Duke of Somerset to give the Duke of York his Liberty, though their own, the King's, and the whole House of Lancaster's Interest, required he should be sacrificed to their Safety. Perhaps all the Calamities, England afterwards endured, might by that means have been prevented. However, as the Queen and Ministers were willing, as far as in them lay, to secure themselves against his Designs, they obliged him to take an Oath to the King, whereby he swore to remain his faithful Subject till Death, and never to take Arms against him. This done, the Duke of York retired to his Castle of Wigmor (5), and the Duke of Somerset removed, without a Rival, the Authority he had acquired at Court.

Whilst Henry was employed at home, in opposing the Attempts of the Duke of York, Charles had no less an Enemy to encounter in his own Kingdom. The Dauphin, his Son, a Prince of a turbulent Temper, created him great Uneasiness by his Behaviour towards him. For some time past he had resided in Dauphine, where he acted as Sovereign, regardless of the King his Father's Orders, executing them no farther than he pleased. He had even the Rashness, to demand of the Duke of Savoy, his Daughter Violante in Marriage; and the Duke complied with his Request, without either vouchsafing to acquaint the King with the Matter. Provoked at this Proceeding, Charles put himself at the head of thirty thousand Men, and marched towards Lyons, bent upon chastising his Son, and punishing the Duke of Savoy's Presumption. But the Revolution which happened at the same time in Guienne, caused him to take other Measures.

The Galsons, who had been for three hundred Years without interruption, under the Dominion of the Kings of England, had submitted to King Charles, only because they were neglected by the English. As soon as the French Army had quitted Guienne, the Lords of the Country, in concert with the Inhabitants of Bourdeaux, resolved to return to their ancient Sovereigns (6). For that purpose, they deputed the Lords of Candale and P. Elparre, to contrive the means at London. The Troubles raised by the Duke of York, had for some time hindered the Court from attending to this Affair. But when they were appeased, the Queen and Council, after mature deliberation, judged that nothing should be neglected to accomplish the Enterprise. The Success, they expected, might redeem their Credit, and gain them an Interest with the People, which they wanted to support themselves against their Enemies. Talbot, the valiant Earl of Shrewsbury, who was returned from a Voyage into Italy, was chosen for this Expedition. Though he was fourscore Years old, he readily accepted an Employment, which gave him Opportunity, once more, before his Death, to do his King and Country a considerable Service. As Diligence was absolutely necessary, he embarked what Troops were ready, consisting of seven hundred Men at Arms (7), upon a promise that the rest designed for him should quickly follow. He sailed the 10th of October, and on the 21st landed near Bourdeaux. Next Day he appeared before the City, and as every thing was prepared to receive him, he was introduced at a Gate of which the Citizens had the Guard. The French Garrison, who had not heard of his Arrival, surprized at this unexpected Accident, would have retired at another Gate, but were almost all taken.

The promised Reinforcement being arrived from England a few Days after (8), the Earl of Shrewsbury took the Field at the head of seven thousand Men. With this little Army he reconquered some of the Towns of Guienne, among others Frontac and Castillon, as rapidly as they were lost. If Winter had not prevented him from pursuing his Conquests, he would have made himself Master of all Guienne.

Charles, who was then at Lyons, hearing this ill News, did not think proper to persist in the Execution of the design he had formed. The Affair of Guienne seemed to him of greater Importance. So, suddenly altering his resolution, he permitted the Dauphin to marry the Princess of Savoy, and gave one of his Daughters to the young Prince of Piedmont. At the same time, he resolved to send all his Troops into Guienne the next Spring. Mean while, he dispatched before a Body of ten thousand Men, under the Command of Chabanes, and the Earl of Pontevre. These two Generals being arrived in Saintonge, besieged Chalais and Castillon, whilst the Earl of Clermont followed them, with the rest of the Army designed for Guienne. Chabanes was taken up with the Siege of Chalais till June, after which, he joined Pontevre before Castillon, which still made a vigorous Defence. The Dread inspired by the Earl of Shrewsbury's Valour and Experience, made them use the Precaution seldom practised in those Days, of making Lines, and defending the Avenues of their Camp with Palisades.

The Earl of Shrewsbury was at Bourdeaux with six or seven thousand Men, in suspense, what course he

It was farther, and loudly complained, that to preserve his Authority, the Duke filled the highest Posts with his Creatures, without any Regard to their Merit and Parts. This last Article made a deep Impression on the Minds of the People. They could not, without Indignation, see the Council filled with vicious Persons, and all the Places of the Kingdom possessed by Men of no Principles. This gave occasion to suspect, that the Queen's and Ministry's Aim, was to hinder Religion, Honour, Virtue, Love of one's Country, from inducing those, that were in the publick Posts, to oppose the Abuses and Disorders, spread over the Kingdom. This Disposition of the People gave the Duke of York too great Advantages, that he thought, he should improve them, not by acting directly for himself, but under colour of procuring the Good of the People, in obliging the King to make use of other Ministers. He knew, if he could remove his Enemies from the Council, and introduce his Creatures, it would not be difficult to pursue the Execution of his Designs.

The Earl of Salisbury and Warwick chief Friends of the Duke of York. Hall.
An undertaking of this Nature could not be accomplished, without the Assistance of Friends; and therefore, he engaged several Lords in his Plot, some under colour of turning out the Duke of Somerset, who was generally hated and envied; others, by discovering to them his most secret Purposes. Among these last, the two Nevills, Father and Son, were the Principal. The Father, who bore the Title of Earl of Salisbury, was eminent for his Virtues and consummate Prudence. The Earl of Warwick his Son, was universally esteemed for his Valour, and adored by the People for his engaging Behaviour (1). He knew how to carry himself so well, that he seemed to have solely in View, the Welfare and Glory of the Nation (2). Hitherto, he had affected, between the two Parties, a Neutrality, which by rendering him agreeable to the People, had taken from the Ministers, not only all pretence of destroying him, but even all occasion of suspecting him. These two Lords, with some others, consulting with the Duke of York, concerning the Means to accomplish his Project, agreed, it was not yet time to discover his Intention; that, on the contrary, he should behave very submissively to the King, in order to efface the ill Impressions, his former Conduct might have made in the People. The Frankness wherewith he had disbanded his Troops, and his new Oath to the King, were exceeding proper to instill a Belief, that he had no ill Design.

The Duke of York conceals words his Friends.
The Parliament had been summoned to Reading, but by reason of the King's relapse, it was adjourned to Westminster, for February the 14th (3). In this Interval, the Duke of York's private Friends, who pretended to be of the Court Party, intimated to the Queen, and the Duke of Somerset, that in the present Disposition of the People, it was to be feared, the Parliament would come to very disagreeable Resolutions: That whilst the King was in Health, they could act in his Name, because all Orders were supposed to issue from him; but that the Case was not the same, during his Sickness: That their Authority being wholly grounded upon the King's Will, there was reason to fear, that the Royal Will no longer appearing, the Parliament would nominate other Governors: That therefore, it was proper to admit into the Council the Duke of York, the two Nevills, and some other of the most popular Lords, in order to show, that those who governed, did not seek to ingross all the Power. This Advice was built upon such plausible Reasons, that the Queen and the Favorite could not help falling into the snare. So, the Duke of York, the two Nevills, and some others of their Cabal, were called to the Council before the Parliament met. They were no sooner admitted, but they became Superior, so that those, who before managed all, had no longer any Credit.

The Duke of Somerset for is the Tower. Hall.
The first notable Step of these new Counsellors, was to arrest the Duke of Somerset in the Queen's Bed-chamber, and send him to the Tower. Mean while, the Parliament was further prorogued to the 15th of March, to give the Duke of York and his Friends time to concert Measures with the Members. Two Days before the meeting of the Parliament, the Council impowered the Duke of York to hold it in the King's Name. In the beginning of the Session, the Commons sent to the House of Lords an Accusation against the Duke of Somerset, for suffering Normandy to be lost, during his Regency, and by his Fault. April the 2d, the Great-Seal was given to the Earl of Salisbury. Next day, the Parliament appointed the Duke of York, Protector of the Realm, Defender of the Church, and first Counsellor of the King; with this Limitation, till the young Prince Edward the King's Son was of Age, to exercise that high Office. Hence it appears, first, that it was believed, the King's Indisposition would last as long as he lived, and that it affected his Understanding more than his Body. In the next place, by reserving this Office for a Child of six Months, who was to exercise it when of Age, the Parliament showed their Intention to preserve entire, the Rights of the House of Lancaster, though the Duke of York was declared Protector. Generally, on these occasions, there is too much or too little done; and from thence, spring Civil Wars. If the Parliament had openly declared against the House of Lancaster, very likely, at such a Juncture, it would have found but few Friends. On the other hand, if instead of placing the Duke of York so near the Throne, care had been taken to check his Ambition, which was but too manifest, doubtless, he would have lost many of his Adherents, and perhaps, the Civil War, which laid waste the Kingdom, been avoided. But it is very hard for a Parliament at such Junctures to act with Freedom, and according to Reason and Equity.

The Duke of York having all the Power in his own Hands, removed the Duke of Somerset, who was still in the Tower, from the Government of Calais, and by the King's Letters Patent, placed himself in his Room. Every one imagined, the Accusation against the imprisoned Duke would be vigorously prosecuted. But the Affair was suffered to lye dormant, and seemingly unregarded, all the rest of the Year. Probably, the Evidences against him appeared insufficient.

In the beginning of the Year 1455, the King finding himself something recovered of his long Illness, the Authority conferred on the Duke of York ceased of course, since it was wholly founded on the King's Inability, by reason of his Indisposition, to govern the Kingdom himself. The Duke of York's Matters were not sufficiently ripe, to enable him to dispute with the King, the Right of resuming his Authority, though it was in effect, only to replace it in the Hands of the Queen. The first Effect of this Change, was the Duke of Somerset's Release. On the 5th of February the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Wiltshire (4), and two Knights (5), offering to be his Pledges, their offer was accepted, and the Governour of the Tower was ordered to release the Prisoner. A Month after, these Lords were discharged from their Sureties, without any Sentence intervening. As the Duke was apprehended by Order of Council, it was supposed, he could be released by the same Authority. But there was much to be said against this Supposition. The Impeachment of the House of Commons since intervening, it could not be pretended, that the King had Power to release him before he was legally acquitted. However, the Court had no regard to this Reason. After the King had resumed the Government, the Duke of York, and his Party, had no longer any Credit in the Council, where the Queen, and the Duke of Somerset, bore an absolute Sway. So prevalent was the King's bare Name to give a new Turn to Affairs.

Mean while, some of the most prudent Lords, dreading the ill Consequences of the Quarrel between the two Dukes, endeavoured to reconcile them. It was the Interest of both to show, that they acted not from ambitious Motives; for their Aim was to gain the People. Wherefore, they both consented to chuse Arbitrators, and submit to their Decision, under Penalty, for him that refused, of paying to the other twenty thousand Marks. But it was on condition, that the Sentence of the Arbitrators should be pronounced before the 20th of June.

(1) Hall says of him, That by reason of his engaging Behaviour, and of his Liberality and good House-keeping, "He was in such favor and estimation, amongst the common people, that they judged him able to do all things, and without him, nothing to be well done." fol. 167.

Whilst People were in Expectation of this Sentence, the Duke of Somerset represented to the King, that he was removed from the Government of Calais, upon a bare Accusation, that was never determined; and it was not just, his Adversary should remain clothed with his Spoils, since their Difference was not yet decided. Upon this Remonstrance, the King took from the Duke of York, the Government, he had conferred on him for seven Years. Then under colour of observing a perfect Neutrality between the two Rivals, he declared himself Governor of Calais. In the Act, whereby the Duke of York was removed, it was laid to be done, at the Duke's own Request. But the Duke taking it as a heinous Affront, withdrew from Court, where he found his Affairs began to be in an ill Situation.

He retired into Wales, not only to screen himself from the Attempts of his Enemies, but with design to levy an Army, and have it in his Power to attack them. He was very sensible, the Queen and the Duke of Somerset being absolute Masters of the King's Person, had an advantage, of which, nothing but Force could deprive them. So, without farther Consideration, he resolved to take Arms. The Court's Proceedings in releasing the Duke of Somerset, without giving the Nation any Satisfaction, made him imagine, he should be strongly supported, when he came to use that Pretence. He was not deceived in his Expectations. In a short Space, he saw himself at the Head of a numerous Army (1), and in condition to make head against the King, who had likewise prepared himself, and was marching directly towards him to give him Battle. The two Armies met near St. Albans, on a level Ground, where nothing hindered their engaging. The Duke of York, to show, he had taken Arms solely for the Good of the Publick, sent and offered the King to dismis his Troops, if the Duke of Somerset was delivered to Justice, to be condemned if Guilty, or acquitted if Innocent. But the Court knowing, this to be only a vain Pretence, and that one time or other, the Quarrel must be decided by Arms, rejected the offer, and the Battle was fought the 31st of May (2).

The Earl of Warwick, who commanded the Duke of York's Vanguard, expecting this Answer, attacked the King's Army, whilst the Court was waiting for new Proposals from the Male-Contents. This Attack, which was as vigorous as sudden, put the Royal Army into such a disorder, that it was not in the Duke of Somerset's Power to repair it. At the same time, the Duke of York improving this Advantage, advanced likewise from his Quarter, not to give the Enemies time to recover themselves. He pressed them so briskly, that the Royal Army was defeated in few Moments, with loss of five thousand Men (3), without making any considerable Resistance. The Duke of Somerset was killed on the Spot, with the Earl of Northumberland (4), the Earl of Stafford, eldest Son of the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Clifford, and several other Lords and Officers of Note (5), all firmly attached to the House of Lancaster. The Duke of Buckingham receiving a Wound, retired out of the Battle (6), and by his retreat, completed the disorder among the King's Troops.

Mean time, the King, who was wounded in the Neck with an Arrow, seeing himself deserted in the Rout of his Army, retired to a little House, which was presently invited. The Duke of York having notice of it, posted thither with the Earl of Salisbury, and presenting themselves before him on their Knees, told him, since the publick Enemy was dead, he saw none there but Persons ready to obey him in whatever he should please to command them. The King, upon these Words, recovering a little from his Fright, caused by the Duke's Approach, intreated him, for God's sake, to put a stop to the Slaughter, assuring him, he was ready to give him all the Satisfaction he could reasonably desire. Whereupon, the Duke ordered a Retreat to be sounded, and the Army enjoined to shed no more Blood. Then, he conducted the King to St. Albans, from whence they returned together to London (7).

Shortly after, Henry called a Parliament, which met in July (8). The King being then relaxed, the Duke of York was commissioned to hold it in his Name. The Parliament, which, at such a Juncture, could scarce be composed of any but the Duke of York's Adherents, made the following Declaration. "That the Government had been ill-managed by the Queen, and the Duke of Somerset, who had abused the King's Goodness and Confidence. "That the late Duke of Gloucester had been unjustly accused: That all the Alienations of the Crown-lands made since the first Year of the present Reign, should be revoked: That the Duke of York, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, or any that had lifted under their Banners, were not guilty of Rebellion in taking Arms against the King, since it was necessary to free his Person from Captivity: That, on the contrary, the Blame was to be laid on the Duke of Somerset and his Adherents, who concealed from the King, the Duke of York's Letter, which might have prevented these Disorders." Then, the Parliament petitioned the King to nominate a Protector, because of his Indisposition, which hindered him from attending to the Affairs of the Publick. This Petition was repeated several times (9), without the King's returning an Answer. Not that he had resolved to reject it. He was no more at Liberty to follow his own Councils, than when he was under the Guardianship of the Queen, and the Duke of Somerset. But the Duke of York had a mind this Nomination should not appear forced. At length, the Parliament being prorogued to the 12th of November, on the very Day, the King signed a Patent where, in he said, That having been frequently petitioned by his Parliament to nominate a Protector, he appointed the Duke of York for that important Employ, till he should be removed by the Parliament, or the young Prince of Wales capable of exercising it (10). Then, after a Month's Session, the Parliament was prorogued to the 14th of January.

Whilst the Duke of York thus enjoyed the Advantage he had gained upon his Enemies, these were not idle. The Queen, who knew his designs, was too much concerned, as well for her own, as the King's, and her Son's sake, not to try to dispossess them. Henry Duke of Somerset (11), Son of him slain at St. Albans, and the Duke of Buckingham, were equally desirous of revenging, the one his Son's, the other his Father's Death. In fine, all the Princes and Lords allied to the House of Lancaster, or attached to its Interest, seeing the Duke of York taking large Steps towards the Throne, were prepared to try their utmost Endeavours to stop his Progress. Mean while, the Duke of York lived in a Security which afforded him very few Enemies. He perceived, it would be very dangerous, openly to aspire to a Crown, which had been thirty-six Years in the House of Lancaster. Wherefore he chose to wait, till time should produce a favorable opportunity to prosecute his Right. Above all things, he wanted to gain the People's Affection, without which he was satisfied, all his Endeavours would be fruitless. So, to demonstrate, he was not swayed by Passion or Interest, he left the King and Queen at full Liberty. He imagined, it was not in their Power to deprive him of the Protectorship, which, according to his Patent, he was to enjoy till removed by the Parliament. But he had to deal with an able and enterprising Prince, who was not discouraged at the Obstacles she met in her way.

The King being recovered, the Duke of York's Enemies resolved to improve this Juncture, to divest him of his Dignity of Protector, which gave him so great a Power. It would have been easy for him to foresee, the Pretence of the King's Recovery might be used, as it was once before, if he had not been blinded by the Clause in

(1) About two thousand Men. They set out from Westminster, May 20 or 21, came to Watford that Night, and the next Day to St. Albans. The King set up his Standards in a place called Gizeley, or Southfield, in St. Peter's Street. In the mean time, the Duke of York lay encamped in Keys Field, having with him John Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, Richard Second Earl of Salisbury, Richard Earl of Warwick, William Lord Fauconberg, Edward Lord Gilsore, &c. and not above three thousand Men. Before they came to an Engagement, Proposals for an Accommodation passed between the King and the Duke, but to no purpose. Hall, fol. 168. Stow, p. 393, 399, Hollingsh., p. 1257, 1258.

1456. his Patent. But this Clause whereon he relied, was a weak Fence against the Attempts of his Enemies. The Parliament being re-assembled, the King went in Person and declared, that being, by God's Grace, in good Health, and able to resume the Reins of the Government, he did not think the Kingdom any longer wanted a Protector. Then he desired the Parliament to consent, that the Duke of York might be dismissed from that Office. Whether the Parliament thought the King's Demand reasonable, or the Members had been gained unknown to the Duke, it was immediately resolved, to grant the King's Request. The same Day (1) the King sent the Duke an Order to resign the Office of Protector.

The Duke of York and his Party were amazed at this Proceeding. They easily perceived, the Combination was too strong to be broken. So, making, as it is said, a Virtue of Necessity, they feigned patiently to submit to the King's and the Parliament's Orders. However, under colour of having no farther Business at Court, they retired into the Country. But the Duke of York, and the Earls of Salisbury (2) and Warwick, kept within distance of each other in Yorkshire.

Shortly after (3) there was a Sedition at London, occasioned by a sudden Quarrel between two Merchants, one an Englishman, and the other an Italian (4). The Mob rising in favour of the Englishman, the King empowered the Dukes of Exeter and Buckingham to bring the Guilty to a Trial; but the Populace would not suffer them to execute their Commission. The Queen suspecting this Tumult to be raised by the Duke of York's Adherents, and not thinking the King safe at London, carried him to Coventry, under colour of taking the Air. But besides this, she had another Motive of no less Importance: And that was, to inflame at once the Duke of York, and the two Earls his Friends, who were all three retired into the North. She was informed, that though they were separated in appearance, they had, on divers Pretences, frequent Conferences together, at which several other Lords of their Party were present. As she could not doubt, it was to concert Measures against the King, she believed the should have them in her Power, if she could draw them to Coventry, where they would not find the same Protection as at London. To that end, she sent them Letters under the King's own hand (5), requiring their Presence at Court, where their Advice was wanted, in an Affair of the utmost Importance.

The Duke of York had not yet done any thing openly, which shewed that he aspired to the Crown. This was a Secret between him and his principal Friends. It is very true, the Court was perfused of it, but it was not possible to convict him. Hitherto he had varnished his Actions with the Good of the Publick, and for that very reason was formidable to the Court. But though it was not easy to condemn him legally, he could not be ignorant, there were speedier and more certain ways to dispatch him, and that his Enemies were not over-scrupulous. Besides, though he had artfully concealed his Designs from the People, he could not think of deceiving the Queen, who was too much concerned not to discover them. Notwithstanding these Considerations, which should have created a Jealousy in the three Lords who had received the King's Letters, they relolved to go to him. They flattered themselves, that Henry being at length sensible of the Mismanagement of the Queen and the Ministry, required their Assistance, in making some Alterations at Court. But whilst they were on the Road to Coventry, their private Emiffaries undeceived them, by warning them of their Danger. This Advice causing them to take other Measures, they thought proper to separate. The Duke of York withdrew to his Castle of Wigmore, in the Marches of Wales; and the Earl of Salisbury to his Seat [at Middleham] in Yorkshire (6); as for the Earl of Warwick, he went directly to Calais, of which he was made Governor after the Battle of St. Albans. The Queen was extremely vexed at this disappointment, but her Comfort was, she had separated the three Lords, and so rendered them less formidable to her.

The Fears and Jealousies of both Parties were a little interrupted during the Year 1457, by foreign Affairs. As the English had formerly improved the Diffentions in France, to make Conquest upon that Kingdom, Charles VII thought he should not neglect the Advantages, which the Quarrels of the English Court seemed to offer him. For that purpose, he prepared two Fleets which were to invade England in two different Quarters. The first failing to the Downs, plundered the Town of Sandwich (7). The other served [Foy] a little Town of Cernaul, in the same manner. But this was all they did worth remarking. Probably, they were too ill provided to venture upon more important Attempts. So, it was properly but a kind of Bravado, to insult the English in their own Country, after their expulsion out of France.

About the same time the Scots made likewise an Inroad into the northern Counties, and carried away some Booty. Indeed, there was a Truce concluded in 1453, between England and Scotland, till the 21st of May this Year, on condition, that when this Term was expired; which ever of the two Kings intended to renew the War, he should give the other one hundred and eighty Days notice. But so many outrages had been committed on both Sides, that neither Party thought themselves obliged to observe the Treaty. The very last Year, the two Kings had sent each other abusive Letters, full of Haughtiness and Contempt. However, whether the Scots intended only to revenge some particular Injury, or for some other Reason, the Truce was renewed from the 6th of July this Year, to that day Twelve-month, 1459, and afterwards prolonged to the 6th of July 1463.

The Affairs with the foreign Enemies being ended, domestic Quarrels were going to be renewed, if some powerful Persons had not used their Endeavours, to prevent the fatal Consequences of these Divisions. It was easy to see, that the two Parties, in deciding their Quarrel by Arms, could not but ruin the Kingdom, and occasion in the end some sad Revolution. Neither Party was so superior, as to promise themselves certain Victory. Success depended on the Events of the War, too doubtful for either to found any reasonable hopes upon. The Duke of York was sensible, it was no easy thing to dispossess by Force, a King that had been on the Throne thirty five Years. The Truth is, Henry was little esteemed by his Subjects, on account of his Incapacity; but he gained their Affection by his innocent Life, and good Intentions, though ill-supported by his slender Abilities. On the other hand, the Queen, the new Duke of Somerset, who held the late Duke his Father's Post, the rest of the Ministry, and the whole House of Lancaster, were in a very tottering State. The French and Scots took Advantage of these Quarrels to invade the Kingdom, and all the Misadventures were laid upon those who governed in the King's Name. The Court saw plainly, the Duke of York used this pretence to stir up the People against them. Though hitherto he had not made all the Progress he could have wished, he saw himself, however, able very soon to make a much more considerable. These Reasons, added to the King's Instances to adjust these Differences, moved the Queen and the Duke of Somerset, at length to send the Duke of York an Offer of a sincere Reconciliation. This first Step being taken, the King desired the Duke of York and his Friends to repair to London, a Place by them unsuspected, in order to endeavour an Agreement. He writ them a Letter with his own Hand, promising upon his Salvation, he would do them no Injury, and that his Intention was sincere.

Such an Invitation could not be rejected, without openly declaring himself, which the Duke of York was willing to avoid. So, the Lords of his Party relolved to accept it. They were jealous however of the Queen, who, on her Part, had as little Confidence in them. It may be, they were both equally in the right. Very likely, each Party hoped to reap some Advantage from this Proceeding, without intending however to alter their first Projects. Mean while, to remove all Fears, it was agreed, that both Parties might be attended with a certain Number of armed Followers. Nay, the King gave the Earl of Warwick leave, who was to come from Calais, to bring with him four and twenty Foreigners, besides English (8).

1458. Every thing being thus settled, the Lords of both Parties came to London in January; but the Earl of Warwick arrived not till February. They were lodged in two different Quarters (1), to avoid the Disorders which their being together might occasion. The Mayor of London (2) rode every Night round the City with his Trainbands, to the Number of ten Thousand. The King and Queen entered the City the 27th of March, and lodged in the Bishop's Palace, at an equal distance from both Parties.

Mediators being chosen with unanimous Consent, such was the disposition of both Sides, that on the 3d of April a Reconciliation was made (3) to the common Satisfaction of the King, the Queen, the Parties concerned, and the whole Kingdom. The Substance of the Agreement was, that, all Antinities being laid aside, the Lords should live together in Peace and Concord, and in perfect Obedience to the King's Commands. But to avoid all occasion of Complaint, it was agreed, that the Duke of York, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, with some others of that Party, should be admitted into the Council (4). Then the 5th of April was appointed for a publick Thanksgiving Day, for this Reconciliation, by a solemn Procession to St. Paul's Church (5). The King and Queen, and all the Lords were present, and walked two and two, one of each Party, in token of a perfect Union (6). The Duke of York led the Queen by the Hand, who publicly gave him Marks of Confidence and Esteem.

It appeared however soon after, that this Confidence, of which so great was made on both Sides, was far from being restored. The Duke of York and his two principal Friends, always fearing some Treachery from their reconciled Enemies, withdrew from Court on divers Pretences. The Duke and the Earl of Salisbury went to York, and the Earl of Warwick to his Government of Calais. The English Historians say, this Earl being Admiral of the Channel, equipped fourteen Ships to give chase to some Spanish Corsairs, who infested the narrow Seas, and meeting them, sunk several, and brought fix to Calais. But probably they were mistaken, since the Collection of the Publick Acts gives quite another Idea of this Affair. It is true, we find there Complaints from the Republics of Genoa and Lubeck to the King against the Earl of Warwick, and that the King appointed Commissioners to take Informations. But in this Commission there is no mention of Spanish Ships. It even appears, that this Engagement was occasioned by an accidental Quarrel between the Ships of Genoa and Lubeck, and those which were conveying the Earl of Warwick with his Retinue to Calais. This does not shew they were Pirates, or that the Earl of Warwick attacked them designedly. Be this as it will, upon this Complaint he was forced to return to England to answer for himself, and staid fix or seven Weeks.

Whilst the Earl was at London, it happened one Day, whilst he was present at the Council, one of his People quarrelled with a Servant of the King's, and wounded him: Whereupon the rest of the King's Domesticks arming themselves, some with Swords, others with Clubs or other Weapons, ran to revenge their Comrade. As they could not find the Aggressor, they fell upon the rest of the Earl of Warwick's Retinue. In short, they even assaulted his Person, as he was coming out of the Council to go to his Barge, which waited for him on the Thames. The Assault was so violent, that he very hardly escaped to his Barge, after seeing several of his People killed on the Spot. He did not doubt this was a Contrivance of the Queen to dispatch him, without appearing to be concerned. He was confirmed in his Opinion, when he heard the King had ordered him to be arrested and sent to the Tower. He had notice timely enough to discontinue those who were sent to arrest him. It is very difficult to decide, whether the Queen contrived this Quarrel to dispatch him, or whether it happened by Accident. However this be, the Order to apprehend him, though he himself had reason to complain, made him sensible, he should never be more secured from the Plots of his Enemies, than by attacking them with open Force. With a Mind full of Relentment at this Affront, he went to the Earl of Salisbury his Father; and without Delay, they repaired together to the Duke of York, to consult what was to be done in this Juncture. From what had lately passed, they concluded, the Reconciliation at London was only a Snare to surprize them the more easily, and destroy them one after another. Perhaps they were not sorry for having this Excuse to justify their Resolution of acting openly, as not being able to rely any more on the Promises of the Court. Pursuant to this Project, the Earl of Warwick speedily returned to Calais to secure that Place, not questioning that there was a design to take it from him.

Mean while, the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury took measures to execute their Projects. They agreed, whilst the Duke was levying an Army in Wales, the Earl should advance towards London at the head of five or six thousand Men (7), and openly demand Satisfaction for the Injury done to his Son. As this Design could not be executed without the Queen's Knowledge, the Lord Audley (8) was commissioned to raise Troops (9), and oppose the Earl of Salisbury (10). Audley made such dispatch, that in a very short time he was at the head of ten thousand Men, and in condition to march towards Lancashire, thence which the Earl of Salisbury was to pass. But he found the Earl was already advanced as far as Shropshire, where the two Armies met. The Earl of Salisbury, though but half as strong as the Enemy, did not think proper to retreat, but resolved to make use of Stratagem to obtain a Victory, which otherwise he could not expect. Audley being encamped on Blire-Heath near a little River, Salisbury posted himself on the other Side, as if he meant to guard the Pass, and hinder his being attacked. Then suddenly feigning a Fear, he retired in the Night, marching so, as at break of Day his Enemies could still see the Rear of his Army. This Retreat, which seemed to be with Precipitation, inspiring the Royalists with Ardor, they began to pass the River in Disorder, imagining they had nothing to do, but to pursue the flying Enemy. But whilst they were in this Confusion, some being over the River, others in the Water, and others ready to pass, the Earl of Salisbury returned and fell upon the Troops already over, who had scarce time to draw up. The fight lasted however four or five Hours, because the King's Troops were supported by those that were continually passing. But as this could not be done without Confusion, the Royal Army was at length put to rout with the Loss of two thousand four hundred Men. Audley himself was slain, with all the principal Officers (11).

The Earl of Salisbury having thus opened a Passage, joined the Duke of York, who was raising Troops in Wales. It would have been too dangerous to continue his March towards London, because the Court had now assembled a great Force at Coventry. The Queen, who still commanded in the King's Name, used all possible Endeavours to have a strong Army. She saw plainly, there was nothing to be done without a great Superiority. On the other hand, the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury were no less intent upon procuring all possible Assistance, in order to withstand the Forces that were preparing against them. They sent word to the Earl of Warwick, that it would be very necessary to come and join them, and try to bring them some Troops. Upon this Advice, Warwick left Calais under the Government of William Nevill Lord Falenbridge his Uncle, and took with him Part of the Garrison, of which he gave the Command to Sir Andrew Trollop, who had signalized himself in the Wars of France (12).

It was seven Months after the Battle of Blire-Heath, before the two Parties had drawn all their Forces together. October was come, and no Motion yet made on either Side. At length the King departed from Coventry, where he had assembled his Troops, and marched towards Wales in quest of the Male-contentes, who were encamped about Ludlow.

1459. When he came to Gloster (1), he made a Halt, and sent an Offer of Pardon to the Rebels (2), provided they would lay down their Arms. They answered, they could no longer rely on such Promises, which were intended only to surprise them, as was visible in what had happened at London to the Earl of Warwick; that nevertheless, they were ready to submit to the King, if some Expedient could be found for their Safety. Upon this Answer the King ordered his Army to advance. At the same time, he gave the Duke of Somerset a Patent to be Governor of Calais, in the room of the Earl of Warwick. But it was easier to give the Duke this Government in Parchment, than to put him in possession.

The King having advanced with Design to give Battle, the Yorkists sent him a very submissive Letter, praying him to consider, that they had taken Arms only in their own Defence, against the Attempts of their Enemies; That this Intention appeared, in their keeping themselves in a Corner of the Kingdom, without undertaking any thing, being determined not to fight unless forced; That they desired only the Redress of the Grievances introduced into the Government, to the great Oppression of the People, by the Fault of the Ministry. Lastly, they besought the King, to look upon them as loyal Subjects, who had formed no Design against his Person, and to restore them to Favour.

This Letter had a quite contrary Effect to what they expected. Their Enemies not questioning but Fear had made them talk thus, advanced within half a Mile of them, with a Resolution to give them Battle next Day. At the same time, they found means to disperse in the Enemy's Camp the King's Proclamation, offering Pardon to all the Adherents of the rebellious Lords, provided they would lay down their Arms. This Proclamation had a surprising Effect. The Duke of York's Troops imagining the King offered a Pardon, by reason of the Superiority of his Forces, and that there was no time to lose to take the Benefit of it, immediately began to disband themselves. Sir Andrew Trollop, who commanded the Detachment of the Garrison of Calais, put the whole Army in Disorder, by flying in the Night to the King's Camp, with the Troops under his Command. This Desertion, which increased every Moment, threw the Leaders into so terrible a Consternation, that fearing to be delivered to the King as soon as Day should appear, they chose to save themselves by flight. The Duke of York, taking with him the Earl of Rutland his second Son, embarked for Ireland. The Earl of Warwick fled towards Calais, and the Earl of Salisbury speedily followed him, with the Earl of March eldest Son of the Duke of York (3). This young Prince was then nineteen Years old. The Generals being retired, the rest of the Officers and Soldiers thus abandoned were reduced to the King's Mercy, who was pleased to pardon all, except a few that were executed for an Example.

The Parliament being assembled in December (4), declared the Duke of York and his Adherents guilty of High-Treason. Their Estates were confiscated, and they and their Posterity, pronounced incapable of Inheritance, to the fourth Generation. We see here a remarkable Instance of the Variableness of the Parliament, according as the Face of Affairs was altered. I shall have frequent occasion hereafter to take notice of many the like Instances.

Upon the breaking up of the Parliament, the Duke of Somerset embarked with a Body of Troops (5), in order to take possession of his Government of Calais; but the Garrison firing upon him, he was obliged to land elsewhere, and retire to Guissey, from whence he made frequent Incursions about Calais. But those little Skirmishes were not capable of rendering him Master of so strong a Place.

The Queen finding, the Earl of Warwick would not be deprived of his Government, equipped a Fleet to transport Succours to the Duke of Somerset. This Fleet, well provided with all things, lay at Sandwich in expectation of a fair Wind. The Earl of Warwick having notice of it, sent a Body of Troops privately from Calais, under the Command of Sir John Dinham, who arriving at Sandwich about break of Day, surprized most of the Officers in their Beds (6). As soon as he had them in his Power, he found means to gain the Soldiers and Mariners, and carried the King's Ships to Calais (7).

The Earl of Warwick made use of these Ships to convey him into Ireland, where he went to concert measures with the Duke of York, for their common Defence. After he had been about a Month (8) on this Voyage, he met in his Return the Duke of Exeter (9), Admiral of England, who waited to take him in his Passage. But the Royal Fleet were so little inclined to fight against him, that the Duke of Exeter fearing to receive some Disgrace, thought not proper to attack him.

The Queen and the Ministers doubted not, that the Interview of the Duke of York and the Earl of Warwick would produce a fresh Rebellion. For this reason, at a Council held upon that occasion, it was resolved, strict Search should be made in all the Counties and Towns of the Kingdom, for the Adherents of the Duke of York, and that such should be suppressed as favoured him most, and were best able to serve him. It was not questioned, but this Method would put an effectual Stop to his ambitious Pursuits. Pursuant to this Resolution, James Butler Earl of Wiltshire, and the Lord Scates (10) were empowered to inquire out those that bore Arms for the Male-contents in the late Rebellion, and to punish them according to Law. These two Lords began to execute their Commission, in some of the Towns (11) which had most openly declared for the Duke of York, and condemned several Persons to Death. Of all the Counties of the Kingdom, none had more reason to dread the Court's Relentment than Kent. Upon all Occasions that County had shewn a very strong Attachment to the Duke of York, and what was done there in favour of Cade was not yet forgot. So, the Inhabitants of Kent perceiving, by what was practised in other Places, that their Ruin was unavoidable, began early to think of means to prevent it. To that end, they sent word to the Lords at Calais, if they would make a Descent in their County, they should be received with open Arms, and the Inhabitants were ready to venture their Lives and Fortunes with them.

This Overture was very agreeable to the Lords. However, not to embark rashly in this Affair, they sent the Lord Falconbridge to be assured of their Sincerity. Falconbridge conbridge meeting at Sea with Sir Simon Monfort, who was appointed to guard the Coasts, attacked him, and taking him Prisoner with many other Officers, sent them all to Calais. Upon their Arrival, the Earl of March ordered Monfort with twelve of his Captains to be beheaded, by way of retaliation for his Father's Adherents, who had been executed in England. These are almost unavoidable Cruelties in such Civil Wars.

Falconbridge being come to Sandwich, found the Inhabitants of that Place and of the whole County of Kent, well-affected to the Lords, that he writ to Calais, there was no time to be lost; that the County of Kent was going to be ruined, if not speedily relieved; and that in the Terror People were under, it was not to be doubted, that several other Counties, as well as Kent, would rise against the Court, if they could hope to be supported. This juncture appearing very favorable, the Lords at Calais resolved to improve it, and took care to inform the Duke of York, who still kept in Ireland. Before they failed, a Manifesto was dispersed in Kent and in the neighbouring Parts (12), declaring that the sole Motive of their taking Arms, was to free the poor People from the Oppression they groaned under, and secure their Liberties and Privileges. It was added, that they did not question, but all honest Englishmen would assist in the Execution of so good a Design. This Manifesto had such an Effect, that the Lords arriving at Sandwich with fifteen hundred Men only, found there a Body of four thousand armed Men conducted by the Lord Cobham (13). With this Reinforcement they began their March towards London, knowing the Citizens were ready to receive them. And indeed the Gates being opened to them, they entered the City, at the head of forty thousand Men, their Army increasing to that Number in 1460. so short a March. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Lincoln, Ely, Exeter declared for them.

Mean while, the Queen who was at Coventry, was not idle. She had endeavoured to hinder the Entrance of the Male-Contents into London, by sending the Lord Scales with a good Body of Troops. But the Mayor had refused him Admittance, even before the Arrival of the Lords. Scales being thus repulsed, had thrown himself into the Tower, from whence he threatened to demolish the City with his Cannon, if the Rebels were received. But his Threats were not capable of frightening the Citizens. In the mean time, the King and Queen were assembling their Forces at Coventry, with all possible Diligence. As soon as their Army was ready to march, they gave the Command to the Duke of Somerset, lately returned from Guisnes, and the Duke of Buckingham. But this was only for Form's sake, the Queen herself being really General, since every thing was done by her Orders, though the King was present in Person. The young Earl of March, hearing the Queen was marching to London, departed thence with twenty-five thousand Men, to give her Battle before she should grow stronger. He left at London the Earl of Salisbury, with good Part of his Troops, and took with him the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Cobham, who served as his Lieutenants (1). At his Departure from London, the Lord Scales ordered the Tower Cannon to fire upon the City, and did some Damage (2). But by the Earl of Salisbury's care, to prevent his having any Provisions, he was himself reduced to great Straights.

The Queen advancing towards the Male-Contents, incamped on a Plain near Northampton, with a little River (3) behind her, which he had hastily passed, left the Enemies should make use of it to avoid fighting. So desirous was she to decide the Quarrel by a Battle. But this Precaution was not only unfeasible to her, but, as will be seen presently, very prejudicial. The Earls of March and Warwick, likewise advancing, encamped the 17th of July, between Yorcster and Northampton. The same day, they sent the Bishop of Salisbury to the King, beseeching him to suspend his Indignation, and consider with them of an Agreement, without Blood-shed. But the Court perceiving it to be only a general Proposal, intended merely to save the Appearances, would by no means give Ear to it. So, both Sides prepared for Battle.

On the 19th of July (4), the Yorkists advanced towards the King's Army. The Earl of Warwick commanded the Right Wing, the Lord Cobham the Left, and the Earl of March was in the Center. The Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham were at the Head of the Royalists, whilst the Queen kept at some distance, to observe what should pass, and give orders accordingly. The King remained in his Tent, waiting the Issue of a Battle, which, probably, was to secure, or deprive him of the Crown, for ever. The fight began not till two in the Afternoon, the Lords having first published in their Army a strict Charge, not to hurt the King's Person, to spare the common Soldiers, and to fall upon the Officers only. The Battle lasted two, some say five, Hours, with great Fierceness and Obstinacy on both Sides, till at length the Lord Grey, [of Ruthin,] who commanded a considerable Body of the King's Army, suddenly went over to the Male-contents. This unexpected Defection quite disheartened the Royalists. Apprehensive, that other Bodies would follow this Example, they began by degrees to give ground, and at last, were routed, with the loss of ten thousand Men. The River which was in their Rear, caused the Slaughter to be greater than it would have been, if the vanquished could have more easily taken to Flight; besides, that many were drowned in endeavouring to repass the River. The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Son of the renowned Talbot, the Lord Beaumont (5), and several other Nobles and Officers of Distinction were slain on the Spot. The Queen, the young Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Somerset fled without resting into the Bishop-rick of Durham; so great was their Fear of being delivered to their Enemies. The unfortunate King, who continued in his Tent, fell once more into the Hands of the victorious Lords, who paid him however all the Respect he could have required of them, had he been in his greatest Prosperity. This deference was some Comfort to him in his present Condition, which would have been more worthy of Pity, if his natural Imbecility had not rendered him inflexible of good and bad Fortune. Immediately after the Battle, he was honorably conducted to Northampton, where he resided some time. After that, on the 16th of August (6), he came to London, surrounded with a crowd of Lords, who, a few Days before, were in Arms against him. Mean while, the Queen, not thinking her self safe in Durham, privately retired with eight Persons only, into Wales (7), where she would never have been fought. Shortly after, she left that Retreat, and with the Prince her Son fled into Scotland.

Upon the King's Arrival at London, he called a Parliament for the 2d of October (8). They who governed him wanted this delay, in order to fend for the Duke of York, who was still in Ireland. They took care to acquaint him with what had passed, and desired him to repair to London with all possible speed, that he might be there at the opening of the Parliament, or sooner, if the Wind would permit. In this Interval, they acted in the King's Name, and made him sign all the Orders which agreed with their Interest. In the Collection of the Publick Aids, there is a Patent, confirming to the Earl of Warwick the Government of Calais; and an Order to the Duke of Somerset, to resign him that of Guisnes. And moreover, the King's Declaration, acknowledging the Duke of York, and his Adherents, for good and faithful Subjects, as having given undoubted Proofs of their Loyalty, not only in Words, but in Deeds.

Whilst England was thus in Combustion, James II, King of Scotland, prepared to make an Irruption. It was the Duke of York, that after his retreat into Ireland, had, by some advantageous offers, engaged him to break with Henry, in expectation of reaping some Benefit himself from this Diversion. Though last Year, James had concluded with England, a four years Truce (9), he believed, he ought to improve this opportunity. Indeed, he alleged several Reasons to colour his Invasion, but the Circumstances of England was the sole and real Motive of his Preparations. Be this as it will, a few Days after the Battle of Northampton, he entered England at the head of an Army, and beleagued Roxborough; but had not time to make any great Progress. One of his own Cannon happening to burst, he was killed with a Splinter on the 4th of August. James III, his eldest Son, then but seven Years old, was his Successor. The Queen his Widow, who Buckingham was in the Army, carried on the Siege, till the Town was surrendered.

The Death of James II had been preceded some Charles VII Days, by that of Charles VII King of France. It is pretended, he starved himself for fear of being poisoned by the Dauphin his Son, who mounted the Throne of France after him, by the Name of Lewis XI.

The Duke of York could not reach London, till two Days after the opening of the Parliament. He rid directly to Westminster, and alighting from his Horse, went to the House of Lords, where he stood some time under the Canopy of State, with his Hand on the Throne, expecting as it were, to be desired to seat himself thereon. But the Silence of the House was a plain Indication, his Intention was not universally approved. At the same time, to increase his Confusion caused by their Silence, the Archbishop of Canterbury approaching him (10), asked him whether he would not go and pay his respects to the King. With what Caution soever the Duke had hitherto behaved, he could not forbear changing Countenance at this Question, and telling the Archbishop, he knew no Person, to whom he owed that Honour. Upon these Words, he immediately withdrew to his own House. He was too discerning, not to perceive, he in vain expected to be intreated to accept of the Crown. So, with-1460. out concealing his Sentiments any longer, he sent next Morning (1), a Writing to the Parliament, containing the Reasons on which his Pretensions were built. As they have been frequently mentioned, it will be needless to repeat them. It suffices to say in a word, that he claimed the Crown as Heir of the House of March. This Affair was very warmly debated in Parliament (2), according to the Knowledge and Inclinations of the Members. To relate all the Arguments alleged pro and con, would be excessively tedious; but as this is a Matter of great Moment, it will not be improper to give the Substance of the Objections to the Duke of York's Claim, and the Replies of his Friends. I must not, however, forget to remark, that both Sides referred to the Decision of the Parliament, which they equally acknowledged for the sole Judge of this Affair.

Arguments Pro and Con

In the first place it was said, when Henry IV. Grandfather of the present King, took possession of the Throne, no Person offered to oppose him.

The Duke of York's Friends replied, that as Edmund Earl of March, who was then alive, could not dispute it, without manifest Danger, his Silence could not be interpreted for Consent.

II. It was alleged on the King's behalf, that Henry IV, his Grandfather, had received the Crown by the Parliament's Authority. To this it was answered, the Duke of York did not pretend to take possession, without the same Authority, as appeared in his Memorial directed to both Houses. But, as the Parliament had strong Reasons to proceed contrary to Custom, in favour of the House of Lancaster; so they had at present as strong, to do the Duke of York Justice. They who talked thus, took care not to dispute the Parliament's Authority, at a time, when they meant to make use of it, to place the Duke of York on the Throne. But, probably, they did not speak, upon this Subject, all their Thoughts.

III. The Resignation of Richard II. was pleaded in behalf of the House of Lancaster.

Answer was made, by denying that Richard's Resignation concerned that House in particular, or even the Person of Henry IV. But, supposing it so, it was not in the Power of a captive King, just going to be deposed, to appoint a Successor.

IV. It was objected against the Duke of York, that the Earl of Cambridge his Father, having been executed for High-Treason, his Posterity were rendered incapable of any Inheritance.

The Duke's Adherents answered, he had been restored to his Honours, and all his Birth-Rights, and acknowledged for Duke of York, and Earl of March, by the King himself, and the whole Kingdom.

V. It was further urged, that the House of Lancaster had enjoyed the Crown above sixty Years.

To this it was replied, that Prescription was no Plea against the Right of Succession to the Crown, which was a natural Right, and not to be destroyed by a positive Law.

VI. Lastly, it was represented in the King's favor, that having now reigned thirty eight Years, and all along led an innocent Life, without giving any Person cause to complain, it would be a great Cruelty to deprive him of the Crown.

This Argument seemed very strong: But the Duke of York's Friends replied, that Henry being incapable of governing by himself, to leave him in possession of the Crown, was acting rather for the Queen and the Ministers, who abused his Name and Authority, than for him. Moreover, the whole Kingdom was not to be ruined for his sake, or a Wrong to be committed from a Motive of Charity.

It may easily be judged, that these and several other Reasons, alleged by the two Parties, were enlarged and displayed to the best Advantage, especially in the Parliament, where there are generally many Persons of great Abilities. This was a very proper Subject to exercise the Ingenious, difficult in it self, and still more so, by the present Situation of Affairs. At length, after a Debate of several days, it was resolved (3), that Henry should enjoy the Crown during his Life, and the Duke of York be declared his Successor. This Resolve was passed into an Act of Parliament, declaring, That notwithstanding the Duke of York's indisputable Title to the Crown, he had freely consented, that Henry should possess it for his Life, and promised to swear Allegiance to him as his lawful Sovereign. But if the King should any way break this Agreement, then the Crown should immediately devolve to the Duke of York, or his lawful Heirs (4).

Very likely, this Agreement did not come up to the Duke of York's Expectations. He was contented however, because he perceived it would be very difficult to obtain more, without open Force. It cannot be denied, that he behaved with a Moderation very uncommon in such Cases. In his present Circumstances, and according to the Rule generally followed by Parliaments, to declare for the strongest, nothing was more easy for the Duke, than to cause the Crown to be adjudged to him immediately. He had at his Command a victorious, and at that time, irresistible Army. Besides, most of the Members of Parliament were in his Interest, and probably, after acknowledging his Title to be indisputable, they would not have wanted much Solicitation to proceed one Step farther, and place him on the Throne. It is therefore manifest, if the Parliament showed any regard for Henry, it was, because they thought themselves at liberty to do this Equity, notwithstanding the victorious Army which might have offered them Violence, if the Duke would have made use of his Advantages. It must be further observed, that the Duke of York was older than the King, and therefore naturally could not expect to out-live him. And yet, those who have writ the History of these Troubles, have put an ill Construction upon all they have said concerning this Prince. The Reason may be easily guessed. The House of York enjoying the Throne but twenty four Years, we have no Historian in that Interval; all we have being later, and writing since the Restoration of the House of Lancaster in the Person of Henry VII. This must be always remembered in reading the History of these Civil Wars.

The day after passing the forementioned Act, a Proclamation was made at St. Paul's, where the King was present, with his Crown on his Head, attended by the Duke of York (5).

After this Agreement, the King continued the same. Though it was easy for him to perceive, what Prejudice the late Settlement brought to his Family, and particularly to the Prince of Wales his Son, he lived quietly in his Servitude, without thinking of Means for his Deliverance. Satisfied with whatever the Duke of York was pleased to suggest, he wholly gave himself up to Devotion, and left the Publick Affairs to those who managed them in his Name. Thus the Duke finding himself absolute Master of the Government and Person of the King, caused him to sign an Order, requiring the Queen to repair to him. The Duke was sensible, this Order would be to no purpose. But his Aim was, to render her criminal, by her refusing to obey the King, and thereby to justify his intended Proceedings against her. He thought her without Refuge, and in that Belief imagined, he had only to find some Pretence, to lay an insuperable Obstacle to her return, in order to be freed from so dangerous an Enemy. But he relied too far on his own good Fortune, and the Queen's Weakness. Instead of being discouraged at the ill Situation of the King's, and his Family's Affairs, she was now returned into England, with the Prince of Wales, her Son, and had drawn together in the North, an Army of eighteen thousand Men (6). The better to engage the People of those Parts to her Interest, she had caused to be reported, that they were allowed to plunder the Country on the South of the Trent. Probably, this most conduced to her assembling so great a Number of Troops.

The Duke of York had been informed of the Queen's Endeavors to levy an Army, but did not know she had made so great a Progress, and yet, thought he could not be too speedy to prevent the Execution of her Designs. He departed therefore from London (7) with four or five thousand Men only, leaving Orders with the Earl of March his Son, to lead the rest of the Army into Wales to refresh them, and then come and join him. As he advanced 1460. towards the North, he received the mortifying News of the Queen's great Success, in the levying of Troops. At length, being arrived near Wakefield in the County of York (1), he heard the Queen was advancing towards him, at the Head of eighteen thousand Men. Whereupon he resolved to retire to his Castle of Sandal, till the Arrival of the Earl of March. He knew, the Queen, who had no Artillery, could not force him in that Castle, which was well fortified, and did not question but the Earl his Son would speedily come to his Relief.

The Queen was extremely troubled to see her Enemy thus secured from all Attack. As she was then much superior in Number of Troops, if the Duke would have fought, she might have flattered herself with undoubted Success. But it was not certain, that after the Earl of March's Arrival, she should be in the same Situation. For this Reason, she neglected nothing to provoke her Enemy, and induce him to come out of his Retreat. As she did not despair of accomplishing her Design, she placed a Body of Troops in Ambush, behind a Hill (2). Then she appeared before the Walls of Sandal, provoking the Duke all manner of ways, one while threatening him, another while fending him Defiances, and upbraiding him, that a Man who aspired to the Crown, should suffer himself to be thus shut up by a Woman.

The Duke of York had hitherto acted with great Prudence and Conduct. During the Wars of France, where he had often commanded in Chief, he had shown no less Wisdom, than true Valour. But, on this occasion, he unfortunately suffered his Courage to prevail, contrary to the Opinion of his Friends (3), who advised him to despise those vain Reproaches. Probably, his Hatred to the Queen led him, as it were against his Will, to commit an unpardonable Fault, in a General of so established a Reputation. These at least were the Motives ascribed to him by the Historians. For my Part, if I may be allowed to speak my Opinion, I own I think it improbable. I should rather believe, the want of Provisions forced him to a Battle, in order to avoid the Danger, to which he was exposed. So, if he committed a Fault, it was in shutting himself up in a Castle, instead of returning, or meeting his Son, who could easily join him. Be this as it will, he marched out of Sandal, and drew up his Men on Wakefield Green, counting, his Courage and Experience would supply the Defects of his Army. He was no sooner drawn up, but he saw himself attacked by the Queen's Troops, which being more numerous than his, had a great Advantage over him. Whilst he was pressed in the Front by his Enemies, stronger than himself, the Ambushes rose, and attacked him in the Rear. This unexpected Assault, bred such Confusion among his Troops, that within half an Hour they were routed, and himself slain, valiantly fighting. The young Earl of Rutland his second Son, not above twelve Years of Age, flying with his Governor, was overtaken by the Lord Clifford, who plunged his Dagger into his Breast, notwithstanding the earnest Intreaties of the Governor, to spare the young Prince's Life (4). Afterwards, the same Lord Clifford finding the Duke of York's Body, cut off the Head, and crowning it with a Paper-Crown, fixed it on the end of his Lance, and presented it to the Queen, who ordered it to be placed on the Walls of York (5).

Thus fell the Duke of York, about fifty Years old (6). It may be said, never was Prince so near a Throne, and not in it, and that it lay in his own Breast to take possession, had he been willing to use the Power he had in his Hands. I shall not undertake, either to condemn, or justify his Pretensions. I leave the Reader to pass his own Judgment, upon the Grounds already explained in several Places. Unhappily for this Prince, the English Historians that writ, when the Restoration of the House of Lancaster was still fresh, I mean in the Reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII., have put an ill Construction on all his Actions. Those that came after them, not content with taking the Facts as they found them related, have likewise copied the Reflections, and even the very Invectives. They have thereby all unanimously given the Cause for the House of Lancaster, instead of leaving their Readers at Liberty to pass an impartial Judgment upon so difficult a Case, the Decision whereof, should the same thing happen again, would be no less perplexing at present, than it was formerly. The Earl of Salisbury having the Misfortune to be taken Prisoner in the Battle, was carried, notwithstanding his Wounds, to Passifort, where he lost his Head on the Scaffold (7). The Queen ordered it to be set on a Pole, near the Duke of York's.

Such was the Success of this Battle, fought on the last Day of December, near Wakefield (8), from whence it took its Name. This Battle seemed to have firmly restored the Affairs of the King and Queen, and yet it served only to hasten their Destruction, and sooner advance the House of York to the Throne. The Earl of March hearing of the Defeat and Death of the Duke his Father, was not discouraged. On the contrary, he resolved to maintain the Quarrel, let what would be the Consequence, and lose his Life, or execute his Father's Designs. After what had passed, there was no Medium, one of the two Houses must necessarily be established, upon the Ruins of the other. This Prince was then in Wales (9), ready to march to the Assistance of his Father. His Army was three and twenty thousand strong, besides what was left at London, under the Command of the Earl of Warwick, for the Defence of the Metropolis. So, finding himself strong enough to go in quest of the Queen, he wished for nothing more ardently, than an opportunity to revenge his Father's Death.

Whilst the Earl of March was taking this Resolution, the Queen advanced towards London, with design to secure that great City, which alone could influence the Fortune of either Party. But hearing upon the Road, that the Earl of March began to move, the detached Jasper Tudor Earl of Pembroke (10), to oppose this new Enemy, whom he did not imagine to be so strong as he was. The Earl of March being informed of the Queen's Motion towards London, altered his Course, and instead of going to meet her, took likewise the Road to London, in order to prevent her. But having Advice of the Detachment sent against him, he did not think proper to come between the two Armies of his Enemies, which must have happened, had he continued his Route. So, coming to a sudden Resolution, he returned to meet the Earl of Pembroke. He met him near Mortimer's Cross in Herefordshire, and as he was much superior in Number of Troops, easily defeated him, and flew three thousand eight hundred of his Men. The Earl of Pembroke had the good Fortune to escape. But Owen Tudor his Father, according to some, or more probably, his younger Brother (11), being taken Prisoner, was beheaded, with several others, in revenge for the Earl of Salisbury.

The News of this Defeat reaching the Queen on the Road, prevented her not from continuing her March towards London. She believed, that appearing at the Gates of the City with a victorious Army, she should overcome the Inhabitants, that they would of themselves,

And indeed there is no manner of Improbability or Contradiction in supposing it to have been him. For from the Year 1423, or 1424, when it is probable he was married, to 1460, there are but thirty six or thirty seven Years; and supposing he was twenty or twenty five when he married, he might very well live till 1460, and not have been a very old Man.

expel the Earl of Warwick. Indeed, the Earl himself seems to have been of that Mind, since he chose rather to go and fight the Queen, than remain in London; which doubtless, he would not have done, had he been secure of the City. The Queen being arrived at St. Albans, received certain Advice, that the Earl of Warwick was marching towards her with his Army, reinforced with a Body of Londoners, and bringing the King with him. The Queen's Army consisted of northern Troops (1), who committed such monstrous Ravages, that it was one of the chief Reasons, why the Londoners chose to join the Earl of Warwick. If these Troops had entered the City, they would have had every thing to fear from such Guests.

The two Armies meeting near St. Albans, on Bernard's Heath, began a Fight, which at first was very fierce on both Sides. But Loveless, who commanded one of the Wings of Warwick's Army, either through Treachery, or for some other Reason, not ingaging in time, Victory declared for the Queen, and the Vanquished lost two thousand eight hundred Men (2). She had withal the Satisfaction to free the King, whom the Earl of Warwick durst not venture to leave at London. She used her Victory with the Barbarity too common in Civil Wars, beheading several Persons of Distinction, particularly the Lord Bonville (3), and Sir Thomas Kieriel, though the King had granted them their Lives. As her Troops had voluntarily lifted in her Service, without her having wherewithal to pay them, she could not hinder them, after the Victory, from plundering the Town of St. Albans. These northern Soldiers declared, they had taken Arms only upon the Promise of having the plunder of the Country lying South of the Trent. This Pretension inspired the Inhabitants of London, and the neighbouring Country, with a Terror very prejudicial to the Queen. Provisions being grown very scarce in her Army, by reason of the great Licentiousness of her Troops, she sent to the Mayor of London for a Supply, who not daring to deny her at such a Juncture, ordered several Carts to be loaded. But as they were going out of the Gate, the Mob stopped them, and told the Mayor, they would not suffer Provisions to be sent to an Army, which was come on purpose to plunder the Country. The Mayor not being able to help this Disorder, made his Excuse to the Queen (4), and gave her hopes of being received into the City, as soon as the People were appeased.

Whilst the Queen at St. Albans was treating with the Mayor of London, the Earl of March was advancing with all possible diligence, to inspire the Londoners with a Resolution to keep their Gates shut against the Queen, on account of the approaching Assistance. And indeed, the News of his March did not a little contribute to prolong the Negotiation between the Queen and the Mayor, which ruined her Affairs. When he heard, the Earl of March was approaching, and had strengthened his Army, with the Remains of the Earl of Warwick's (5), he chose to retire into the North. Besides that he was inferior to her Enemy, she was justly apprehensive of not being received into London, in case she advanced that way, and of being obliged to join Battle at the Gates of the City, too well inclined to favour her Enemy.

The Earl of March, overjoyed that the Queen voluntarily gave him up the Metropolis, entered as it were in Triumph, the beginning of March (6). He was received with the Acclamations of the Citizens, who, several Years since, had very near declared against the Court. The Caution wherewith the late Duke of York had thought fit to proceed, had been so much to his Prejudice, that his Son's Friends judged it absolutely necessary to place him at once in the Throne. After sundry Consultations, they resolved not to be exposed to the Delays of a Parliament, but to proceed to an extraordinary Election, first by the People, and then by the Nobles. They were of opinion, this Method could be justified by the Act of Parliament, confirming the Agreement between the King and the Duke of York, and that it was unnecessary to flay for a fresh Confirmation.

Pursuant to this Resolution, the Earl of Warwick (7) drew up his Army in St. John's Fields, in the midst of Thronges of People, whom ordering to be cast into a Ring round him, he read aloud the Agreement between the King and the Duke of York, with the Act of Parliament, whereby it was confirmed. That done, he told the People, Henry had notoriously violated this Agreement, and so forfeited, according to the Act of Parliament, his Right to the Crown. But after all, I do not see upon what foundation he could charge the King with the Queen's Proceedings, since he was all the while as a Prisoner at London: Neither was he any more his own Master, after he was with the Queen. Be this as it will, the Earl of Warwick raising his Voice, asked the People, who stood round him, whether they would have Henry of Lancaster for King? The whole Multitude crying out, No, No: He asked, whether according to that Settlement, they would have Edward, Son of the late Duke of York, to reign over them? To which, all the People answered with Acclamations, expressing their Consent.

This first Step being made, and the People's Mind being, as was pretended, sufficiently known, a great Council was called of all the Bishops, Lords, Gentlemen and Magistrates, in and about London (8). Edward being present in this Assembly, set forth his Title to the Crown, as well by Birth, as by the fore-mentioned Agreement, and desired it might be adjudged to him. It would have been great boldness, to dispute his Pretension at such a Juncture. So, with one Consent the Assembly declared, that Henry of Lancaster having forfeited his Right of enjoying the Crown during Life, by the Breach of the solemn Agreement made with the Duke of York, and ratified by the Parliament; it was devolved to Edward, eldest Son of the Duke of York. Upon this Declaration, the Crown was offered the Duke, who accepted it, modestly confessing his Insufficiency; and adding, that though his Youth and Inexperience made him apprehensive of taking upon him so weighty a Charge, he would however, with God's Assistance, use his utmost Endeavors to render his People happy. On the Morrow (9), he went in Procession to St. Paul's, [and from thence, was conducted in great State to Wyndham-Hall,] where he sat in the King's Seat, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his Hand (10). The Archbishop of Canterbury having asked the People, whether they would have Edward Earl of March for King; the People answered with loud Acclamations. Then, the King took the Homage of the Lords that were present. The Ceremony concluding with singing Te Deum, Edward was conducted with great Solemnity to the Bishop's Palace, where Henry used to lodge, when he was within the Walls of the City. Next Day, being the 5th of March, he was proclaimed in London, and the neighboring Towns, by the Name of Edward IV.

Thus ended the Reign of Henry VI, which had lasted thirty-eight Years and a Half, without his ever intermeddling with the Administration of the publick Affairs. It does not even appear, that he was, upon any occasion, much moved with Events; which however were, for the most Part, such as would affect a Prince of a different Character. He was fitter for a private Life, than a Crown. His great and only Defect was a natural Imbecility, which rendered him incapable to govern of himself. Ever ruled by those who managed the Affairs in his Name, his Capacity reached not to see the Consequences of the Counsels given him, which to him seemed always good. Herein, he was different from the King his Father, whose Genius was always superior to that of his Ministers. As to the rest, he was chaste, temperate, extremely religious, abhorring Injustice and Cruelty. It was these Virtues that have served for Foundation to the Praises bestowed on him by several Historians, and which have made some consider him as a true Saint. Indeed, these Virtues would have rendered him an accomplished Prince, had they been attended with the Qualifications of a Sovereign. But being alone, they served only to make him an honest Man, and withal, a very indifferent King, not to say worse. His Incapacity rendered him contemptible to his Subjects. But the Innocency of his Life, never suffered their Contempt to turn into Hatred.

During the first Years of his Reign, his Affairs were in a prosperous State, because they were managed by the Dukes of Bedford and Gloucester his Uncles, Princes of great Abilities, and who had his Interest at Heart. And, if even in their Life-time, his Affairs began to decline, it may be said to be owing, not so much to their Fault, as to some unforeseen Accidents, which all the Prudence in the World could not have prevented. After the Death of the Duke of Bedford, Henry suffered himself to be governed by the Cardinal of Winchester, and the Duke of Suffolk; who, acting not by the same Motives, and regarding only their own Affairs, completed his Ruin. Afterwards, Queen Margaret by her uncommon Abilities, might have restored his Affairs, but the King's Glory, and the Nation's Interest, were lost in her Thoughts. Her sole View, was to grasp all the Power, and use the King's Name to authorize her Passions. The Ministers she employed, were all of the same Character. It is not therefore strange, that the King's Affairs should run so swiftly into Confusion. The Death of the Duke of Gloucester, will be an indelible Stain in Margaret's Reputation, and unhappily, this Crime reflected but too much upon the King himself, since he had not the resolution to oppose it, or punish the Authors. Accordingly, it was manifest, that Heaven took publick Vengeance of this Murder, by the Civil Wars which ensued, and which occasioned the Ruin of the King, the Queen, the Prince their Son, and the whole House of Lancaster.

Henry VI. was thirty-nine Years and about a Quarter old, when he was dispossessed of a Crown, which he had enjoyed almost from his very Birth (1). He still lived long enough to be the sport of Fortune, as will be seen in the following Reign. Edward his Son, Prince of Wales, was in his nineteenth Year, at the time of this Catastrophe (2).

(1) In the first Parliament of his Reign the Queen-Mother came and sat among the Lords, with the young King in her Lap.
(2) The most remarkable Things during this Reign were these: The Art of Printing being found out at Mentz in Germany by John Gutterberg was brought into England by William Caxton of London Mercer, who first printed the Name in the Abbey of Westminster, in 1471. Hall, fol. 170. Stow's Ann. p. 404.
In the 23d Year of this Reign it was enacted in Parliament, That when Wheat was sold for six Shillings and the Quarter; Rye for four Shillings; and Barley for three Shillings; it should be lawful to export the said Kinds of Corn into foreign Parts without Licence. In the Year 1454, there was such Plenty of Corn, that a Quarter of Wheat was commonly sold for twelve or fourteen-pence; and a Quarter of Malt for sixteen or seventeen-pence at most. Stow's Ann. p. 398.
Queen Margaret began Queen's College in Cambridge, which was founded by Edward IV's Queen her Enemy. Archbishop Kemp built the University School at Osford, as it now stands, and St. Paul's College. William Eschfield Mayor of London, built at his own Charge the Water-Conduit in Fleet-street; and John Wille Mayor of London, the Conduit, commonly called the Standard in Cheap. In the Year 1446, Sir Simon Eyre Mayor of London, built London-hall, to be a common Garret for the City. Stow's Survey, B. V. p. 120. In 1455, Sir John Nemes, Mayor of the same, went by Water to Westminster to take his Oath; being the first that went in that manner. For before that time they rode on Horseback. Idem. p. 121.

I. In this and the two foregoing Reigns, the Parliament was reformed in many Particulars, as appears by the Statutes. First, in point of Elections, the Parliament 7 Henry IV. and (25 Henry VI.) ordained, "That the Election of Knights shall be at the next County-Court, after the Writ directed to the Sheriff, and that the Names of the Persons elected shall be returned by Indenture between the Sheriff and the Electors." This the Sheriff was to do, under Penalty of one hundred Pence, and a Year's Imprisonment, without Bail or Mainprize, besides Damages for false Return. (21 Henry IV. 8 Henry VI. 25 Henry VI.) This Election was reduced, but the Persons were not as yet, for hitherto any Englishman had right to give or receive a Vote, wherefore he refused. But (1 Hen. V.) (8 Hen. VI.) the Parliament refused these also to their proper Counts, or else rendered them unserviceable to vote or serve for any County: And the like Order was made for the Burroughs, (25 Henry VI.) That no Person must serve for any City or Burrough, nor give vote in electing such as shall serve for that Town, unless they be both Free and Refrains within that City or Burrough. This was a reasonable Law, for the Times of Henry IV had taught Men, That a King that hath Soldiers dispersed over the Kingdom, can easily sway the County-Courts, and make such Parliaments as they please. However, this was not enough. For all Elections, though of the meanest sort, could do as much hurt with their Vote, as those of the best sort could do good by theirs. This made Elections most subject to Confusions and Parties, and rendered the Parliament less considerable. Hence (in 8 Hen. VI.) it was ordained, "That Elections should give his Vote in Elections in the County, unless he had forty Shillings yearly in free Lands or Tenements, and this is to be taken as if upon Oath of the Party." And more plainly, two Years after (10 Hen. VI.) it was ordered, "That the Persons elected in the County, should be such as were not judges of Persons, nor Times; but being, for the most part, led by Faction or Affection, rather than by right Understanding, make such Elections as are either inconvenient, or injurious to the State. Thirdly, There is no left Equity in the Change than Policy. For what can be more reasonable, than that those Men only should have their Votes in Election of the Common-Council of the Kingdom, whose Estates are chargeable with the publick Taxes and Assessments, and with the Weights of those Persons that are chosen for the publick Service? But above all, this advancing of the Freeholders was beneficial to the Freedom of England, though perhaps they considered it not. First, it shewed the Power of the Lords and great Men, who held the inferior sort at their Devotion, and much of their Possessions by their Will. Secondly, it raised the Spirit of the meaner sort to publick Regards, and by a kind of Ambition, to aspire to the Degree of a Freeholder, in order to be somewhat in the Commonwealth. And thus leaving the meaner Rank, next to the very Degree, they become less considerable, and more subject to the coercive Power; whilst, in the mean time, the Freeholder, now advanced to the Degree of a Freeman, becomes more careful to maintain Correspondency with the Laws, than he was formerly. Lastly, To bind all the rest, a negative Law was made (23 Hen. VI.) That the Persons elected in the County, should not be of the Degree of a Yeoman, but of the most noted Knights, Esquires, or Gentlemen of the County, which easily implies, it was too common to advance those of the meaner sort. The Person thus agreed upon, his Entertainment must be accordingly; and therefore the manner of election in full County, and levying the Rate of Wages for their Maintenance, is reformed and settled (23 Hen. VI.) And lastly, their Persons are put under the Protection of the Law in an especial manner; and a penal Law is made (12 Hen. VI.) against Forces upon their Persons, either in going to, or attending the Parliament. Thus, even in these Times of Confusion, a Foundation was laid of a more uniform Government in future Times, than England hitherto had seen.

II. In the first Year of Henry VI, A Pound weight of Gold, of the old Standard, was coined into forty five Rials of ten Shillings, or a proportionable Number of Half Rials, and Quarters, or Farthings; Rials, at five shillings, and two Shillings and six Pence. These Rials given him crowned with an imperial Crown, seated on the Throne, with a Scepter and Globe, inscribed, HENRICUS. DEI. GRA. REX. ANGL. ET. FRAN. DNS. HIB. Reverses, the Arms of France and England, quarterly, IHESUS. AVTEM. TRANSLIENS. ET. (see Fig. 1.) By the same Indenture, instead of Nobles, and Half Nobles, were coined sixty seven and a half to the Pound, Angels, at six Shillings and eight Pence, or a proportionable Number of Angels, at three Shillings and four Pence. Consequently the Pound Troy, was coined into twenty two pounds ten Shillings, by Tale. The Angels were impressed with Michael and the Dragon, HENRIC. DI. GRA. REX. ANGL. S. FRA. Reverses, a Shield, with the Arms of France and England quartered, in a ship, having a Cross for a Mast, on one Side the Letter H, on the other the R. P. R. CRUCE. TYA. SALVA. NOS. XRE. RED. (see Fig. 2.) The Silver was a French Coin, like his Father's, and very much resembled the Silver Groat, which he likewise coined in that Kingdom, leaving that the Groat wanted the Angel and Virgin over the Shield, and instead of CHRISTVS. VINCI. had SIT. NOMEN. DOMINI. BENEDICTVM. By the Indenture of the same first Year of Henry VI, the Silver Money was of the old Standard, one hundred and twelve Grains to the Pound, making in Tale thirty seven Shillings and six Pence, or a proportionable Number, of Half-Groats, Sterlings, Half-Pence, and Farthings. These are distinguished from all the Farthings, by a Crown, he being the first of our Monarchs that bore the archal Crown, with Globe and Cross upon it. (see Fig. 3.) There were most copied in London, but there were other Mints at York, Bristol, and Durham, Dublin, Canterbury, and at York with the Keys. The Half-penny was like the King's Head very fair. H. D. G. ROSA. SIE. SPA. By Indenture, the fourth of this Reign, the Value of Gold was brought down again to sixteen Pounds thirteen Shillings and four Pence, and the Silver to thirty shillings. By another Indenture of the 12th Year of this Reign, it was called again to thirty seven Shillings and six Pence, and so continued for near fifty Years. In the thirty seventh of this Reign, Edw. Masey was first coined in Ireland, but there is no perfect Account from any Author that he ever seen it.

A DISSERTATION on the MAID of ORLEANS.

THE Actions of JOAN of ARC, commonly called the Maid of Orleans, made formerly a great Noise in the World. We find them dispersed in the Histories of France and England, with Circumstances all favouring of Prodigy. Most of the Writers upon this Subject have scarce left their Readers the Liberty of reasoning and judging. They have expressly decided, some, that Joan of Arc was inspired by God, others, that she was an Instrument of the Devil. But even in this Difference, they all agree to insinuate, that what she did could not be performed without a supernatural Assistance. However, impartial and unprejudiced Readers find great Difficulties in both these Opinions. As they do not see wherein Religion can be concerned in Joan's Actions, they think it equally hard to believe, that God should either supernaturally raise this Maid in favour of Charles VII., or give the Devil an extraordinary Power to make her his Instrument to ruin the Affairs of the English in France. Hence several have been induced to embrace a third Opinion; namely, That the pretended Inspiration of Joan of Arc, was only a Contrivance thought proper to produce the Effect, it did indeed produce. This Diversity of Opinions, joined to the Marvellous visible in the Actions of a Country Girl, very naturally raises a Curiosity to know what may be relied on. Wherefore I am persuaded, it will not be unacceptable fairly to examine this Matter, with the sole view of discovering, as far as possible, the Truth. As I design to be as brief as the thing will allow, omitting the Learning, such a Subject is capable of, I shall only relate the Facts and Testimonies which may clear this Affair, and afterwards make some Remarks upon the whole. They who are impatient to pursue the History of England, may dispense with reading this Dissertation, without fear of losing any thing absolutely necessary to be known.

It must first be observed, that we have but one single cotemporary Author, who gives an Account of the Maid of Orleans. All the After-writers have added something to what he relates, in order to embellish their History. Monstrelet is the Author I mean. He was one of the Retinue of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, and had himself seen this Girl. But he is extremely reserved in what he says. He never gives his own Opinion, and the Reason is very evident. For Joan making her appearance when the Duke of Burgundy was in Alliance with England, Monstrelet, with all of that Party, did not believe her inspired. But as he writ not his Chronicle till after the Duke was reconciled to King Charles, he thought it not proper to combat in his Writings the general Opinion of the French, who were then his Master's Friends. On the other hand, as probably, in changing his Party, he had not changed his Opinion of Joan, he took care to say nothing, to make it thought he was under the same Prejudice with the rest of the French. It seems to me therefore that Monstrelet may be taken for a Guide, who, whatever his Opinion was, has said nothing to render him suspected. The Truth is, he never says either that Joan was, or was not inspired.

The same Author has inserted in his Chronicle a Letter written in the Name of Henry VI to the Duke of Burgundy, to acquaint him with what passed at the Trial and Condemnation of the Maid of Orleans. This Letter might be justly suspected of Partiality, if the Facts it contains did not, for the most part, agree with the Records of the Trial mentioned hereafter. So, this Letter is a farther means to help us to discover the Truth.

We have a third means which is both the amplest and most considerable, namely, Joan's Examination and Answers, of which the famous Stephen Pasquier has given us the Particulars. Pasquier says, he had Joan's original Trial four whole Years in his hands, and what he has related was faithfully extracted. But we must carefully distinguish what Pasquier says as of himself, from the Records of the Trial. He was so prejudiced in favour of Joan, that he could not help being angry with those of his Countrymen who did not believe her inspired. He says, they were worse than the English, and extremely injurious to the Honour of France. So, considering only his private Opinion, he may be said to have justly rendered himself suspected to one of the Parties. But the Trial itself is an original Piece beyond all Suspicion, since we find there Word for Word, Joan's own Answers to the Articles she was examined upon.

Monstrelet's Chronicle, the King of England's Letter to the Duke of Burgundy, and the Trial of the Maid, are the three Evidences which must be examined, in order to pass a true Judgment upon this Affair. As to the Facts dispersed in the Histories of France and England, which are not drawn from these three Fountains, I do not think they ought to be much regarded. It is evident that the Historians have copied, without any previous Examination, those that writ before them, and that several have industriously embellished their Subject, by relating more Wonders than there really were. If some are to be credited, Joan worked Miracles, foretold future Events, knew Secrets unknown to all but the King, her Heart was found whole and entire amongst the Ashes of her funeral Pile, and out of the Flames which consumed her Body, was seen to fly a white Dove, the Emblem of her Chastity. According to these Historians, Joan had the Command of the Convoy which entered Orleans, and led the Besieged to the Assault of the English Forts. By her sole Advice the Battle of Patay was fought, and to her Valour the French were indebted for their Victory. In a word, they pretend Joan did all, and leave King Charles's Generals only the Honour of following her, and fighting under her Banner. In all this they doubtless exceed the Truth. The surest way is to keep to the three forementioned Authorities, which it will be necessary to examine. I shall begin with Monstrelet, and cite some Passages of his Chronicle, essential to the Point in hand, for it would be tedious to copy all he has said concerning the Maid.

"Now in the Year abovementioned, came to the Monstrelet.
"King at Chinon where he resided, a young Damsel Vol. II.
"about twenty Years old (1), called Joan, clothed and fol. 41.
"dressed like a Man. She was born in the Parts between "Lorraine and Burgundy, at a Place called Drainy (2), "not far from Vaucouleur. This Joan was long a Servant at an Inn, and had the Courage to ride the "Horses to Water, and likewise to perform other Feats "which young Girls are not used to do. Being turned "away, she was sent to the King by a certain Knight "called Sir Robert de Baudrecount, Captain under the "King, of Vaucouleur, who furnished her with Horses,
"and four or five Attendants. She stiled herself Pucelle
"[or Maid,] inspired with divine Grace, and said she "was sent to the King to put him in possession of his "Kingdom, of which he was wrongfully deprived. She "was in a very mean Condition. She was about two "Months in the King's Palace, whom the several times
"admonished to furnish her with Men and Aid, and "she would repulse his Enemies, and exalt his Dominion.
"In the mean time, the King and his Council
"gave no great Credit to whatever she said, but took her "for a Mad-Woman, and not well in her Senses. For to "so great Princes and other Noblemen, such or the like
"Words are very doubtful and dangerous, as well on account "of the Wrath of our Lord chiefly, as of the "Slander from the Talk of the World. All her Words "were in the Name of God; and therefore many of "those that saw and heard her speak, were strongly persuaded
"she was, as she herself said, inspired by God.
"She was several times examined by notable Clerks and "other learned Men of great Authority, that her Intention "might be more fully known. But she always kept "to her Point, saying, if the King would believe her,
"she would restore him to his Dominions. When she "came before the King, there were present the Duke of "Alençon, the King's Marshal, and several Generals.
"For the King had held a Council concerning the Siege "of Orleans, and from thence went to Patiziers, and this

(1) She was then twenty seven Years of Age; for in her Examination in the Year 1431, she declared she was twenty nine Years old, consequently when she came to the King in 1429, she was twenty seven Years of Age. Rapin.

(2) It should be read Dampri. Rapin.

"Maid with him. Shortly after, the Marshal was ordered to carry Provisions and other Necessaries to Orleans. Jean would go with him, and requested she might have a Suit of Armour and Man's Cloaths, which she was furnished withal. Presently after, she set up her Standard and went to Blois, where the Rendezvous was, and from thence to Orleans with the rest. She was always completely armed. In this Expedition many came and lifted under her. And when she was arrived at Orleans, she was made very welcome, and many People were overjoyed at her coming."

This is all Montfret says of the Maid, to her Entry into Orleans. It may be observed, it was not she that commanded the Convoy, but only that she attended the Marshal with some who had lifted under her. As to the storming of the Forts, it seems at first from what he says of it, that Jean commanded in all the Sallies. But afterwards he says: "And notwithstanding that in these three Assaults, Jean is reported by common Fame to have had the chief Command, yet all or most part of the noble Knights and Captains were in them, who during the Siege, were in the City of Orleans, and behaved, each for his Part, valiantly, as Warriors ought to do on such Occasions." He does not fail however, highly to commend her Valour in several Places. For instance, speaking of the March of the French Army after the raising of the Siege of Orleans, he says: "Jean was ever in the Front before her Standard. And in all the Marches, her Fame was spread, as if there had been no other Warrior but her self."

After his Description of the Battle of Patay, he adds these Words; "and especially Jean acquired on such occasions so great Praise and Reputation, that all People imagined, the King's Enemies would be no longer able to resist her, and that shortly by her means the King would be reitored to his whole Kingdom."

In fine, not to cite too many Passages of this Author, it will suffice to observe in a word, that when he mentions the Inspiration of the Maid, he never says what he himself thinks, but always, that she called her self inspired. He is so very cautious, that in speaking what the Duke of Burgundy said to her, when he went to see her after she was taken, he pretends not to remember it, though he was himself an Ear-Witness. His Words are these: "The Duke went to see her at the Place where she was lodged, and spoke to her some Words, which I have forgot, tho' I was present." It is easy to see, the Duke's Words were Reproaches for seducing the People, and Menaces upon that account. But Montfret chuses rather to be silent, than to say any thing pro or con.

He relates moreover, that a few Days before Jean threw her self into Compiègne, she had fought a Captain of the Duke of Burgundy's called Franquet d'Arras, and having taken him Prisoner, cut off his Head. But he does not say whether justly or not, contenting himself with relating the Fact, without giving his Opinion.

When he comes at last to her Condemnation, he so expresses himself, that he does not discover his own Sentiments. He only transcribes the King of England's Letter to the Duke of Burgundy upon that occasion. As that Letter is an Original which may help to discover the Truth, it will be proper to insert it at length.

Most Dear and Well-beloved UNCLE,

"THE fervent Affection which we are sensible you have, as a true Catholick, for our Holy Mother Church, and for the Advancement of our Faith, justly exhorts and admonishes us to notify to you in writing, what, to the Honour of our said Holy Mother Church, to the strengthening of our Faith, and to the Extirpation of pestilent Errors, has been lately in this our City of Roan solemnly transacted.

"It is now well known almost every where by common Fame, how the Woman who called herself Jean the Maid, had, for above these two Years, contrary to the divine Law, and the Condition of her Sex, wandered about in Man's Clothes, a thing abominable to God, and in such Dress brought to our and your mortal Enemy; and to whom and to those of his Party, Churchmen, Nobles and Commons, she frequently intimated, she was sent from God; presumptuously boasting to have personally and visibly conversed with St. Michael, and great Numbers of Angels and Saints of Paradise, as St. Catherine and St. Margaret. By this false Intimation, and the Promise of future Victories, she turned the Hearts of many Men and Women from the Truth, to Fables and Lies. She likewise wore Arms appointed for Knights and Squires, and set up a Standard. Moreover, she demanded with great Boldness, Pride and Presumption, to bear the most excellent Arms of France, which she partly obtained, and bore in several Incursions and Assaults, as did her Brothers also, according to Report: Namely, Azure, Two Flower-de-Luces, Or, and a Sword; the Point upwards, surmounted with a Crown. In this State, she took the Field, and led Men at Arms and Archers in Bands and great Companies, to commit and exercise inhuman Cruelties, by shedding human Blood, by raising Seditions and Commotions among the People, leading them into Perjury, Rebellion, Superstition and erroneous Opinions; by disturbing all true Peace, and renewing mortal Wars; by suffering herself to be honoured and revered of many as a Saint; and by working other damnable Deeds, too tedious to relate, which however were well known in several Places, and at which almost all Christendom was offended. But God taking Pity on his faithful People, and not suffering them to remain long in Danger, nor to continue in vain, pernicious, and novel Opinions, which they had rashly embraced, has permitted, through his great Goodness and Mercy, that this Woman should be taken in your Army at the Siege you were carrying on at Compiègne, and by your good means put into our Power. And because we were immediately required by the Bishop of the Diocese where she was taken, to deliver over to him as her Ordinary Ecclesiastical Judge, this same Jean branded with the Crime of High-Treason against the Divine Majesty; we, as well out of Reverence to our Holy Mother Church, whose Ordinances we justly prefer to our own Will and Pleasure, as also for the Honour and Exaltation of our Holy Faith, delivered her to him to be brought to her Tryal, without suffering our secular Judges to take Vengeance upon her, as we might lawfully have done, considering the great Damages and Mischief, the horrible Murders, and detestable Cruelties, with innumerable other Crimes, she had committed against us and our dutiful loyal People. The Bishop joined with him the Vicar of the Inquisitor of Errors and Heresies: And calling in with them a great and notable Number of solemn Masters, and Doctors in Divinity and Canon-Law, commenced with great Solemnity and due Gravity the Process of this Jean. After he and the Inquisitor, Judges in the Cause, had for several Days examined her, they ordered her Confessions and Assertions to be maturely considered by the Masters and Doctors, and in general by all the Faculties of our most dearly beloved Daughter the University of Paris, before whom the Confessions and Assertions were laid. By their Opinion and Determination, the Judges found Jean guilty of Superstition, Witchcraft, Blasphemy against God and his Saints, Schism, and of greatly erring in the Faith of Jesus Christ. And in order to restore her to the Union and Communion of our Holy Mother Church, to cleanse her from her horrible and pernicious Crimes and Wickedness, and to preserve her Soul from eternal Damnation, she was frequently and long, very charitably and calmly admonished, to reject and cast away all her Errors; and humbly return to the Way and Paths of Truth, or otherwise she would greatly endanger both Soul and Body.

"But the most pernicious and divided Spirit of Pride and outrageous Presumption, which is always endeavouring to destroy the Union and Safety of Christians, so strongly possessed this same Jean, that notwithstanding all the holy Doctrine or Counsel, or other mild Exhortation, administered to her; her hardened and obstinate Heart would not be humbled or mollified. She still boasted, that all she had done was performed by the Command of God and the holy Virgin, who had visibly appeared to her. And what is worse, she would recognize no Judge on Earth, except God alone, and the Saints in Paradise; rejecting the Judgment of our holy Father the Pope, and of a General Council, and the Universal Church Militant. Whereupon, her Ecclesiastical Judges seeing her persevere so long, and so obstinately in her Resolution and Purpose, ordered her to be conducted to the Church, before the Clergy and People, there assembled in great Multitudes; in the presence of whom her wicked Purposes were set forth, exposed and declared, solemnly and publicly, by a notable Doctor in Divinity; to the Exaltation of our Faith, the Extirpation of Errors, the Edification and Amendment of Christian People. After that, she was charitably admonished to return to the Union of Holy Church, and reform her Faults and Errors, wherein she was hardened. And therefore, the Judges proceeded to denounce upon her, the usual and customary Sentence in such Cases. But before the Sentence was fully declared, she seemingly began to relent, crying out, she would return to Holy Church. This was readily and gladly heard by the Judges and Clergy, who

"who kindly received her, hoping by that Means, her Soul and Body would be saved from Perdition and Torment. Then she submitted to the Ordinance of Holy Church, abjured with her own Mouth her Errors and detestable Crimes, and made a publick Recantation, signing the Instrument with her own Hand. And thus, our compassionate Mother Holy Church, rejoicing over this penitent Sinner, glad to find and restore this strayed and lost Sheep, to the rest of the Fold, condemned her to do Penance in Prison. But hardly was she there, before the Fire of her Pride, which seemed to be extinguished, rekindled into pestiferous Flames by the Suggestions of the Enemy. And presently, the unfortunate Joan relapsed into her former Errors and Follies, lately abjured and recanted.

"For this reason, according to the Decrees and Orders of Holy Church, she was again publicly preached, that she might not hereafter infect the rest of the Members of Christ. And, as she was relapsed into her wonted wretched Crimes and Faults, she was delivered over to the secular Arm, and condemned to be burnt. Perceiving her end to approach, she plainly owned and confessed, that the Spirits which, she said, appeared to her several times, were evil and lying Spirits, and that their frequent Promises to free her, were false. So she acknowledged, she had been deceived and mocked by these Spirits, and pursuant to her Sentence, was carried bound to the old Market-Place in Roan, and publicly burnt in the Sight of all the People."

Before we proceed to her Trial, it will not be amiss to see a Letter, said to be sent by her, to the King of England and his Generals, before the Siege of Orleans was raised. You have it as follows, in the Words of John de Serres, a French Historian.

King of ENGLAND,

"Do Justice to the King of Heaven, in his Royal Blood. Restore to the Virgin the Keys of all the good Cities you have forced. She is come from God to demand the Blood Royal, and is ready to make Peace, if you are willing to do Justice, and restore what you have taken away. King of England, if you will not do thus, I am chief of the War. In what Place so ever I find your Men in France, I will make them depart, whether they will or no. If they will submit, I will take them to Mercy. The Virgin comes from the King of Heaven, to drive you out of France. If you will not obey, she will make such a Havock, as has not been known in France this thousand Years. And be assured, the King of Heaven will send to her and her good Men at Arms, greater strength than you can have. God in God's Name into your own Country. Perish not obstinately in your Opinion; for you shall not hold France of the King of Heaven, Son of the Holy Mary. But King Charles the right Heir shall possess it, to whom God has given it, and he shall enter Paris with a noble Train. You, William Poullet Earl of Suffolk, John Lord Talbot, Thomas Lord Scales, Lieutenants of the Duke of Bethford, and you Duke of Bethford, filling yourself Regent of France, spare innocent Blood. Leave Orleans at Liberty. If you do not Justice to those you have injured, the French will perform the noblest Exploit that ever was done in Christendom. Hear this Advice from God and the Virgin."

This Letter, writ in a prophetic Style, by a Girl who pretended to be sent from God, and appears to certain of the Future, ought to contain nothing but what was afterwards found to be exactly true. And yet, there are Predictions in it, which were never accomplished. For instance, it is not true, that she drove one single Englishman out of France. She farther affirms, she will make to great a Havock, as had not been known this thousand Years in France. These Words can relate only to the raising of the Siege of Orleans, and the Battle of Patay. But the first of these Actions has nothing in itself extraordinary. That a Garrison should make a Sally and drive the Besiegers from their Posts, is a thing too common to be reckoned a Miracle. As to the Battle of Patay, supposing Joan had commanded the French Army, which she did not, can that Action be said to deserve to be expressed in the Terms she uses? The English had only six thousand, and lost two thousand five hundred. That Defeat hardly bears any Proportion to those of the French at Creçy, Poitiers, Azincourt, the first of which, was but a hundred Years before Joan's time, and the last but thirteen or fourteen.

It is further remarkable, That in her Letter, she speaks as if she were actually at the Head of the Armies of France, since she summoned the King of England, to return her the Keys of all the Towns in his Possession. And yet, the Letter must have been writ whilst she was only upon the March, with the Convoy designed for Orleans; which, instead of commanding, she obtained, says Monstrelet, as a sort of favor, leave to accompany. I say nothing of her speaking to the King of England, as if then a grown Person, though he was but nine Years old, exhorting him not to perish in his Opinion, nor of her admonishing him to depart out of France, though he was then in England; these things may be passed over as being in a prophetic Style, and taken as to many Figures of Speech. But she should at least have known the Names of those she addressed herself to, and not have called the Earl of Suffolk, Poullet, when his Name was de la Pole. To mistake the Name of Foreigners, may be easily excused in common Persons: But I do not know whether it is pardonable in one, who pretended to speak in the Name, and by the Authority of God. These, and several other Reasons, which it would be tedious to insist upon, induce me to believe, this Letter was composed after the Event, by some Person, that knew the Maid had really writ to the King of England, or the Duke of Bethford, as we shall see presently.

Let us proceed now to the Process of Joan of Arc, as we find it in Paguiet. I say to the Process, and not to the Sentiment of that Author, who lived too long after her, for his Testimony to be of any great Weight. It suffices to say with regard to him, that he every where speaks of her with great Commendations, and believed she was really inspired, and sent from God to save France. Here follows her Examination and Answers, which I shall abridge as much as possible, without obscuring the Sense.

In the first Place, being charged to speak the Truth, she replied, she would say what concerned her Father and Mother, but not disclose the Revelations she had told King Charles, though in eight Days she should know whether she might or no.

To the second Question, concerning her Name and Family, she answered, she was of the Village of Dompré, was called in her own Country Jeannette, but in France, Joan of Arc. That her Father's Name was James of Arc, and her Mother's Jibella, &c.

That she was then about twenty nine Years old.

That she was by Trade a Seamstress and Spinster, and not a Shepherdess.

That she went every Year to Confession.

That she frequently heard a Voice from Heaven, and in the Place where she heard it, saw also a Light, which she took for an Angel. That the Voice had often warned her to go into France, and raise the Siege of Orleans. That she should go to Robert de Baudricourt, Captain of Fauconburg, who would give her a Guard to conduct her, which she did accordingly.

She added, she knew, God loved the Duke of Orleans, and she had received more Revelations concerning him, than any Person living, except the King.

Item. She confessed she was engaged in a Skirmish before Paris, on a Holy-day, and being asked whether that was Right, she answered, Go on.

Being asked when she heard the Voice last, she replied, Yesterday, three times; in the Morning; at the time of Vespers; and when the Ave Maria Bell rung in the Evening.

Being asked, whether she had ever seen any Fairies, she answered, No; but that one of her God-Mothers pretended to have seen some at the Fairy-Tree, near the Village of Dompré.

Being examined who they were that spoke to her, she answered, St. Catherine, and St. Margaret, and she had frequently seen and touched them since she was in Prison, and kissed the Ground on which they trod. Moreover, that she consulted them about her Answers.

She said further, she had put on Man's Cloaths by the express Command of God, and was wounded in the Neck before Orleans.

Item. That, within seven Years, the English should leave a greater Pledge than that before Orleans, and lose all they possessed in France.

That they should sustain in France a much greater Loss, than what they had yet done, by means of a great Victory, which the French should gain over them.

Being asked, whether she bore any Coat of Arms, she answered, No, but only her Standard. That it was true, the King had given her Brothers a Coat of Arms; namely, in a Field Azure, two Flower-de-luces, Or, and a Crown in the Middle.

She added, that her Father dreamt she would go with the Soldiers, and for that Reason kept her short, and said, he had rather see her drowned.

Then she was charged with throwing herself headlong from the Tower, in order to kill herself, whilst she was Prisoner at Beauvoir. She confessed the Fact, but said, her Design was not to kill herself, but make her Escape.

Whilst her Process was in hand, she desired leave to hear Mass, and communicate at Easter. This was granted her, upon Condition she would put on Women's Clothes; but she chose rather not to communicate, than do it on that Condition.

She was taxed with suffering herself to be worshipped; but she replied, if some People had kissed her Hand, or Clothes, it was without her Consent.

After these Answers, came several others, which give occasion to believe, they were made to as many Interrogations, suppressed by Pasquier. And are as follow:

That she had talked with St. Catherine and St. Margaret, at the Fairy-Tree, and not with the Fairies, as she had been accused. That she began at thirteen Years of Age to converse with these Saints.

That at twenty Years old, she hired herself at Neuchâtel in Lorraine, to a Woman that kept an Inn, called La Rouffe, and there led the Beasts to Grass, and watered the Horses, and so learned to ride.

That whilst she was there, she had a Law-Suit about a Marriage, before the Official of Thoul, and carried her Cause.

That after serving five Years, she returned to her Father, and, against his Will, went to Baudricourt, who made no Account of her for the two first Months, but in the third gave her a Guard of twenty Knights, a Squire, and four Servants, to conduct her to Chinon, where the King was.

The Judges earnestly pressing her to put on Woman's Apparel: She replied, she desired to have none of her Sex's Clothes, but a Shift after she was dead.

Whereupon she was told, she should be received to Communion only in Women's Clothes; but she refused to comply with that Condition. However, she consented at last to take a Woman's Habit to hear Mass, provided she should be allowed to put on Man's Clothes again. But as that favour was refused her, she declared, she would rather die than be dressed like a Woman, contrary to God's express Command.

She said likewise, she had promised the King to raise the Siege of Orleans, and cause him to be crowned.

She was taxed with being always against a Peace; which she owned, affirming, there could be no Peace concluded, unless the English would leave France.

The Proctor charging her with causing a Sword to be concealed in St. Catherine's Church at Fierbois, and sending for the same, after she had talked with the King, she denied she had ever used any Frauds. She owned however, she had heard three Masses in that Church.

Upon being accused of saying, she was sent from God to wage War, which was directly contrary to the Will of God; she answered, that in the Letter sent by her to the King of England and the Princes of the Blood, she had first offered them Peace. Pasquier says, the Letter is copied in the Trial. But as he thought not proper to transcribe it himself, one cannot be sure it is the same inserted by de Serres in his History.

Upon being charged with putting to Death Franquet d'Arras her Prisoner; she replied, he was a known Robber, and condemned to die by the Bailiff of Sens.

Upon the Charge of having several times communicated in Man's Clothes, and kneeled to the Voice which spoke to her; She confessed it all.

The Proctor accused her also of having seduced many People to such a degree, that they revered her as a Saint, caused Prayers to be said in the Church to her Honour, maintained that, next to the Holy Virgin, she was the greatest of Saints, and wore about them her Image in Lead, or other Metal. To this Charge she replied, that God should be Judge.

Upon the Accusation of usurping Dominion over Men, by making herself Chief of the War, she answered, she had done it to beat the English. Adding, her Standard was of Linen or Fustian, bordered with Velvet, with a Field semee of Fleur-de-lis, and in the middle, the Image of God holding the World, supported by two Angels in white, and underneath, Jesu Maria.

Whereupon her Judges upbraided her, that she was in the wrong to ascribe unto God such Vanities, contrary to the Reverence due to him, and asked her, whether she put her Confidence in her Standard; to which she replied, she placed her Confidence only in him whose Image it bore.

After this she was asked, why she held alone her Standard at the Coronation of King Charles. She answered it was but just, that he who had been in Trouble, should be likewise in Glory.

She was farther told, that being wounded before Paris, she caused her Armour to be hung up in the Church of St. Dennis, out of Ostentation: She replied, she did it from a Motive of Piety, according to the Custom of those that were wounded in War.

Lastly, She was asked, if she would submit to the Judgment of the Church Militant. She answered, she would, provided the Church did not enjoin her what was impracticable. That she could not in any wise revoke what she had said concerning her Visions and Revelations, and if the Church affirmed they were Illusions, in that case, she would not refer it to the Judgment of Men, but to God alone.

The Examination being ended, the Judges drew a Summary of her Confessions. Containing,

I. That being thirteen Years old, she saw St. Michael, St. Catherine, St. Margaret, and a great Company of Angels.

II. That these Saints advised her to go to King Charles, and to wear Mens Clothes.

III. That she chose rather not to hear Mass, and communicate, than put on Women's Apparel.

IV. That she refused to submit to the Judgment of the Church-Militant.

V. That she pretended to foretell future Contingencies.

VI. That she knew Saints by their Voices, whom she had never seen or heard before.

VII. That she was expressly commanded by God to wear Men's Clothes.

VIII. That she cast herself headlong from a Tower, chusing rather to die than remain in the Hands of her Enemies.

IX. That she not only saw and heard, but likewise touched bodily St. Catherine, and St. Margaret, and kissed the Ground on which they trod.

The Proctor having taken his Conclusions upon these Articles, it was said by the Judges, That what Jean de Arc had done, was all a Cheat, and the Invention of the Devil, to delude the poor People: That she was guilty of Disobedience to her Parents, and of Idolatry, to the Dishonour of the Church; particularly, for chusing rather to deprive herself of the Body of our Lord, than lay aside Men's Clothes. At this Sentence were present the Bishops of Coutance and Lisieux, the Chapter of the Cathedral of Rouen, sixteen Doctors, six Licentiates, or Batchelors in Divinity, and eleven Advocates of Rouen.

This Sentence being sent to the University of Paris, was confirmed by the Faculties of Divinity and the Decrees, and Jean pronounced Heretic and Schismatick. Then the University writ to the King and the Bishop of Bayeux, to desire the might be put to death. It does not appear in Pasquier, to what Punishment she was condemned by this first Sentence. All that can be said, is, she was at least excommunicated. However that be, Jean being carried into the Church, and placed on a Scaffold, was publicly preached, as it was called in those Days. All these Preparations striking her with great Dread, she cried out aloud, She would submit to the Judgment of God and the Pope. But finding what she said was not sufficient to revoke her Sentence, or stop the Publication, she declared, She would stand to the Church's Determination: That since so many wise and learned Men affirmed, her Visions came not from God, she was willing to believe so too, which she repeated several times. Then she made a publick Abjuration, inserted in the Trial, but Pasquier thought not fit to give the Contents.

Upon this Abjuration, another Sentence intervened, absolving her from the Bond of Excommunication, and condemning her to perpetual Imprisonment by way of Penance. After that, she put on Women's Apparel. But as she had all along been very obstinate to Men's Clothes, which she wore, as she said, by God's express Command, it was thought proper to try whether her Abjuration was sincere, by leaving a Man's Habit with her in Prison. This Expedient, to try her Misfortune, succeeded but too well, since she was no sooner alone, than she resumed this same Habit. On the Morrow, being found in that Dress, she was asked the Reason: To which she answered, She had put on her former Habit by the express Order of St. Catherine and St. Margaret, and had rather obey God than Man. Whereupon, an Information was entered against her in the Ecclesiastical Court, and she was declared an Heretic Relapse, and delivered over to the secular Arm. Pasquier says nothing of her Confession, according to the King of England's Letter, that she was seduced by lying Spirits, who had promised to set her free. Indeed, this Confession is directly contrary to the Inferences Pasquier would draw from the Records of the Trial, namely, that Jean was inspired by God. He only says, she was sentenced to be burnt, May the 31st, 1431. But as all the rest of the Facts, Facts, mentioned in the King's Letter, exactly agree with the Records of the Process. I do not see why Pasquier's Silence should cause this to be questioned.

One might make numberless Reflections upon the Examination, Answers, and Behaviour of the Maid. But not to tire the Reader's Patience, I shall content myself with the following Remarks.

1. It is certain, Pasquier's View in what he has related of this Trial, was, to prove Jean's Inspiration. And therefore, prejudiced as he was, he made no scruple to curtail in several Places, the Questions and Answers. This manifestly appears, in that several of the Answers have no Connection with the Questions, nor with one another. For Instance, what she says in her Answer to the second Question, concerning the Duke of Orleans, necessarily supposes some other Question, which Pasquier was pleased to omit.

2. It appears, that he has passed over in Silence some of the Answers. For Example, it is said in the Summary of Jean's Confession, that she had boasted of seeing St. Michael, and yet it is not mentioned in the Examination.

3. Pasquier would not transcribe Jean's Letter to the King of England, or her Abjuration: Papers however of no less Importance, than all he has produced. Much more unwilling was he to mention her Confession before she died, that she was seduced or deceived. These Omissions gave occasion to presume, that Pasquier sought in Jean's Trial, not so much what might be of service to discover the Truth, as what he believed conducive to prove his Opinion. And indeed, he multiplies Words, to draw from Jean's Answers Consequences favorable to his Notion, and to shew, that her Predictions were fulfilled, and her Assertions all true. He labours chiefly to prove, by very weak Arguments, that the Duke of Orleans was, as the Maid affirmed, greatly beloved of God. Among other Reasons, he alleges this: That God had blessed that Prince with two illustrious Sons, the one, legitimate, afterwards King of France, by the Name of Louis XII., the other Natural, namely, the great General, known first by the Name of the Bastard of Orleans, and afterwards by that of Earl of Dunois and Longueville. But every one knows, this last was natural Brother, and not Son of the Duke of Orleans, mentioned by Jean. It is surprising that a Man so versed as Pasquier in the History of France, should be guilty of so gross a Mistake.

Having related such Facts concerning the Maid, as cannot be denied, since they are supported by incontestable Testimonies, nothing more remains, but to examine the three Opinions upon this Affair, in order to embrace the most probable.

Most of the French Writers maintain, that Jean was really inspired, and sent by God, and found their Opinion upon these four principal Reasons. The first is, the Possibility of God's working such Miracles. But this Point may be granted them, and yet they not able to draw any Inference from the Possibility, for the Truth of the Fact.

The second is, Jean's own Evidence, grounded upon her Visions of Saints and Angels. But this is the very Thing in question, and consequently cannot be urged as a Proof.

The third Reason is taken from her knowing King Charles in disguise, among his Courtiers. This does not deserve notice. Supposing, as a great many believe, that Jean was persuaded to act this part, it is easy to conceive, she might be very well instructed to know the King, tho' she had never seen him before.

The fourth is founded upon the accomplishment of her Prediction, of the raising of the Siege of Orleans, and the King's Coronation, at a time when these Events were extremely improbable. This Reason, added to her uncommon Valour on all Occasions, is doubtless, the strongest that can be alleged for this Opinion. However, the Objections this Argument is liable to, very much weaken, if not wholly destroy it.

First, It may be objected, it is the herself, who said in her Examination, and after the Event, that she had foretold to the King, the raising of the Siege of Orleans, and his Coronation. We have observed, that Montfret does not make her speak so precisely. He only makes her say to the King in general Terms, That she would exalt his Dominion, and drive his Enemies out of the Kingdom; which however she did not perform, since the English were not expelled out of France, till above twenty Years after her Death.

Moreover, Jean says in her Examination, these two Things were revealed to her by St. Catherine and St. Margaret. I do not mean to consider here, all the Objections that may be made to this Circumstance. I am willing to suppose, God reveals sometimes to the glorified Saints what is to happen upon Earth; that he commands them to assume a human Shape, to inform certain Persons thereof, and that Catherine and Margaret were of the Number of those glorified Saints, though it cannot be affirmed with Certainty. But it must be owned, at least, that God very rarely makes use of such means, and when he does, it is always for his own Glory, or the Good of his Church, or in favour of some Persons very eminent for their Holiness. Now, in the War which was then waging in France, neither the Glory of God, nor the Honour of Religion, nor the Good of the Church were directly concerned: And Charles VII., for whose sake, according to the Supposition, God did do great Things, was far from being famous for Holiness of Life. The Dispute between the two Kings, and the two Parties, was purely about Temporal Concerns. They both professed the same Religion, and could not tax one another either with Schism or Heresy. It does not therefore appear, wherein it could be for the Glory of God, or the Advantage of Religion or the Church, that the Realm of France should be governed by a Prince of the House of Valois, rather than by a King of England, defended by a Daughter, from the Blood Royal of France. A Man may affirm, as much as he pleases, that the Usurpation of the English was so heinous and manifest, that God's Honour was concerned to make them an Example of his Justice. This is supposing the Thing in question. One need only read what has been said upon this Point in the Reign of Edward III., to be satisfied, that the Supposition is not so manifest as is pretended, but is liable to great Difficulties. However, though it were undeniable, that the English were real Usurpers, can it be affirmed, that God's Honour is concerned, to punish in an exemplary and supernatural manner, the heinous Injustices committed in the World? How many Usurpations of Provinces and Kingdoms are to be met with in History, without the Intervention of a Miracle to punish the Usurpers? In fine, Charles VII., or his Successors do not appear to have done Religion any Service, to make it presumed, that God had it in view, in what he did by Jean's means. Besides the French, in those Days were no better Christians, nor honest Men than the English. As for the Person of King Charles VII., for whose sake, it is pretended, God miraculously raised up the Maid, all knew him to have been very immoral. To say nothing of the Duke of Burgundy's Murder, committed by his Order, and in his Presence, contrary to the Faith of a Treaty ratified with an Oath, is it not certain, that at the very time Jean came to him at Chinon, he lived in open Adultery with Agnes Sorel, in the Eyes of his whole Court? Are they Princes of this Character, whom God usually honours with particular Favours? If to all these Reasons be added Jean's Confession before her Death, that she was deceived, there will be room to be satisfied, she was not really inspired. But I insist not on this Confession, because it is a disputable Point, as being supported only by the Testimony of her Adversaries.

I come now to the Opinion of the English, who obstinately maintain, that Jean of Arc was a Witch, and acted only by the Insigations of the Devil. I shall only briefly observe, that this Opinion is liable to the very same Objections as the foregoing, since it is no less difficult to conceive, why, upon this Occasion, God should have given such Power to the Devil. So whatever has been said concerning her Inspiration, may be applied to her Witchcraft, and retorted upon the English.

But there is a third Opinion, which is not liable to so many Difficulties. If it is supposed, that in King Charles's extreme Distress, himself, his Queen, Agnes Sorel, or some one of his Ministers, invented this Contrivance; nothing will be more easy than to reconcile the Events with such a Supposition. The Business was to revive the Courage of the French, disheartened by so many Losses, and perhaps, of the King himself, who was thinking of retiring into Dauphiné. Is it any wonder, that such an Artifice should be used for that purpose? This is at least as possible as the Apparitions of Saints, or as Witchcraft. A Country Girl of good Sense, (as there are many) of an undaunted Courage, and who knew how to ride, may have been chosen. She may have been taken from out of the Kingdom, that she might be the less known, and impertinent Neighbours not obstruct, by discovering her, the Execution of the Project. This being supposed, it will be easy to account for most of the Things, which appear extraordinary in the Maid. All the King says of her, and the Secrets she discloses, will be only a Consequence of the Cheat. Those that are in the Plot will not fail to extol her, and the rest will be carried away by their Authority.

It must not however be concealed, that strong Objections may be made to this third Opinion, which it will be proper to answer.

The first is, that it is only a Conjecture. I own it: But it is a very natural Conjecture in a thing, where it is so difficult to discover the Truth. The French say, she was inspired by God. This Notion is demonstrated to be full of Difficulties, and highly improbable. The English affirm, she was a Witch, and acted by the Instigation of the Devil! This is no less hard to conceive. It is however certain, she performed great Actions. What remains therefore, in order to explain the Cause of the Revolution in France, but to have recourse to natural means, since the supernatural are so doubtful, not to say worse? In my opinion, this is a case, where, if ever, Conjecture is to take Place.

English

The second Objection is taken from Jean's uncommon Valour, which is represented as supernatural. To this it may be answered, much more was certainly ascribed to her than she deserved, as appears by the Testimony of Montfret a contemporary Writer. A Man must be very ignorant of the Way of the World, not to know how apt we are, on such Occasions, to run into Excesses, and how capable such a Subject is of Imbellishment. It does not appear, by what Montfret says, That Jean ever commanded in Chief. If this Author seems to say it in one Place, he unsays it in another, as may be seen in the Passages above-cited. It is true, the Generals carried her with them, and placed her at their Head to confirm the Soldiers Prepossession. So, she had only to shew Resolution enough to keep always near them, and such a Resolution cannot be accounted Miraculous. And if the Glory of all the happy Successes were ascribed to her, where is the wonder, since it was for the Advantage of the King, and all his Adherents?

The third Objection is the strongest, grounded upon the accomplishment of Jean's Predictions. She told the King, she would cause the Siege of Orleans to be raised, and himself to be crowned; which fell out accordingly. On Supposition therefore, that the whole was a Contrivance, it must be supposed withal, that she had the Gift of Prophecy.

To this Objection, it may be replied in the first Place, that the Assurance, wherewith the French Historians have advanced, that these Predictions were before the Event, is what gives it the most Strength. But it must be observed, that of the two Articles, namely, the raising of the Siege of Orleans, and the King's Coronation at Rheims, the first only is attested by Jean herself in her Examination, without any mention of the Coronation. In the next place, this same Attestation comes after the Event; neither can it be well proved, that when she waited on the King, she gave him any Assurance of raising the Siege of Orleans. As Montfret relates it, Charles does not seem to have relied on her Promises, when he undertook to send a Convoy to Orleans. Montfret says, he was resolved to send a Convoy to that City, and that Jean desired to accompany it, which was granted her. Certainly, if that Design had been formed solely upon her Promises, she would have had no occasion to desire to be present at the Execution, since in that Case, she would have been the principal Actress.

But secondly, though Jean had foretold what is ascribed to her, I do not know whether that will be a convincing Proof. Upon supposition that she was persuaded to act this Part, and had her Lesson given her beforehand, nothing was more natural than to make her tell the King, she was commissioned to raise the Siege of Orleans. This Siege was then the Cause of Uneasiness to the King and the whole Court. It was not known which way to save that important Place, and consequently, to give hopes of raising the Siege was requisite, in order to create a Belief of Jean's coming from God. Herein nothing was hazarded but the Reputation of a Country Girl, which would not have been regarded, had the Affair proved unsuccessful. As to the King's Coronation, the hopes of that was likewise necessary to be instilled, since the raising the Siege was but a means to attain the chief End, which was to establish the King on the Throne of his Ancestors.

In the third Place, to Jean's Predictions a very perplexing Objection may be made. If she was inspired by God to foretell the future, how came she to be mistaken? She said, she would drive the English out of the Kingdom, and yet they were not driven out till above twenty Years after her Death. She foretold, they would be expelled by a great Victory gained over them by the French. Does not this raise the Idea of a bloody Battle, and an extraordinary Victory? But where is this Victory to be found after Jean's Death? There is only that of Fournivini, which happened twenty Years after, and was, as I observed, very inconsiderable. She foretold likewise in her Examination, that within seven Years, the English should leave a greater Pledge than that before Orleans. I don't understand that Expression, unless it means the Loss of some Battle. But there was no Battle within that Term. Let us however give the Words the most favorable Sense we can, and understand them, if you please, of the Loss of Paris. But this Event happened five Years after the Prediction. Is it usual for the Holy Ghost to mark thus the Space of seven Years instead of five? Was it more difficult for him to foresee this Event would happen in five, than in seven, Years?

Thus, all things considered, let the Difficulties of the third Opinion be compared with those that arise from the Apparitions of Saints and Witchcraft, and I imagine, they will be found to be less in this than in the two other Opinions.

Besides, the Inspiration of the Maid was not so generally owned by the French themselves, but that several questioned it. The Constable Richemont being upon the March to join the King before Baugenci, the King preposessed that he was coming with some ill Design, resolved at first to go and fight him. But altering his Mind, he sent Jean to meet and receive him. As soon as she saw him, she alighted, and embraced his Knee: Whereupon the Constable said these Words to her, which plainly shew what he thought of her: Joan, I am told you design to fight me, I neither know who you are, nor from whom you are sent, whether from God or the Devil. If you come from God, I have no reason to fear you, for he knows my Intention as well as yours. If you are from the Devil, I have less reason to fear, and therefore do your best or your worst.

The Lord of Langcy, in his Treatise of military Institution, says, that Jean's Inspiration was like Numa's pretended Conversations with the Nymph Egeria.

Others have affirmed, she was persuaded to act this Part by the Lords of the Court. Du Haillan was of this Opinion, who even relates several Circumstances, and then adds, Some have taken it ill that I say this, and put the French out of conceit with so holy and miraculous a Thing, by endeavouring now to turn it into Fable. But I was willing to say it, because Time, which discovers all Things, has discovered this to be a Cheat. Besides, it is not a Thing of that Moment as to be received for an Article of Faith.

Pope Pius II, under the Name of Godelin his Secretary, after relating the Story of Jean and her Exploits, adds, It is very difficult to affirm, whether this was the Work of God, or the Invention of Man. Some think, the great Men at Court contending for the Command, sent one more wise than the rest invented this Contrivance, and persuaded Joan to say she was sent from God, that none might scruple to serve under her.

In fine, there are French Writers who have defamed Jean of Arc, and said, she was corrupted by Baudricourt, or according to others by the Bastard of Orleans, or by Xaintrailles, and that these three Lords, with the Duke of Alençon, contrived the whole Plot. Polydore Virgil says, when Jean found she was condemned, she pretended to be with Child, and for that reason her Execution was delayed for some Months. In a word, among all the Historians both antient and modern, who have spoken of the Maid, there are no two to be found that agree in the Facts concerning her.

But, supposing Jean's Inspiration to be a human Invention, it is not easy to determine, whether the King was in the Secret, or was himself cheated. It may be Jean herself was deceived, by certain Means but too frequently practised. For my part, I think this Opinion very plausible, considering the Firmness wherewith she answered her Judges, when the mult have perceived her great Danger. But after all, this is only Conjecture.

I conclude this Inquiry, that Jean's pretended Inspiration may justly be deemed a Contrivance to revive the Courage of the terrified French. It is true, the Project succeeded doubtless beyond the Expectation of the Authors. However, it is not very strange, the Courage of the French Troops should be revived, when they thought to fight under the particular Direction of Heaven. This is not the first time that such Invention has produced the like Effect. We meet with Instances in the Histories of the Heathen Nations. The feigned Apparitions of the Pagan Gods and Goddesses, were not certainly the immediate Works of the Power of God, and yet, upon some Occasions, they produced wonderful Effects.

Before I close this Subject, I cannot help reflecting on the Barbarity exercised upon Jean. It is not possible to give any colour to this Injustice. As Jean was not a Native of France, Henry could not pretend she was his Subject, and consequently could treat her only as a Prisoner of War. Upon this Supposition, he could much less punish her for a Schismatick, Heretic, or Witch, tho' she had been convicted. If the Rule which the English would then have established, was once received, every Prisoner of War would be in danger of being condemned by his Enemies for forged Crimes, and sacrificed to their Malice. Charles VII caused the Sentence to be reversed by other judges, and Jean's Honor to be retrieved, which by several is alleged in proof of her Innocence. But this is a weak Argument, since, without strong Prejudice, the last Sentence can be no more depended upon than the first. This was passed by her Enemies, whose Interest it was to defame her, and the other by her Friends, who found their Glory and Advantage in proving her innocent.

EDWARD was proclaimed the 5th of March, and on the 12th or 13th of the same Month, he was obliged to put himself at the Head of his Army. Before his Departure from London, a Tradesman was executed, for saying, he would make his Son Heir of the Crown (1). Probably, he added some contemptuous Words against the new

King, and expressed too much Zeal for the House of Lancaster. However this be, some have considered this Man's Execution, in the beginning of this Reign, as a Pre-fage of the Blood which was yet to be shed, in the Quarrel of the two contending Houses.

Queen Margaret had acted with Prudence, in not hazarding a Battle at the Gates of London, and in retiring among the northern People, who had hitherto appeared firmly attached to the House of Lancaster. They even gave her, upon this occasion, a sensible Mark of their Affection, by strengthening her Army with Recruits, nay, whole Bodies of fresh Troops. This was done with such Expedition, that in a few Days the Queen saw herself at the Head of sixty thousand Men, in condition to expect her Enemy, or even to march against him.

Though Edward had been proclaimed at London, he was very sensible, that Ceremony made no great addition to his Right, considering how irregularly it was performed. The Nobles of his Party, and the People of London, were not invested with Power to give the Kingdom a Sovereign: And therefore, he could not depend upon that extraordinary Election, unless it was supported with Force. Henry VI had reigned thirty eight Years, acknowledged for lawful King by all the English; and yet this Right, which seemed so well established, had not been able to maintain itself against a superior Strength. It was therefore easy to see, that Edward's Right, which had not greater Advantages, would subsist no longer than crowned with Success. Matters standing thus, the two Parties were once more to try the way of Arms. Happy Both, if one single Battle could have decided this bloody Quarrel! Edward being young and lively, trusted to his Courage and Fortune. He was likewise excited to venture all, by the great Men of his Party, who having shewn so little regard for Henry, saw no safety but in Victory. He departed therefore from London a few Days after being proclaimed (2), and heading his Army, marched towards the North, with a Resolution to go in quest of Queen Margaret.

As soon as he was come to Pontefract, he detached the Lord Fitz-Walter (3), to secure the Passage of Ferri-bridge, upon the River Aire, which was necessarily to be passed, in order to join his Enemies. Fitz-Walter succeeded according to the King's Desires, and posted himself on the other side of the River with his Detachment. In the mean time Henry and his Queen, who were at York, hearing that Edward was marching with all speed, readily concluded, it was to give them Battle. This was what they themselves earnestly wished, since the gaining of a Victory was the only Means left for their Restoration. They made therefore the Duke of Somerset General of their Army, and waited at York the Issue of a Battle, which was to determine their Fate.

(1) Meaning only, as it is said, his own House, which had the Sign of the Crown. Rapin, not understanding the Jest, says, it was for saying, he would make his Son Prince of Wales. The Man's Name was Walter Walker, a Grocer in Chancery. Halington, p. 43.

(2) Having with him, John Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, William Nevill Lord Sausbridge, Sir John and Henry Ratcliffe, Sir John Wenlock, John Stauf, Roger Walsingham, &c. Stow, p. 435.

(3) There was at this time no Lord Fitz-Walter: For Walter Lord Fitz-Walter died in 1433; and Sir John Ratcliffe, Son of Ann, Daughter of the said Lord Fitz-Walter, had not summons to Parliament till the 16th of Henry VII. This Sir John, or his Son, is probably the same, whom Rapin, and others, call Sir H. Ratcliffe, call by Anticipation Lord Fitz-Walter. See Dugdale's Barons, Vol. II. p. 223; and Vol. II. p. 285.

1461. The Duke of Somerſet hearing Edward had ſecured the Paſſage of Ferribridge, did not doubt that it was with intention to fight; and to oblige him to do it with Diſadvantage, reſolved to diſlodge Fitz-Walter, in order to have the River between him and his Enemies. Purſuant to this Reſolution, the Lord Clifford was detached to recover the Poſt ſeized by Fitz-Walter. Whether Fitz-Walter was guilty of any Neglect, or was not timely ſupported, he could not withſtand Clifford's Attack, who drove his Troops over the River with great Slaughter. Fitz-Walter, and the Baſtard of Salisbury (1), were ſlain in the Action.

The Earl of Warwick, of whom I have had frequent Occaſion to ſpeak towards the end of the late Reign, was conſidered as the Soul of Edward's Army. The King was looked upon as a Valiant young Prince, without Experience, and the Earl of Warwick, as the real General. Accordingly, all Eyes were fixed upon him, to ſee by his Countenance whether there was Reaſon to hope or fear. The News of Fitz-Walter's Deſeat being brought to the Earl, he ſeemed to be under great Conſternation, dreading, this firſt Check would diſcourage the Army. He immediately poſted to inform the King, with an Emotion, that plainly diſcovered how apprehenſive he was of the Conſequences. But withal, to ſhew his Fears were not perſonal, he ſtabbed his Horſe, and kiſſing the Hilt of his Sword, made like a Croſs, ſwore that though the whole Army ſhould take to Flight, he would alone defend the King's Cauſe.

Edward perceiving the Earl's Concern, judged it neceſſary to prevent the ill Effects it might produce among the Troops. Inſtead therefore of being alarmed at the News, he made Proclamation, that all who deſired it, might depart: That he would reward thoſe that ſhould do their Duty; but there was no favour to be expected for thoſe that ſhould fly, during the Battle. At the ſame time, he detached William Nevil, Lord Fauconbridge, to paſs the Aſe at Caſtleford, about three Miles from Ferribridge, with Orders to attack thoſe who guarded the Poſt lately loſt. Fauconbridge executed his Orders, with ſuch Secrecy and Expedition, that he paſſed the River at Caſtleford, before the Enemies had the leaſt Notice. Then marching along the River, he met Clifford at the Head of a Body of Horſe, ſuddenly attacked him; and put him to Rout. Clifford was ſlain with an Arrow in the beginning of the Fight, too light a Punishment for his inhumanity to the young Earl of Rutland, Brother of Edward, at the Battle of Wakefield. With him was killed likewiſe, the Earl of Westmoreland's Brother. The Poſt of Ferribridge being thus fortunately recovered, Edward, who kept himſelf ready, paſſed his Army over the River, and immediately marched in queſt of his Enemies.

The two Armies met on Palm-Sunday (2), between Saxton and Taunton (3), where they drew up. Henry's Army was ſixty thouſand ſtrong, and Edward's about forty thouſand (4). The Air was darkened by the Snow, which fell very thick, and was blown by the Wind in the Faces of the Lancſtrians. Theſe laſt began the Fight with a Volley of Arrows, which being diſcharged too far off, did no great Execution (5). Fauconbridge, who commanded the Van of Edward's Army (6), diſdaining to fight at ſuch a Diſtance, ordered his Men to lay by their Bows and take to their Swords. Whereupon, the Armies approaching one another began a furious Fight, where in both Sides ſeemed equally brave and reſolute, to exert their utmoſt to gain the Victory. It would be very difficult to deſcribe this terrible Battle at large; moſt of thoſe that have mentioned it, not underſtanding the Art of War, have, inſtead of repreſenting the ſeveral Circumſtances, given only a confuſed Idea thereof. Beſides, the two Armies are to be conſidered, as truſting more to their Courage, than the Experience of their Generals. It will ſuffice to obſerve, that the Battle laſted from Morning (7) to Night; and from thence, it may be judged, how obſtinately it was fought on both Sides. Edward ſignalized himſelf by an uncommon Valour, which did not a little contribute to maintain his Troops in their Reſolution of conquering or dying for his ſake. At length, the Lancſtrians began, towards the Evening, to give ground, not flying, but retreating as they fought, and making a ſtand now and then, ſo that their Enemies could not be entirely ſure of the Victory. However, this Advantage encouraging Edward's Soldiers to make freſh Efforts, they preſſed their Enemies, that at laſt they forced them to fly. Then it was that a dreadful Slaughter enſued. Edward had, before the Battle, made Proclamation in his Army, that no Quarter ſhould be given, well knowing, the taking of Prifoners would but weaken his Army. The flying Troops ſhaped their Courſe towards Tadcaſter Bridge, but deſpairing to reach it, becauſe they were ſo hotly purſued by their Enemies, they turned aſide, in order to paſs the Cock, which runs into the Wharfe. This was done with ſuch Confuſion and Hurry, that the River was immediately full of thoſe that were drowned, and who, in their Miſfortune, ſerved for a Bridge to their Companions. The Slaughter is ſaid to have been to great in this Place, that the Waters of the Wharfe were all dyed with the Blood. And indeed, it is not to be thought ſtrange, ſince the Hiſtorians affirm, no leſs than thirty fix thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy fix were killed in the Battle. Among the Dead, were found the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland (8), the Lords Dacres and Wells, Sir John Nevil, and Andrew Trollop. The Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter had the happineſs to eſcape. Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonſhire was taken. He was at firſt ſpared, notwithstanding the King's Orders, but it was only to put him to a more inglorious Death on the Scaffold.

An Italian Author (9), who wrote the Hiſtory of theſe Civil Wars, makes this remark on the Battle of Taunton: That if France or Scotland had then invaded England, the Kingdom would, doubtleſs, have been ſubdued, in its weak Condition, after ſo violent a Bleeding. This might have been the Caſe, and the Example of France, which in much the ſame Circumſtances was almoſt entirely conquered by Henry V. gives weight to this Reflection. But however, the Battles, fought before the Quarrel between the two Houſes was decided, ſhew there was ſtill much Engliſh Blood to be ſhed before it was poſſible to give England a mortal Wound.

After this ſignal Victory, Edward marched directly to York, perhaps in expectation of finding Henry and Margaret. But as after the Loſs of the Battle they could not hope for Safety at York, they choſe to retire to Berwick, and from thence fled for Refuge to Edinburgh. Upon his Arrival at York, Edward ordered the Heads of the Duke, his Father, and the Earl of Salisbury to be taken down, and thoſe of the Earl of Devonſhire and ſome others, beheaded at Pontefract (10), to be ſet up in their room. He ſtayed ſome time at York, to take meaſures for the Defence of the Borders, in caſe the Scots ſhould think of making an Incurſion. But as he perceived, though they had ſuch a Deſign, they were not yet ready to execute it, he believed there would be no great Danger in returning to London, where he arrived the 8th of June.

All appearing quiet in England ſince the Victory of Taunton, Edward would no longer defer his Coronation, which was fixed to the 20th of June (11). Whiſt the Preparations were making, he conſidered how to guard againſt Scotland, from whence he foreſaw the fugitive King and Queen might have Aſſiſtance. For that purpoſe, he fought means to find the Scots Employment, that ſhould hinder them from meddling with their Neighbour's Affairs. To this he was likewiſe induced by the Solicitations of the Earl of Douglafs, who had taken refuge in England ſeveral Years ſince. But for the better Underſtanding how Matters then ſtood between England and Scotland, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate the then Situation of that Kingdom.

Scotland had been for ſome time rent with dangerous Factions, which began with the Reign of James II. That Prince not being above ſeven Years old when the King his Father was murdered, Archibald Douglafs pretended to the Regency, but the States not thinking proper to truſt ſo powerful a Perſon with the Adminiſtration of Affairs, made Alexander Levingſton Regent, and William Greigton Chancellor. Theſe two Barons immediately formed two Parties, which would have divided all Scotland; if the Earl of Douglafs had not had a third, which Sworn Enemy of the Regent and Chancellor, he showed in all his Proceedings that he was labouring the Destruction of both, in order to establish himself upon their Ruins. This obliged them for their Interest, to unite against their common Enemy. Some time after, they found means to draw him to the Assembly of the States, upon the Assurance of a Safe-Conduct, notwithstanding which, they caused his Head to be struck off. Beatrice his Daughter inherited his Estate, and James his Brother his Title. But James died two Years after, leaving William his Son head of that powerful Family.

William was no less proud and ambitious than his Predecessors. He so well gained the young King's Confidence, who began to look into his Affairs, that he became his prime Minister and Favorite. When he saw his Credit sufficiently established, he attacked the two Heads of the opposite Factions, and forced Livingston to retire from Court. He met with stronger Opposition from Craighorn. But however this be, he so abused his Power, and acted so arbitrarily, that he put People to Death, not only by his own Authority, but even contrary to the King's Will. In short, James II. blinded by his Affection for the Earl, was not content with forgiving all his Excesses, but moreover, made him his Lieutenant-General of the whole Kingdom. Probably, this high Promotion inspired the Earl of Douglas with two ambitious Projects. Without saying any thing to the King, he took a Journey into England, where it was known he privately conferred with Henry VI. Ministers. This Proceeding gave his Enemies, what they had long sought, an Opportunity to ruin him in the King's Favour. They instilled into him so many Suspicions and Fears, that in order to hinder the Earl from executing his pretended Designs, he removed him from all his Posts, not daring perhaps to attempt to punish him more rigorously. At the same time he gave the Administration of Affairs to the Earl of the Orkneys (1), mortal Enemy of Douglas, and restored the Scales to William Craighorn.

The Earl incensed to see his Enemies triumph, formed a League against them, and brought the Kingdom to the very Brink of Destruction. In a word he committed to many Outrages and Violences, that the King justly provoked with him, resolved to be freed from a Subject who created him so much Uneasiness. But as he was sensible he could not openly execute this Design, he had recourse to Policy. By means of some of his Friends, he put him in hopes of being restored to Favour upon the same foot as before. Then sending for him to Court, upon a Safe-Conduct signed with his own hand, he carried him alone into his Closet, and stabbed him with a Dagger. This Deed, though violent and irregular, was approved by the States, who, at the same time, declared James, Brother and Heir of the deceased, with the rest of his Brothers, Enemies of their Country.

James, the new Earl of Douglas, thinking only of revenging his Brother's Death, and supporting the Credit of his Family, raised a Civil War in the Kingdom. During which, the King besieging one of his Places, Douglas was preparing to relieve it, but was suddenly forsaken by all his Friends, and forced to fly for Refuge into England. Some time after, he entered the County of Anandale with some Troops, and being defeated, was once more forced to fly his Country. George Earl of Ormond (2), one of his Brothers, was taken and beheaded.

These Misfortunes were not capable of discouraging the rebellious Earl. He gained the Earl of Ros Lord of the Isles, Donald his Brother (3), and the rest of that Family, and persuaded them to take arms against the King. Then they entered together the County of Merch, and ravaged it from one end to the other. But when Douglas was preparing to pursue his Progress, the Earl of Ros repenting of his Fault, deserted him, and went and cast himself upon the King's Mercy. The King gave him hopes of a Pardon, on condition he would merit it by his Services. Douglas unwilling to follow this Example, once more retired into England.

These Commotions being appeased by the Earl of Ros's Submission, and Douglas's Retreat, James II. at the Duke of York's Solicitation, besieged Kasherrough. The Earl of Ros, willing to render himself worthy of the King's Pardon, came and offered him his Service with a Body of chosen Troops. James as was before said, was unfortunately killed at this Siege, and left James III. his Son, about seven Years old, for his Successor.

The Death of James II. and the tender Years of the new King, revived the Earl of Douglas's Hopes; but as he could not then expect any Assistance from England, by reason of the Civil War which raged in that Kingdom, was obliged to wait till Affairs were in another Situation. He believed the favorable juncture; he expected, was at length come, after Edward's Victory at Towton. Wherefore, applying himself to to that Prince, who seemed firmly settled in the Throne, he intimated to him that by means of his Friends in Scotland, it would be very easy for the English to conquer that Kingdom. Edward had no Inclination, in his present Circumstances, to undertake so difficult a Task. However, to find the Scotts Employment, and hinder them from assisting Henry, he embraced the Opportunity offered him by the Earl of Douglas, in hopes of kindling a Civil War in Scotland. So, Edward assuring him, the Earl of Ros, Donald his Brother, and Donald's Son, were disposed to rise against the King of Scotland, he gave him a full Power to treat with them.

Whilst Douglas was negotiating this Affair with the Earl of Ros, Edward was crowned at Westminster with the usual Solemnities (4).

Though Queen Margaret was out of the Kingdom, she gave the new King great Uneasiness. He was justly apprehensive, the Succours of the Scotts would enable her to make a fresh Attempt upon his Crown. So, in order to obstruct her Designs, he proposed a Truce to the Regents of Scotland. That Kingdom was then divided into two Parties, formed on the account of the Regency. Mary de Gelders, the King's Mother, was at the Head of the first, and the Earl of Angus, of the second. They both claimed the Regency, but the States, to disoblige neither, nominated two Regents of each Party, and petitioned the Queen, to be contented with the Care of her Children's Education. Thus the two Factions still subsisted, because it was not possible to satisfy both. The Affairs of Scotland being in this Situation, when Edward proposed the Truce, the Regents resolved to consent to it, and even sent Ambassadors to treat with him. But Queen Margaret, who was then at Edinburgh, perceiving how prejudicial this Truce would be to her, found means to break Edward's Measures, by surrendering Berwick to the Scotts (5), and concluding a Marriage between Prince Edward her Son, and Margaret Sister of King James. Whereupon the Negotiation of the Truce was entirely broke off.

Whilst Margaret was employed in gaining the Scotts to her Interest, Edward called a Parliament at Westminster (6), to confirm the Revolution, which had placed him on the Throne. It is easy to conceive, that in such a juncture, the Parliament did not want much Solicitation, to confirm whatever had been done in favour of Edward. How irregular soever his Election might be, he was victorious; that was sufficient to hinder any Person from venturing to dispute his Rights. Several foregoing Instances demonstrate, that the Parliaments of England never attempted to swerve from that wholesome Principle, of declaring for the strongest; and what we shall see in the Sequel of this very Reign, will still farther confirm it. Pursuant to this Maxim, the Parliament approved of Edward's Coronation, confirmed his Title, and repealed all the Acts made in the late Reign, against the House of York. Henry VI. after a thirty-eight Years Reign, was deemed an Usurper, and all he had done, whilst on the Throne, annulled, as wanting a lawful Authority, and as being of no Force, till confirmed by the new Parliament (7). Thus the People's Credulity was abused, and they were made to believe, that what had been just for sixty Years, was become unjust, by a contingent Event, I mean, by Edward's Victory at Towton.

During this Session of Parliament, the King created George his eldest Brother, Duke of Clarence, and Richard his younger Brother, Duke of Glocester. The Lord Fauconbridge was made Earl of Kent. Henry Beuchier, the King's Uncle by the Mother's Side (8), was honoured with the Title of Earl of Essex, and John Nevill, the Earl of Warwick's Brother, was made Lord Montague.

Though the Earl of Devonshire, and some others, had been beheaded at York, these Victims seemed not sufficient

After Edward had thus settled his domestick, he seriously thought of the foreign Affairs. The Kingdom was actually in War with France, Scotland, Bretagne, and the Low-Countries. If these States had all joined against him, it would have been very difficult for Edward to withstand their Forces, considering his present Situation, and little Dependence upon the Assistance of his Subjects. Happily for him, France had a new King who never thought of conquering England. I mean, Lewis XI, who was wholly intent upon the Project of rendering himself absolute in his own Kingdom, and humbling the great Men, among whom the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the principal. It is true, his Designs had not yet been disclosed. But what he was meditating, was more than sufficient to hinder him from renewing the War with the English. The Duke of Bretagne took care not to stir alone in a War against Edward, which could not but be to him, upon all accounts, very prejudicial. Besides, he saw plainly, it was against his Interest to unite with France and Bretagne, in order to weaken England, and much more, to maintain alone a War, which must be very destructive to the Trade of his Subjects. Indeed his Inclination led him to support the House of Lancaster, rather than that of York, because of his Marriage with Isabella of Portugal, a near Relation of Henry VI. But Reasons taken from the Inclinations of Princes, do not always prevail above those of Politics. The Duke of Burgundy was perfectly acquainted with the Character of Lewis XI, and consequently saw, he ought to guard against him, instead of endeavouring to render him more powerful by the weakening of England. So, contenting himself with wishing well to the House of Lancaster, without giving it any Assistance, he judged it for his Interest, to live in a good Understanding with Edward IV, whom he perceived to be firmly established, without any likelihood of being dethroned. To that end, he sent Ambassadors to congratulate him upon his Accession to the Crown, and withal, to demand Satisfaction for certain Outrages, committed by the English contrary to the Truce. Edward gladly answered the Duke of Burgundy's Advances, and immediately appointed Commissioners, to examine the Breaches of the Truce complained of by that Prince. His Affairs would not allow him to be haughty to any of the Princes his Neighbours, and still less, to the Duke of Burgundy, who was very powerful, and allied to the House of Lancaster.

1462. Edward's letter to the Earl of Ross.

There was only Scotland left which could create the King any Uneasiness. He knew, Margaret had delivered Berwick to the Scots, and contracted the Prince her Son to King James's Sister. He could not therefore question but that she expected the Assistance of that Kingdom. Mean while, the Queen having settled her Affairs in Scotland, had left there the King her Husband with the Prince her Son, and was gone into France. The Design of this Journey was to desire Aid of Lewis XI. But he was not of a Character to engage in an Enterprize which he did not perceive to be very advantageous. He gave however the fugitive Princesses, as being his near Relations, hopes of Assistance. But being unwilling to break entirely with Edward, he was contented with making Proclamation, that all the Friends of the House of Lancaster should be well receiv'd in his Dominions, and the Adherents of the House of York not admitted. (2)

Edward did not doubt that Margaret would contrive some fresh Enterprize. Her Voyage to France, and especially the late Alliance with the King of Scotland, were too plain indications. So, thinking it would be in vain to try to break her measures by a Truce with Scotland, to which the Scots daily raised fresh Obstacles, he resolv'd to renew his Negotiation with the Earl of Ross. In all Appearance, the Earl of Douglas had already prepared that Lord to take arms; the Terms only were to be settled.

Among them is Jona, which Bede calls Hy or Iu, given to the Scots by the Picts, for preaching the Gospel amongst them. Here stands a Monastery famous for the Burial of the Kings of Scotland. The Inhabitants of these Isles speak the Irish Language, and retain the Customs, &c. of the antient Scots, as the English do. They are enjoyed at present by the Mac-Gowles, who derive themselves from this Donald, who took the Title of King of the Isles, and ravaged Scotland in a cruel manner.

To conclude this Affair, which Edward hoped would turn to his advantage, he empowered the Bishop of Durham, the Earl of Worcester, and others, to make in his Name a Treaty with the Earl of Ross, which was accordingly done. The Substance of the Treaty was,

That John Earl of Ross, Lord of the Isles (3) Donald Balagh, his Brother, and John of the Isles, Son of Donald, should do Homage to King Edward.

That they should never acknowledge any other King of Scotland, but Edward or his Successors descended from Lionel Duke of Clarence.

That they should be always ready to serve him in all his Wars with Scotland, or with the Scots in Ireland.

That in Time of Peace the Earl of Ross should have a yearly Pension of a Hundred Marks Sterling, Donald one of twenty pound, and John his Son one of Ten Pound; and that these Pensions should be doubled in Time of War (4), during actual Service.

That in case Scotland should be conquered by the Arms of Edward, and with their Assistance, the King should invest them with all the Isles beyond the Sea of Scotland, to be equally divided among them.

That James Earl of Douglas should likewise be invested with all the Lands formerly held by him in the Kingdom of Scotland, from the North-Sea to England.

Lastly, That Edward should make neither Peace nor Truce with the King of Scotland, without including them if they desired it.

As this Treaty is mentioned by no English Historian, probably it lay concealed among the Records of England, till it was inserted in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Indeed, it was of little moment since it was not executed. Edward had too many affairs upon his Hands to think of the Conquest of Scotland; his sole View was to make use of the Earls of Douglas and Ross to raise Disturbances in that Kingdom. But 'tis likely, the Earl of Douglas's Measures were not very just, since the History of Scotland speaks of no Insurrection at this Time.

The rest of the Year 1462 was quiet enough, the Storm which was gathering not being yet ready to break.

Pope Pius II believing Edward sufficiently established in the Throne, writ him a congratulatory Letter upon his coming to the Crown; in Answer to one sent him by the King to notify him of it. The Pope expressed himself (5), that it appeared he reserved the Liberty of retracting if there was Occasion, since his Approbation was founded only upon the Proofs Edward himself had given him of his Title, whereby he made it conditional.

The Duke of Exeter who had married Edward's Sister, having followed Henry into Scotland, the King gave the Confirmation of his Estate to his Duchesse, who chose rather to remain with the King her Brother, than follow the Fortune of her Husband.

The Lord Fauconbridge, a zealous Friend of the House of York, who was created in Parliament Earl of Kent, was made High-Admiral of England about the End of this Year.

All being quiet in the Kingdom, and no appearance of any fresh Attempt against Edward, the Duke of Somerset, and Ralph Percy, the Earl of Northumberland's Brother came and threw themselves upon the King's Mercy, who generously granted them a Pardon.

Historians affirm, that in the Course of this Year, the English Fleet made an expedition into Bretagne and the Isle of Ree, mentioned neither by the French nor the Bretons. And indeed, it is hard to conceive what could induce Edward wantonly to renew the War, at a Juncture when he should have thought himself very happy in being left unmolested. Nay it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was not without Fear of an Insurrection of the Lancastrians. At least it seems, to this only can be ascrib'd his care to gain the Clergy to his interests, by granting them a Favour, none of his Predecessors had ever willingly granted; namely, that for the future all Ecclesiastical Persons indicted for any Crime, should be tried in the Ecclesiastical Court, without the Interposition of the King's Judges upon any pretence whatsoever. By this same Patent, he screened the Clergy from the Penalties of the Statutes of Provisors and 1462. Præmunire, passed in the 16th Year of Richard II. He pretended, he was induced to this Concession from his great Zeal for Religion, his Dread of the Excommunications decreed by the Holy Canons, and his Belief that all the Calamities with which England had been for some Time afflicted, were the just Judgments of God for the disregard shown to his Ministers. But, very probably he was led by quite another Motive, to break to many Statutes, which the Parliaments had deemed necessary to check the Growth of the Clergy's Power.

497. About the end of this Year, the Truce of Commerce between England, and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions, was prolonged for some time (1).

1463. Edward calls upon the Earl of Warwick to perform his Promise, and for that purpose, appointed Commissioners, who were ordered to receive his Oath. But the Earl, who had his Spies in England, not feeling that Edward was really preparing to support him, did not think proper to begin, for fear of being detected.

1463. Edward dreads a Storm from the North. Presently after, Queen Margaret having obtained of the King of France, an Aid of five hundred Men, with the Promise of a greater, embarked to make a Descent into England. As she hoped, the Inhabitants of the Northern Counties would take Arms in her favor, she landed at the Mouth of the Tine. But she found there a Body of English Troops, who forced her to re-embark with Precipitation. A few Hours after, her Ship being separated from the rest of the Fleet by a Storm, it was with great difficulty that, having entered the Tweed, she at last landed at Berwick. The rest of the Ships were driven towards Bamburgh, where the French would have landed; but the Bastard Ogle (2), who was in those Parts, having hindered their Descent, they retired to the little Isle of Lindisfarne; for the Weather would not suffer them to put to Sea. Thither Ogle followed them, and attacking them slew part, and took four hundred Prisoners. Their Leader (3) was the only Person, that found means to escape in a Fisher-boat to Berwick.

Edward, upon receiving this news, easily perceived, Margaret was secure of the Assistance of the Scots, and would soon march into England. This fear causing him seriously to attend to his Affairs, he dispatched the Lord Montague, with what Troops were ready, whilst himself hastened a great Armament, he was making by Sea and Land, to oppose his Enemy (4).

Montague having begun his March, heard upon the Road, that the Queen was entered Northumberland at the Head of an Army, which daily increased, by reason of the great Licence the Soldiers were allowed (5). He advanced however as far as Durham, where he found some days expecting a Reinforcement, sent by the King. These Supplies being arrived, he continued his March, and meeting a Detachment of the Enemies (6), commanded by the Lords Hungerford and Rofs, attacked and put them to Rout. Ralph Percy, who served Henry, though he had taken the Oath to Edward, was slain in this Action. The Duke of Somerfet making no more Scruple than Percy, of breaking his Oath, was likewise gone to join the Queen.

Montague, encouraged with this Success, marched immediately to Hexham, where Henry lay intrenched (7), and attacking him in his Lines, without giving him time to recover himself, gained a complete Victory. The Duke of Somerfet, the Lords Rofs and Hungerford (8), were taken Prisoners; but Henry, Margaret, and the Prince their Son, fled into Scotland. The Prisoners were not long suffered to languish. Some Days after, the Duke of Somerfet was beheaded at Hexham, Rofs, and Hungerford, elsewhere; and twenty Officers of Distinction at York. Many others, who had concealed themselves in several Places, being discovered, or given up to the Conqueror, were likewise sacrificed to his Vengeance.

After this Victory, Edward, who was advanced to Durham, sent the Earl of Warwick farther Northwards, to recover some Places taken by the Queen; after which, he returned to London. The Earl of Warwick having nothing to fear after his Brother's Victory, divided his Army into three Bodies, and besieged at once Bamburgh, Dunstanburgh, and Alnwick (9). The two first of these Places were easily taken, and the commanding Officers punished. Alnwick, where a Frenchman commanded with some Troops of his Nation, held out till the Earl of Angus came to its Relief with a Body of Scotch Troops (10). But the Earl could do no more than draw out the Garrison, probably by a Treaty with the Besiegers, though Buchanan lays otherwise.

Edward being arrived at London, ordered two Patents to be drawn under the Great Seal, to reward the Lord Montague and Sir William Herbert, with the Dignity he conferred on them. The first had done him a great Service in his two late Victories. The other had all along distinguished himself by an extraordinary Zeal for the House of York. So, being pleased to give them both Marks of his Gratitude, he created the former Earl of Northumberland, and the latter Earl of Pembroke; Henry Percy, and Jasper Tudor, who bore these Titles, having forfeited them by adhering to King Henry. But Percy submitting afterwards to the King, and obtaining his Pardon, Montague willingly resigned him the Title of Earl of Northumberland, for that of Marquis of Montague. As for the Title of Earl of Pembroke, care must be taken not to confound the two Lords that bore it; namely, Jasper Tudor Half-Brother of Henry VI., and William Herbert, who was in Edward's Service.

Whilst Edward was enjoying the Tranquillity procured by his late Victory, he received Advice that Preparations were making in France, to support the Interests of Henry and Margaret. Whereupon he resolved to send for the Earl of Warwick, and leave the Marquis of Montague in the North, with a Patent of Governor of the Northern Marches, and a Power to levy what Troops he thought necessary. He did not doubt, that his Enemies had resolved to make their greatest Efforts from that quarter, by reason of the Neighbourhood of Scotland. These Precautions, joined to his late Victory, probably cooled the Ardour of the French and the Scots. Soon after the Scots demanded a Safe-Conduct for Ambassadors they intended to send to him. At the same time, Lewis XI. negotiated a Truce with him, by the Duke of Burgundy's Mediation. This Truce was actually concluded at St. Omer, to the 1st of October 1464, on the condition, that neither of the two Kings should assist the Enemies of the other. The Duke of Burgundy agreed likewise to renew, for one Year, the Truce of Commerce between England and the Low-Countries.

After Edward had thus secured himself against France, and he concluded with Scotland a Truce for a Year, negotiated by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's at London, in the Name of the Regents. Thus having nothing to fear from his Neighbours, at least for one Year, he saw himself at leisure to strengthen himself in the Throne, in case of another Attack.

Mean while, the unfortunate Henry, deserted by the King of France, the King of Scotland, and the Duke of Burgundy; who alone, were able to assist him, saw himself entirely without Refuge. He was still at Edinburgh, but not without Uneasiness. Besides that the late Truce between the English and Scots, did not allow these last to give him any Assistance; very likely, in concluding the Truce with Scotland, Edward had stipulated, that his Enemy should not be suffered to remain any longer in that Kingdom. It even appears in the Collection of the Public Acts, that before the Truce was signed, the two Kings of England and Scotland, agreed upon certain secret Articles, which could only concern the unfortunate fugitive King. Be this as it will, Henry not knowing where to retire, preposterously imagined he might be concealed in England. Perhaps, he flattered himself that the Inhabitants of the northern Counties would rise in his favour. But unhappy Princes seldom meet with faithful Friends. At least, it may be presumed, that fearing to be delivered up by the Scots, and having no Convenience to escape by Sea, he hoped to find a safe Retreat with some Friends in England, till an opportunity offered of passing into France. Whatever his Design might be, he had no sooner set foot in England but he was known, seized (11), and carried ignominiously conducted to London (12), and confined in the Tower. Some affirm, he was taken the last Year at the Battle of Hexham, or at least a few Days after. But it appears in some Public Acts, that in October, that Year, he was not yet in Edward's Power. It is therefore more probable he was taken, as I said, in endeavouring, after some stay in Scotland, to conceal himself in England. An Adventure which befel Margaret, and is related by Monfrélet, makes it thought, she had likewise resolved to hide herself in England, in expectation of an opportunity to embark, not daring to trust the Scots any longer; and, the better to accomplish her Design, had parted from the King her Husband. Monfrélet says, Margaret being in England with the Prince her Son, attended with La Verenne a French Lord; fell into the hands of Robbers who would have killed her, if a sudden Quarrel amongst them, had not afforded her an opportunity to escape into a Wood with the Prince. He adds, that afterwards she found means to embark for Sluice in Flanders; where the Duke of Burgundy gave her an honorable Reception. If this Adventure be true, it must have happened at the time I am now speaking of. However that be, after her departure from Scotland, she retired to René of Anjou her Father, with the Prince her Son. Edmund, the new Duke of Somerset, Brother of him beheaded at Hexham, with the Duke of Exeter, fled for refuge into the Low-Countries, where however they durst not make themselves known, for fear of being delivered to Edward. They endured in Flanders all that a wretched Exile, attended with extreme Want, was capable of bringing upon Perilous of their Character. Philip de Commines says, he saw the Duke of Exeter, before he was known, following barefoot the Duke of Burgundy's Equipage, and serving probably as Footman for his Livelihood. But these two Lords being at length known, the Duke gave them a mean Pension for their Subsistence, not daring doubtless to carry his Generosity any farther, for fear of offending Edward. These are strange Turns for a King who had fat thirty-eight Years on a Throne, for a Queen who had for many Years governed England with an absolute Sway, for a Prince destined by his Birth to wear a Crown, for Lords related or allied to the Royal Family, who had always enjoyed the highest Offices. Such Instances of the Vicissitude of worldly Grandeur often make but little Impression at the time they are seen, because those who are concerned, are generally induced to ascribe their Misfortunes to the malice of their Enemies. But they who read them impartially in History, can they help observing, and acknowledging the direction of Providence (1)?

Edward having King Henry in his Power, and Queen Margaret being retired to the Duke her Father, there was no Person capable of raising Commotions in the Kingdom. Then it was, that after offering in vain a Pardon to all the Lancastrians, that would make their Submission and swear Allegiance by such a time, he confiscated their Estates, and liberally bestowed them upon those that had served him. Then, willing to gain the Affection of his Subjects, after giving them convincing Proofs of his Severity, he made himself extremely popular, even to such a Degree that the Italian Author before mentioned, taxes him with running into Excess on that account.

During this Calm, which seemed to be lasting, the King's chief Councilors pressed him to think of marrying, in order to leave the Crown to his Posterity. He took their Advice, and three Matches were proposed. The first was Margaret Sister of the King of Scotland. But besides that this Princess was already affianced to Henry's Son, she was so young, the Marriage could not have been consummated many Years. The second was Isabella of Castile, afterward married to Ferdinand of Arragon. The English Writers say, she was rejected by reason of her being too young: And yet, it is certain she was then thirteen Years old (2). Bona of Savoy, Sister of the Queen of France, was the third. Edward resolved upon this last, and shortly after, sent the Earl of Warwick to demand her in marriage. She was then at the Court of France with the Queen her Sister. It is time now to speak of the Affairs of France by reason of their Connection with those of England. Otherwise, the Reader would understand but imperfectly, what passed in England in the Reign of Edward IV.

Lewis XI, a Prince of a turbulent and restless Spirit, was no sooner on the Throne of France, but he formed the design of rendering himself absolute. This is what some Flatterers have called rendering himself free, but what a famous Historian says ought rather to be termed, running Mad. To execute this grand design, the overgrown Power of the Peers was first to be humbled, among whom the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the most considerable. They not only upheld one another, but were moreover a Support to the rest. The first held Burgundy and Flanders, the only two ancient Lay-

Peerdoms which still remained to be united to the Crown. This Prince, who was moreover Sovereign of almost all the Low-Countries, was so powerful, that to attack him first would have been very imprudent. So it was with the Duke of Bretagne that Lewis resolved to begin the execution of his Projects. An old Quarrel about Homage afforded him a Pretence. Ever since Peter, surnamed Maudclerc, had done Homage to St. Lewis, the Nature of that Homage had been a continual Subject of Disputes between the Kings of France and the Dukes of Bretagne. The Kings pretended it was Liege or Full, and the Dukes affirmed, it was not. This was a very important Question, because of the great Difference between bare Homage, and Homage-Liege. The first was paid by those, who without being naturally dependent on a Prince, did him Homage however for other reasons; as for his Protection, for his Assistance when wanted, or even for a Pension. The Collection of the Publick Aids contain sundry Homages of this Kind; paid to the Kings of England by Sovereign Princes of Germany and the Low-Countries, and by Earls of Savoy. But Homage-Liege was paid by those that held Lands dissembred from the Dominions of the Prince to whom it was paid; such were the Dukedoms and Peerdoms of France. As these two Sorts of Homage were of a different Nature, they were likewise performed in a different Manner. The first that did Homage-Liege was uncovered, on his Knees, ungirded, without Sword or Spurs; he held his Hands joined within those of the Sovereign, and swore Fealty to him. But Simple-Homage was paid standing, with the Sword and Spurs on, and without Oath. Thus Liege-Homage was for Lands dissembred from a State, and denoted their being liable to Confiscation, and Re-union. But Simple-Homage was perfonal, upon certain Conditions advantageous to the Vassal: So that the Default of Homage deprived him only of the Benefit of these Conditions. And therefore, the obliging the Duke of Bretagne to do Liege-Homage, would have put him under a necessity to own his Dukedom liable to Confiscation, and to be re-annexed to the Crown of France. To avoid this Inconvenience, the Dukes of Bretagne had found the expedient of doing their Homage, like their Predecessors, in general Terms. Whether the Right of the Kings of France, with regard to the Nature of the Homage, could not be well proved, or the Circumstances of Affairs obliged them to manage the Dukes of Bretagne, it is certain they long received their Homage in that manner. It is true, after Homage done, the Chancellor or High-Chamberlain laid aloud, the Homage was Liege, to which the Duke answered it was not; and thus the Pretensions of each remained entire. Charles V plainly showed he supposed the Homage to be Liege, since he caused the Dukedom of Bretagne to be confiscated and annexed to his Crown, by a Decree of the Court of Peers. A Peace being concluded between France and Bretagne in the beginning of the Reign of Charles VI, the Duke of Bretagne was restored to his Dukedom, and, as nothing was settled concerning the Nature of the Homage, the Pretensions of both Parties still subsisted. Arthur III, who had been Constable of France, when he became Duke of Bretagne, solemnly declared in doing his Homage to Charles VII, that he meant not to do Liege-Homage, and was allowed to pay it in general Terms, like his Predecessors. Francis II his Successor made the same Declaration, and Charles VII received his Homage, though without approving his Protestation.

The Affairs between France and Bretagne, were in this Situation, when Lewis XI came to the Crown. Probably, this Prince would have been no harder to please than Charles his Father, in respect of the Duke of Bretagne's Homage, had he not, as I said, resolved to begin with him, his grand Project of humbling all those that could hinder his arriving at arbitrary Power. He had taken this resolution the moment he was seated in the Throne, and it may be, before the Death of the King his Father; but it was not till 1464, that he began to execute it. To that end, having first ordered some Troops into Anjou, he sent the Chancellor de Morvilliers to the Duke of Bretagne, to forbid him in his Name to assume any Right of Sovereignty in his Dukedom. Francis II finding himself unprepared for his Defence, had recourse to Artifice, and demanded three months delay to consult his States. This Term being granted him, he made use of it to cabal in France among the great Men, and to form against Lewis a powerful League, called the great League of the Publick Good, which will be presently mentioned.

At the very time Lewis thought of attacking the Duke of Bretagne, Edward sent the Earl of Warwick to demand

In this Parliament the Importation of Woollen-Cloths, Laces, Ribbands, all sorts of Iron-wares, and most other things manufactured in England, was strictly forbidden. See Statute, 3 Edw. IV. c. 4. (2) Hall proves, she was then but between six and seven Years old, fol. 193. But Bonet affirms, she was thirteen, p. 11.

1464. Bona of Savoy his Sister-in-law in Marriage. This Proposal could not but be very agreeable to him, since he desired nothing more ardently than to make an Alliance with the King of England, in order to prevent his interposing in his future Quarrels with the great Men of his Kingdom. But before the Conclusion of the Marriage, he was willing to be sure of reaping this Benefit by it. To that end, he caused the Affair of the Marriage to be a little prolonged, whilst he negotiated at London, and with the Earl of Warwick at Paris, a Treaty of personal Amity between him and Edward. This appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, where are several Papers concerning this Negotiation. We see there a full Power given by Edward to the Earl of Warwick, to treat of a final Peace, an Alliance, or Truce with Lewis XI; and another to conclude a Treaty of Amity and Friendship between the two Kings. Lewis's Designs were still more extensive. In order to deprive the Duke of Bretagne of all Protection, he would have drawn the Duke of Burgundy into his intended Alliance with England, and for that purpose, agreed with Edward and Philip upon a Congress of Ambassadors at Hesdin, which was afterwards removed to St. Omer. He managed his Affairs at London by the Lord Launay Governor of Amiens, sent thither towards the end of the last Year. But all these Negotiations ended only in the Conclusion of a Sea-Truce, to last as long as that before made for the Land (1).

Whilst these things were in agitation at London and Paris, Edward concluded with Scotland a fifteen Years Truce. John Kennedy (2), a Lord of great Abilities, and very zealous for his King and Country, thought he could not, during his Regency, do a greater Service to both, than to preserve a good Understanding with the English. Otherwise it was almost impossible to maintain Tranquillity in Scotland, because, during the War, the Male-Contents always relied upon the Protection of England.

This Affair being ended, Edward offered to all that had taken arms against him, an absolute Pardon, excepting only Ralph Grey and Humphrey Nevill. Grey having been taken in Banborough, where he commanded for Henry, had been degraded (3). Probably, he had done something since, which caused him to be excluded from the Pardon granted to the rest. Shortly after, the King issued out a Proclamation, commanding all his Subjects from sixteen to sixty Years of Age to take Arms. But the Historians mention not this Armament, nor the Occasion.

In August this Year, Edward received Ambassadors from the Duke of Bretagne, who came to negotiate a Truce. As the Duke then found himself pressed by the King of France, and was labouring to form the League of the Publick Good, he was glad to secure himself against England. He obtained from Edward a Truce for one Year, beginning the 1st of October.

About the same time the See of York becoming vacant, George Nevill, Brother of the Earl of Warwick, was promoted to it by the King's Recommendation (4). Mean while, the Earl of Warwick, who was still at the Court of France, having pressed Lewis upon the principal occasion of his Embassy, Edward's Marriage with Bona of Savoy was at length concluded and agreed. Presently after, Lewis appointed the Earl of Dammarin for his Ambassador to Edward, to settle with him what still remained to be done in the Affair, but all these Projects were demolished by Love. What I am going to relate is not a Romance, but a true Story, which shews how far that Passion is sometimes concerned in the most important Revolutions; for this Affair was attended with great Consequences.

Whilst the Earl of Warwick was hastening in France, with all his Power, the Conclusion of his Negotiation, Edward, by mere Accident, rendered it useless in England. This Prince being in Northamptonshire near the Manor of Grafton (5), had a mind to visit Jacqueline of Luxemburg, Duchess of Bedford, who had married Sir Richard Woodville. By him she had, among other Children, a Daughter called Elizabeth, who had been Wife to Sir John Grey [of Groby] and upon his Death (6) was retired to her Father. She had the Affliction to see her Husband's Estate confiscated, on account of his attachment to the Interest of the House of Lancaster, in whose Service he had lost his Life. The King's Visit appearing to this young Lady to be a favorable Opportunity, she came and threw herself at his feet, imploring the Restoration of her deceased Husband's Lands, and his Pity upon her Children. Edward, who was young and very amorous, no sooner saw the charming Widow at his Feet, but he fell desperately in Love with her. He immediately gave her hopes, as he raised her from the Ground, that he would grant her Request, and even intimated, it was not in his Power to refuse her any thing. Afterwards, in his private Conversations with her, he would fain have persuaded her to purchase the Favour at a very high rate. All the Historians agree, he was the handsomest Man in England, and the most proper to make Conquests on the fair Sex. As he knew this, he did not question to gain this Lady's Heart, with the same ease he had done many others. But she plainly told him, though she thought her self unworthy to be a Queen, she was above being a Concubine. This Declaration, which shewed his great Virtue in Elizabeth, made such Impression on the King, that despairing to attain his ends any other way, he offered her Marriage. A Heart like Edward's, with a Crown, could hardly be refused. The young Lady, agreeably surprized at so advantageous a Proposal, accepted it immediately in so respectful and grateful a manner, as completed the Conquest of this Monarch's Heart. However, as he was unwilling to disoblige the Duchess of York his Mother, he could not think of proceeding any farther without acquainting her with his Intention. The Duchess, surprized at this hasty Resolution, used all her Endeavours to dissuade him from it. She represented to him the Injury he would do the Earl of Warwick, to whom he was so much obliged, and who, it was to be feared, would highly resent it: That by the Affront he was going to put upon the King of France, he would make him his mortal Enemy, and render a Peace impracticable: That the Nobles of England would behold with Envy, the Woodville Family raised so high above them, and their Discontent might be attended with fatal Consequences. In a word, he was going to marry a Woman with nothing, his Subject, and who had Children by another Husband. Edward briefly replied, it was uncertain whether the Earl of Warwick would consider his Change as an Injury; but, as for him, he was sure of his Affection: That the King of France was like to have Affairs upon his hands, that would probably divert him from thinking of Revenge: That a King's marrying a Subject, instead of offending the Great Men, would rather be agreeable to them, since for the future all the noble Families might aspire to the same Honour. Lastly, That a Dowry ought to be of no consideration in a King's Marriage; and whatever else he could expect, would be supplied by his Love and her Virtue, whom he chose for his Wife. The Duchess receiving the King was not persuaded by her Arguments, added another, and, as she thought, a much stronger, reason. She remonstrated to him, that he was contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, and could not in Conscience take another Wife. Edward positively denied he was engaged to that Lady. Nevertheless, for his Mother's Satisfaction: or for fear this pretended Contract might one day furnish a pretence to dispute the Validity of his Marriage, he consented that Elizabeth Lucy should be examined by some Bishops. Upon her Examination, she confessed, the King had not made her a positive Promise: But she said however, she should never have yielded to his Desires, had he not been persuaded of his Intention to marry her. This Answer shewing, there was no absolute Promise on the King's part, the Bishops were of opinion the King might with a safe Conscience marry another. Accordingly, and married Edward espoused Elizabeth Woodville in the presence of a few Persons (7), so that his Marriage was divulged only by the Orders given to prepare for the new Queen's Coronation (8).

The Nobles and People were extremely surprized to see the King married to one of his Subjects, when he was negotiating his Marriage at the Court of France with the Princess of Savoy; nay, when this Marriage was 1465, already concluded. Sir Richard Woodville the Queen's Father was immediately raised to the Dignity of Earl of Rivers, and his Son Anthony Woodville, married to the only Daughter of the Lord Scales, the greatest Heiress in the Kingdom (1). This created great Envy in the Nobles, particularly in the Duke of Clarence, who could not forbear being angry, that the King his Brother should not think of procuring him so rich a Match. But this was nothing in comparison of the Earl of Warwick's Indignation for being thus mocked. He thought the King should have had more respect for him, than to use him so dishonourably. In this belief, he expressed his resentment to the King of France, who did not fail to inflame it to the utmost of his power. Lewis himself could not but look upon Edward's Proceedings as a deadly Affront. But his Affairs not permitting him to demand immediate Satisfaction, he concealed his resentment, till he had a favorable Opportunity to shew it. As for the Earl of Warwick, he left the Court of France, and returned into England, with a Heart full of Hatred and Revenge against Edward, whose Ingratitude he abhorred. He took care however, to conceal his Sentiments, because it was not yet time to discover them; but his very dissimulation shewed the King he was extremely disgusted. In this belief, Edward himself began to consider him as a secret Enemy, though he still gave him some slight Marks of his Confidence. Thus amidst the dignities of the King and the Earl, a mutual Hatred was nourished, which induced the King to give him several Mortifications, as well to gratify his Passion, as to lessen the Earl's Credit with the People. As he could not believe that he who had by his Interest raised him to the Throne, might likewise have it in his power to pull him down, he was not careful to shew him any regard. Warwick plainly perceived the King's Aim, but wisely dissembled, for fear an unseasonable resentment might oblige Edward to disfigure him to be revenged. All the Historians unanimously agree, that presently after his Return from France, he retired into the Country on pretence of his Health. But we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that during the Years 1465 and 1466, he was at Court, and even employed in Negotiations of Importance with Ambassadors of foreign Princes. So, it was two Years after his Return that he withdrew, when he could no longer bear to be entirely removed from Affairs, whilst the new Earl of Rivers had all the King's Confidence.

The rest of the Year 1465 was spent in sundry Negotiations with the King of France, the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Charolais, and the Duke of Bretagne. As these several Negotiations concerned the Affairs of France, and as upon these depends, in great measure, the Knowledge of the History of England, it will be necessary briefly to relate their Situation at that time.

Lewis XI was one of the subtlest and least scrupulous Princes then in Europe. His Design was, as I observed, to ruin the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, the former by Artifice, and the latter by Force. With regard to the Duke of Bretagne, he had, as I said, begun to execute his Project, by assembling an Army in Arjou, ready to fall upon Bretagne, and which only waited till the Delay granted the Duke was expired. As for the Duke of Burgundy, Lewis had not thought proper to proceed so haughtily with him. He was too powerful a Prince to hope to succeed by attacking him openly; but he made use of a secret expedient, which partly procured him what would have been with great difficulty obtained by way of Arms. He bribed the Lords of Croy and Chimay, Brothers, prime Ministers and Confidants of the Duke, who persuaded their Master to deliver to the Duke of France, the Towns upon the Somme (2), for four hundred thousand Crowns, pursuant to the Treaty of Arras. Charles Earl of Charolais, only Son of the Duke of Burgundy, considered this Refutation as a mortal Wound to him and his House. He believed, the Duke his Father should at any rate have kept those Places, which rendered him more formidable to France than all the rest of his Dominions. He was so angry with the Ministers, that he openly threatened to punish them one Day for their pernicious Advice to his Father. This Affair created between the Father and Son a Quarrel, which the Favorites took care to foment; so that the Earl at last in great discontent retired into Holland. He pretended, it was not safe for him to be any longer at Court; that the Favorites had counselled his Father to apprehend him, and even bribed People to poison him.

Whilst the Earl of Charolais was in Holland, Lewis XI sent thither privately the Bastard of Rubempré, in a Vessel fitted out at Dieppe, with some chosen Soldiers, who, without knowing where they were going, had orders to obey Rubempré's Commands. The Bastard landing with four of these Soldiers, was known and discovered to the Earl of Charolais, who immediately caused him to be seized. Some say, there was found upon him an Order under the King's own hand to apprehend the Earl, and bring him away dead or alive. In the mean time, Lewis was upon the Somme, with a considerable Army drawn together upon some pretence. He had appointed the Duke of Burgundy notice to his Father of what he had discovered, the Duke immediately rode away from Huydin, where he was now come. Thus, if it be true, that Lewis intended to seize at once the Father and Son, his Project miscarried. This Attempt, whether it was only suspected, or there was some Proof of it, greatly increased the Earl of Charolais's hatred to Lewis. He every where proclaimed, that the King of France designed to assassinate, or carry him away by force, and the Report immediately flew all over Flanders.

Lewis easily perceived, his Honor could not but be concerned in this Affair, especially if the Bastard of Rubempré, whose Trial was preparing in Holland, should be convicted of the Fact laid to his charge. So, to prevent this Trial, he sent the Chancellor de Morvilliers with some other Ambassadors to the Duke of Burgundy, to require him to deliver the Prisoners into his hands. The Earl of Charolais being present at the Audience, the Chancellor spoke very haughtily to the Duke, and even dropt some offensive Expressions against the Earl his Son. The Earl would have frequently replied; but the Chancellor still interrupted him, with saying he was sent to his Father, and not to him. The Duke of Burgundy's Answer was, that being Sovereign in Holland, without any Dependence on France, he would cause the Prisoner to be tried, and either punished or acquitted, according as he was found guilty or innocent. When the Ambassadors of France took their Leave of the Duke, the Earl of Charolais taking one of them aside, said to him: The King your Master has been very severe upon me by his Chancellor, but he shall repent it before a Year is at an end. And indeed, he was as good as his word.

This passed in the Year 1464, whilst the Duke of Bretagne, to defend himself against Lewis, was labouring to form the League of the Publick Good above-mentioned. The Earl of Charolais was one of the first to come into it, and had obtained his Father's Permission to raise Troops and join the Duke of Bretagne, with almost all the great Men of France, who were to be near Paris in June 1465. When the Duke of Bretagne saw himself secure of a powerful Assistance, he sent Ambassadors to the King, under colour of desiring a longer delay, but in reality to corrupt the Duke of Berry his Brother. They succeeded so well, that they brought the Duke with them into Bretagne. As soon as he was out of the King's power, the Confederates declared him Head of the League, and every one went and prepared to be at the Rendezvous. The Duke of Bourbon was the first that ventured to take Arms, with design to draw the King into his Country, at a distance from Paris. Lewis, who had yet no intelligence of the League, marched immediately towards Bourbannois. But quickly after he received advice, that the Earl of Charolais, at the head of a powerful Army, was approaching Paris, and the Duke of Bretagne with the rest of the Confederates were preparing to join him. Upon this News, he speedily left Bourbannois, to save his Metropolis. In the mean time, the Earl of Charolais attempted to become master of it, but as he saw no appearance of Success, went and encamped at Montbercy, expecting the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne. Mean while, the King, who was advancing with great Marches, being come near Montbercy, the two Armies met and joined Battle. The Success was so doubtful, that both Sides claimed the advantage. But as the King decamped in the night, to throw himself into Paris, he gave occasion to his Enemies to say, he owned his Defeat. Some days after, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne joined the Burgundians. But the King had now so well provided for the defence of his Capital, that it was impossible for the Confederates to take it. At length, the War ended in a Treaty signed at Conflans the 30th of October. Lewis restored to the Duke of Burgundy the Towns upon the Somme, for which he had paid four hundred thousand Crowns, and gave Normandy in Appenage to the Duke his Brother (3). After the signing of the Treaty, the Earl of Charolais retired into the Low-Countries, and the 1465. Duke of Berry, accompanied with the Duke of Bretagne, went and took possession of Normandy. But a few Days after, the Duke of Bretagne quarrelling with the Duke of Berry, returned into his own Dominions. Then Lewis taking advantage of this Diffention, marched, without loss of time, into Normandy, expelled his Brother, and forced him once more to take refuge in Bretagne, where, notwithstanding their former Quarrel, he was civilly received by the Duke. There are all the most material Transactions in France, in the Year 1465.

Whilst the French Princes were employed in Preparations for the War of the Publick Good, they had not neglected the King of England. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that from March, to their taking the Field, the Duke of Bretagne, and the Earl of Charolais had their Ambassadors at London, and the Earl offered to make with Edward a Treaty of Alliance and Friendship. Lewis XI himself, though very angry with him, did not fail to court him. But Edward willing, no doubt, to be better informed of his Affairs, avoided on divers pretences to come to any Agreement.

He proceeded otherwise with regard to the King of Scotland, with whom, after a long Negotiation, he concluded at Newcastle a Treaty, whereby the late Truce was prolonged for forty Years (1), till 1519.

In the beginning of the Year 1466, the Queen was delivered of a Princess, called Elizabeth (2), who afterwards became the happy Instrument to bring Peace to England, after a long Civil War.

Edward having greatly affronted Lewis XI, considered him as a secret Enemy, who would not miss an opportunity to be revenged. He behaved however with great Caution, during the War of the Publick Good, for fear of affording him a fresh Cause to support the House of Lancaster, in case he subdued the Confederate Princes. The same reason induced him to hearken to the Proposals of the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne; but he had taken care to conclude nothing, either with them or the King of France. Afterwards, Lewis's Disadvantage at the Treaty of Conflans, might have caused Edward to pay him less regard, had not the Revolution immediately after in Normandy, made him act with deliberation. Mean time, he was equally pressed on both sides. The King of France, desiring to forget the Affront he had received, urged him to enter into Treaty with him for a final Peace between the two Crowns, or at least, for a long Truce. On the other hand, the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Charolais, and the Duke of Bretagne, represented to him, that if he suffered the French Princes to be oppressed, the King of France would become so powerful, as could not but prove fatal to England. The Course he took upon this occasion, was to manage them all, and keep both Sides in hopes. The truth is, it was by no means his Interest to concern himself in their Quarrels, and create new Enemies, when the Lancastrian Party, though humbled, were still very numerous in England. This is the real Motive of his Conduct, and of all his Negotiations, as well with the King of France, as with the other Princes, who pressed him to declare himself. Mean while, to keep Affairs upon the same foot, till farther Discoveries could be made, he concluded a short Truce with France, and the Duke of Bretagne. In managing the King of France he had a farther Aim, to hasten the conclusion of a Marriage proposed to him, between Margaret his Sister, and the Earl of Charolais. He was sensible, the less inclined he appeared to break with Lewis XI, the more eager would the Duke of Burgundy and his Son be for the Marriage. And indeed, his Policy had all the success he expected. These two Princes perceiving how difficult it was to engage him in their Party, imagined there was no shorter way to attain their Ends, than to effect the Marriage proposed. As soon as Edward saw them in this Disposition, he delayed not to enter into Engagements with them. He loved not the King of France, as knowing he was not beloved by him. Besides, he considered there was no reliance upon that Prince's Word; that his Proceedings were insincere, and at one time or other he would shew his Repentment. Moreover, it was not for the Interest of England, to suffer the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne to be ruined, which, as it evidently appeared, was Lewis's grand Design. Wherefore, October the 23d, he signed a Treaty of personal Alliance, Amity, and Friendship with the Earl of Charolais. A few Days after, he sent a Safe-Conduct to Lewis of Bruges Lord of Grutwyche, appointed by the Duke of Burgundy to treat with him of a perpetual Peace, and settle the Articles of the Marriage of the Earl of Charolais with the Princess Margaret.

All this seemed to tend to a League between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy for the Duke of Bretagne's defence, who was vigorously pressed. Since the Duke of Berry had been expelled out of Normandy, the Duke of Bretagne had undertaken to support him, and cause the Treaty of Conflans to be executed. This was projected by him and the Earl of Charolais, who promised to make a powerful Diversion in Picardy. But unhappily for the Duke of Bretagne, the Duke of Burgundy was engaged in a War with the Liegeois, which hindered the Earl of Charolais from performing his Promise. Mean while, Lewis XI, improving this Juncture, pressed the Duke of Bretagne extremely, who being unable to withstand him alone, gave him hopes he would comply with his Will. But this was only to gain time, till the Duke of Burgundy was ready. At length the War with Liege being suspended by a Truce, the Earl of Charolais prepared to march into Picardy. But, when least expected, Lewis by his secret Practices caused the Liegeois to take Arms again. Thus the Duke of Bretagne was still greatly distressed. He defended himself however as well as he could, in expectation of being quickly assisted.

Whilst these things passed in France, Edward concluded a Treaty of perpetual Alliance with the King of Scotland. He had done the same with the King of Denmark the beginning of this Year. Tho' these Alliances were inconsiderable with respect to his principal Affairs, they gained him reputation, and rendered him more formidable to his Enemies.

The first part of the Year 1467 was wholly spent in Negotiations with France and the Duke of Burgundy. The Duke only waited the end of the War with Liege, to give all his Forces to his Son, and prevent, by a powerful Diversion, the Duke of Bretagne's ruin, who having already lost his Towns in Lower-Normandy, saw himself upon the point of being attacked in his own Country. On the other side, Lewis, who spared no Cost to have good Spies, was informed of what passed between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy, and easily perceived, their Union tended to the Duke of Bretagne's defence. As he still intended to ruin that Prince, he omitted nothing to divert Edward from the Engagements he was entering into with his Enemies. For that purpose, in February 1467, he sent the Bastard of Bourbon into England, and in June, the Archbishop of Narbonne. Edward pretending to be entirely disengaged, appointed immediately Commissioners (3) to treat with these Ambassadors. But as it is easy to gain time in these Negotiations, nothing was concluded. Mean while, Lewis was afraid to distress the Duke of Bretagne, for fear of obliging Edward to declare for him.

Such was the State of Affairs between those two Princes, when the Duke of Burgundy died the 15th of June, in the 72d Year of his Age. Charles Earl of Charolais his only Son, whom for the future I shall call Duke of Burgundy, succeeded him in all his Dominions. He would immediately have posted to the Duke of Bretagne's Assistance, had he not been detained by the War with Liege.

Mean while, Lewis fearing his Prey would escape out of his Hands, sent and offered the new Duke of Burgundy to desert the Liegeois whom he had hitherto assisted, provided he would, in return, abandon the Duke of Bretagne. If Charles had clofed with this Proposal, the Duke of Bretagne would have been irrecoverably lost, since there was now a French Army of thirty thousand Men in the heart of his Country. But he bravely rejected it, declaring, let what would be the consequence, he would assist the Duke of Bretagne to the utmost of his Power. He only waited the end of the War with Liege, to throw himself into Picardy, and did not question that Edward would declare against France, when he saw himself secure of being so strongly supported. The very Day of his Father's Death (4), he ratified his Alliance with Edward, and the new Bond whereby they were going to be farther united, namely, his Marriage then upon the Point of conclusion, seemed to promise him, he should never want the Assistance of England. Mean while, the Duke of Bretagne, fearing to be oppressed before the Succours arrived, put Lewis in hopes of all the Satisfaction he desired, and by that means obtained a Truce which gave him some respite.

Whilst these things passed in France, considerable Alterations were made in the Court of England, which in the end occasioned great Troubles. The Queen's Relations daily increased in favour with the King; and the Earl of Warwick with his Brothers, who had been so powerful, were little regarded. The Archbishop of York (5) was still

The Earl of Warwick was no longer employed as before in Affairs of Importance. This manifestly appears in the Collection of Publick Acts, where his Name is not found after the middle of this Year. As for the Marquis of Montague his Brother, Governor of the northern Counties, that Post being of no great Consequence, since there was no danger from Scotland, he was not displaced. Besides, Edward had less Inclination to displease him, because in the decline of his Family's Credit he behaved with more circumspection than his Brothers. On the other hand, the Earl of Rivers, the Queen's Father, was raised to the highest degree of Favour. Besides the Office of Lord-Treasurer, he was likewise made High-Constable, upon the voluntary or forced Relinquishment of the Earl of Worcester (2), whom the King required, by making him Lieutenant in Ireland, under the Duke of Clarence. Thus the Earl of Rivers held at once two of the greatest Offices of the Crown, and moreover, his Son Anthony Woodville had a Grant of the Reversion of the High-Constableship. Probably it was about this time, that the Earl of Warwick retired from Court, and the Archbishop of York went and resided upon his Diocese.

The Earl of Rivers was raised to the highest degree of Favour. Besides the Office of Lord-Treasurer, he was likewise made High-Constable, upon the voluntary or forced Relinquishment of the Earl of Worcester (2), whom the King required, by making him Lieutenant in Ireland, under the Duke of Clarence.

The Earl of Warwick retired from Court, and the Archbishop of York went and resided upon his Diocese.

It was very hard for a Man of the Earl of Warwick's Character to suffer such a Disgrace without resentment. He was the proudest Lord that had ever been in England, and his natural Pride was still encreased by the great Services he had done the King. The Affront put upon him by the King, in marrying in England without his knowledge, at the very time he was employed by him at Paris to negotiate another Marriage, which too was concluded, had extremely incensed him. The Contempt shewn him by the King at his return from France, in not making him some civil Excuse, had very much increased his Disgust. To this was added, an extreme Indignation to see his Credit entirely sunk. In fine, the Favours, heaped by the King upon the Queen's Relations, racked him with Envy, and threw him upon the most violent Resolutions (3). If we may believe certain Historians, he had a stronger reason to hate Edward than those I have mentioned. And that is, Edward attempted the Chastity of one of his Daughters (4); and this Prince's Character, who was not very scrupulous in that respect, makes the thing credible. Be this as it will, the Earl mortally hated Edward, though he concealed his Aversion in order to shew it effectually. It is certain the King, to whom he was not unknown, committed a great Error in not giving him some Satisfaction, or in not ruining him entirely. With Persons of this Character, Policy requires that one or other of these two Courses be taken. The Continuator of Montfret says, that in June 1467, the Earl of Warwick met Lewis XI at Roan, and staid with him twelve days. If so, it may be presumed, that being sent into France upon the King's Affairs, he took that Opportunity to secure Lewis's Protection, and concert measures with him concerning the Execution of his Project to dethrone Edward (5).

However, for fear his Embassy to Paris might give some suspicion to the Duke of Burgundy, he issued out a Proclamation, expressly ordering the Coasts to be well-guarded, as soon as the Truce with France, which was to end in March, should be expired. Shortly after, the Marriage was at last concluded, and Margaret sent to Bruges with a splendid Retinue, being attended by the Duchesses of Exeter and Suffolk (6). There the Nuptials were solemnized with a Magnificence worthy the two Princes who were allied by this Marriage. Mean while, the Negotiation of the Marriage of Edward's Sister with the Duke of Burgundy still continued, whilst Edward kept Lewis in hopes of concluding a perpetual Peace with him. But it was only to amuse him, and hasten withal the Marriage of the Princess his Sister. However, for fear his Embassy to Paris might give some suspicion to the Duke of Burgundy, he issued out a Proclamation, expressly ordering the Coasts to be well-guarded, as soon as the Truce with France, which was to end in March, should be expired. Shortly after, the Marriage was at last concluded, and Margaret sent to Bruges with a splendid Retinue, being attended by the Duchesses of Exeter and Suffolk (6). There the Nuptials were solemnized with a Magnificence worthy the two Princes who were allied by this Marriage. The same Day the Truce of Commerce between England and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions was prolonged for thirty Years. The rest of the Winter was spent, in negotiating an Alliance between Edward and the Duke of Bretagne. The Duke of Burgundy strongly solicited the conclusion of that Affair, because he was so incumbered with the War of Liege, that it was not possible for him to assist his Ally. The thing was not without difficulties, since it was to pass from a long War between England and Bretagne, to a strict Alliance. So, all that could be done at first, was to prolong the Truce till July. After that,

Edward and the Duke of Bretagne sent one another Letters Patent, promising mutual Affiance to the utmost of their Power. The Duke of Burgundy sent the like to the King to induce him the sooner to declare against France. Indeed, it was of the utmost consequence to him to prevent the Duke of Bretagne's Ruin, and procure the Duke of Berry a Settlement, which might enable him to keep the King his Brother in awe. He was almost certain, that after Lewis had put it out of the power of these two Princes to hurt him, he would not fail to attack him with all his Forces. On the other hand, Edward saw but too plainly how prejudicial Lewis's growth of Power might be to him. Wherefore by his Orders, his Commissioners signed, the 2d of July, a Treaty of Commerce with Bretagne, and the next day a Levy of Troops was ordered for the assistance of that Duchy. In the beginning of August, he sent Ambassadors (7) to France, on pretence to treat with Lewis of a perpetual Peace, and yet two days after he signed a Treaty, whereby he engaged to send the Duke of Bretagne an Aid of three thousand Archers. As the Duke saw himself pressed by the King of France, it was necessary to hasten that Affair, as well on his own as on the part of Edward, without standing too much upon Terms. The 6th of August, Fleet and Troops designed for Bretagne being ready in the beginning of October, the King gave the Command to Anthony Woodville, Lord Scales, his Brother-in-law.

Whilst these Affairs were negotiating at London, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne were not a little embarrassed. The Treaty granted them by Lewis being about to expire, they saw the Duke of Burgundy too remote and too busy elsewhere, to hope to be delivered by his means. As for the Succours expected from England, they were neither speedy nor strong enough to free them from their Danger. Mean while, the Duke of Burgundy made all possible haste to end the War with the Liegeois, knowing how the Duke of Bretagne was pressed. At last he found means to force his Enemies to a Battle, wherein he obtained a complete Victory, which obliged them to sue for Peace. As soon as the Treaty was signed, he marched for Picardy. He was now come upon the Somme, ready to enter upon action, when he heard, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne had made a Peace with the King of France, and after renouncing all foreign Alliance, the Duke of Berry was contented with an Appenage of six thousand Livres a Year in Land, and an annual Pension of sixty thousand in lieu of Normandy, granted him by the Treaty of Confians. This News, which Lewis sent him by an Express, was the most unwelcome. However, without being discouraged with this unexpected accident, he resolved to discomfite where he was. He hoped, as the Duke of Bretagne had been compelled to a Peace, he would repeat what he had done, when he saw himself supported, and easily find an excuse to break it. This is what he plainly told those who advised him to sue to the King of France for Peace.

The Duke of Burgundy's resolution inspired Lewis with fear. He was apprehensive, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne would recede, when they saw Affiance so near. In that case, he might depend upon having to deal with the King of England, the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, and many of the most potent Lords of the Kingdom, who were dissatisfied with him. In this Uneasiness, which was not ill grounded, he departed from Paris, where he then was, into Picardy, to treat with the Duke of Burgundy. This Design succeeded to his Wish. The Duke, uncertain of the resolution the Duke of Bretagne might take, agreed to retire, for four hundred thousand Crowns, which Lewis gave him to defray his Expenses.

Hitherto Lewis had reason to be satisfied with his Advantages. He had dispersed the League made against him, and reduced the Duke his Brother to a very moderate Appenage. However, he could not think of abandoning his first Project. He was resolved to ruin the Duke of Bretagne, that he might afterwards attack the other Peers, and the Duke of Burgundy himself, with more safety. His extreme desire to execute this Project, made him commit the grossest fault that so political a Prince could possibly be guilty of. After signing his Treaty with the Duke of Burgundy, he would go and confer with him. He had such a Conceit of himself, that he fancied he should persuade that Prince to relinquish the Interests of the Duke of Bretagne. At least, he hoped to sow Jealousies between them, from which he could not fail to reap great Advan-1469. happened. Then it was that the affair of York Hospital appeared to have been only a pretence to draw the People together. For the Hospital afforded the Seditious no manner of pretence to take the rout to London.

Mean while, the Earl of Pembroke having drawn together about ten thousand Men (1), began his March in quest of the Male-Contents. He was joined on the road by the Lord Stafford, with eight hundred Archers. The two Armies being come near one another, the Earl of Pembroke sent Sir Richard Herbert his Brother, with a Detachment (2) to view the Enemy as near as possible. Sir Richard, who was a very good Officer, executed his Orders with great conduct, without exposing himself however to be attacked. But his Men, who had not his experience, preposterously imagining, he would lose a fair opportunity to defeat the Enemies, fell, against his Will, upon their Rear. But Conyers, who foresaw it, was so well prepared, that the Detachment was routed with great Loss.

Edward hearing this news, writ to the Earl of Pembroke not to be discouraged for so inconsiderable a Loss, assuring him he would come in person and join him, or send a strong Reinforcement. Mean while, the Seditious finding they had near them an Army which might daily encrease, and fearing to meet the King in the way, resolved to retire to Warwick, where, very likely the Leaders knew, they should be received. But the Earl of Pembroke, impatient to have his revenge, marched directly towards them, and forced them to halt near Banbury, where the two Armies incamped at a small distance one from another (3). Mean time, the Earl of Pembroke and the Lord Stafford quarrelling about an Inn (4), Stafford withdrew in the night with his eight hundred Archers.

On the morrow, at break of day, the Male-Contents marched in good order to attack the King's Army. They had heard by Defectors of the Lord Stafford's retreat, and were resolved to improve it. Henry Neville (5), one of their Generals, advancing in order to engage, for fear the Royalists should retire, was fiercely repulsed, made Prisoner, and slain in cold blood. This barbarous Act, or inspiring the northern Men with a sort of Fury, they rushed upon their Enemies, and notwithstanding the Valour of Sir Richard Herbert, who performed that day Actions extolled by all the Historians (6), the King's Army was put to rout (7). The Earl of Pembroke and his Brothers fell into the hands of the Conquerors, who carrying them to Banbury, ordered their Heads to be struck off, in revenge for the Death of Sir Henry Neville. After this Victory, the Male-Contents continued their march to Warwick. Hitherto the Earl of Warwick and the Duke of Clarence had not declared themselves. It may be, they were gone some time before to Calais, to avoid the Suspicion of being concerned in the Insurrection, in case it miscarried, and to improve it, in case of Success.

A few days after the Battle of Banbury, the People of Northamptonshire, following the Example of the Yorkshire Men, assembled in great numbers, under the conduct of one Robert of Ridgisdale (8). This Multitude, which continually increased, tumultuously assailing Grafton, a Seat belonging to the Earl of Rivers, the Queen's Father, seized the Earl, and brought him to Northampton, where he was beheaded without any form of Law.

On the other hand, the King justly incensed with the Lord Stafford for abandoning the Earl of Pembroke upon a frivolous quarrel, and by his retreat occasioning the loss of the Battle of Banbury, commanded him to be publicly beheaded (9).

The Death of the Earl of Rivers should, one would think, have convinced the King, that the Earl of Warwick, though absent, was the real Author of these Troubles; supposing the March of the Male-contents towards London, and the Battle of Banbury had not been sufficient to make him suspect it. Warwick was sworn Enemy of the Earl of Rivers, he was angry with the King, and the Male-Contents had been received without opposition into Warwick. In a word, these People had no reason to take Arms against Edward on account of York Hospital, if they had not been privately encouraged by some powerful Enemy of the King, who could be no other than the Earl of Warwick. For, there was not then in the Kingdom, any Prince of the House of Lancaster, or any Lord of that Party, of sufficient power to cause these Insurrections. As therefore, Edward could not be ignorant of the Discontent and great Credit of the Earl of Warwick and his Brothers, he ought to have naturally concluded, they were the secret Authors. And yet, though it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Earl of Rivers was put to death before the 16th of November, the King did not clearly see till the following March, that he had to deal with the Earl of Warwick! Strange and inconceivable Blindness!

The Sharpness of the Season interrupted for some time the Civil War lately kindled. Besides, the King, to whom it was very unexpected, wanted time to prepare. On the other hand, the Male-contents having yet no declared Head, remained quiet, in expectation of more particular Directions.

During this Winter, Lewis XI. sent Ambassadors into England, under colour of renewing the Truce. Probably, his sole Aim was to be perfectly informed of the Situation of Affairs in that Kingdom. At the same time Edward, desirous of strengthening his Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, sent him the Order of the Garter, which that Prince received at Bruges, the 4th of February, with great Solemnity.

If the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were at Calais during the late Troubles, it is likely, they returned not to England till about February 1470. For, they are not mentioned in the Collection of the Publick Acts since August the last Year. After their return, Edward was so far from suspecting them, that on the 7th of March he sent them, jointly, a Commission to levy Troops against the Rebels in the North. Seven days after, he conferred on the Earl of Worcester the Office of High-Constable, vacant by the Death of the Earl of Rivers.

But, shortly after, the King's Eyes were fully opened with regard to the Duke his Brother, and the Earl of Warwick. They levied Troops by virtue of his Commission, but not for his Service. Besides, the Rebels made no scruple to own them for their Heads. Thus, both Sides were preparing more than ever to renew the War. Mean time, Edward was so prepossessed, that his Brother and the Earl of Warwick durst not appear before him, that he imagined their Design was to retire into Ireland, of which the Duke of Clarence was Lieutenant. In this belief he issued out a Proclamation, dated March the 23d, forbidding the Irish to obey the Duke his Brother, and ordering them to apprehend him as well as the Earl of Warwick, in case they came there. Moreover, he promised any Person that should take them, a Pension of a thousand Pounds Sterling, or the Sum of ten thousand Pounds Money, which he would. By the same Proclamation, he conferred the Government of Ireland upon the Earl of Worcester. Three days after, he gave Orders to levy Troops in all the Counties under his Obedience, which was very diligently performed (10).

But the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were very far from any Thoughts of retiring into Ireland. On the contrary, they were very intent upon raising Troops, each in different Quarters. At last, having advice the King was preparing to march against them, they thought proper to join, left by remaining separate, they should give him too great an advantage. So, Edward when he marched to attack them, found them ready to expect him, and bent to decide the Quarrel by a Battle. However, the Uncertainty of the Issue keeping both Sides equally in suspense, some of the most prudent Lords interposed, to procure an Agreement before it came to a decision by Arms. The King passionately desired it, because he considered he was going to hazard his Crown by the loss of a Battle, whereas the Victory could procure him no great Advantage. On the other hand, he flattered himself, that the Earl of Warwick seeing him in so good a Posture, would be glad, by an honorable Composition, to get clear of his present ill State. So, thinking the Negotiation could not fail of Success, he neglected to take the usual Precautions for the defence of his Camp, contrary to the most constant Maxim of War, that a Man ought never to be more upon his guard, than whilst he is in Treaty.

Mean time, the Earl of Warwick being informed of the King's Negligence, failed not to take the Advantage. After using all possible care to hinder his Design from be-

The victorious Earl no sooner had him in his power, but he caused him to be conducted to Warwick. After that, he ordered him to be removed to Middleham Castle (2), under Custody of his Brother the Archbishop of York, who was no less concerned than he, carefully to guard such a Prisoner.

This Accident seemed to have ended the War. Indeed Edward being a Captive, nothing more appeared that could oppose the two victorious Lords. Wherefore, they so relied on their good fortune, that they disbanded most of their Troops, as not wanting them after this decision. They had only to resolve, in what manner the Government should be settled; for it does not appear, they had any desire to restore Henry to the Throne. But an unexpected Event, no less surprizing than what had just happened, broke all their Measures. Edward being confined in Middleham Castle, in the Custody of the Archbishop of York, behaved so obligingly to that Prelate, that he had leave with a small Guard to hunt now and then in the Park. This first Step being taken, he prevailed with one of his Guards to deliver a Letter to two Gentlemen of the Neighbourhood, wherein he pointed out to them, what Course they should take to free him. The Gentlemen (3), overjoyed at the opportunity to do the King so great Service, privately assembled their Friends, and lying in ambush near the Park, easily carried him away. Edward being at liberty, contrary to all Expectation, immediately repaired to York. But he did not long remain there, whether he mistrusted the Inhabitants, or thought it more convenient to be nearer London. Be this as it will, he made haste into Lancashire, where he found the Lord Hastings his Chamberlain, who had assembled some Troops. After that, taking a compass, to deceive the Vigilance of the Earl of Warwick, he went directly to London, where he was received without any difficulty. The Earl of Warwick so little expected such a turn, that he had neglected to secure the Metropolis, not imagining it to be in any danger.

It is easy to conceive the Earl of Warwick's Surprize, when he received this fatal News. The Indiscretion of his Brother the Archbishop, was so very great, that he could not help suspecting him of being bribed. But as it was not then proper to examine his Conduct, he thought only of re-arming his dispersed Troops, which could not be done in few Days. Edward was likewise in the same Confusion, since he was without an Army. So, however desirous both were to end their Quarrel by a Battle, they were obliged to stay till their Forces were assembled. In the mean time, some peaceable Lords proposed to renew the Negotiation begun before the King's Imprisonment. The Proposal being accepted, the Mediators judged an Interview of the King, and the two Chiefs of the opposite Party, might conduce to a Peace. In this belief, they so ordered it, that these last came to Westminster upon the King's Safe-Conduct. But the Conference had not the desired Effect. It was wholly spent in mutual Reproaches, by which Men are not very apt to be softened.

Presently after the Interview, every one prepared for War (4). The Earl of Warwick commissioned Sir Robert Wells, Son of the Lord Wells, to levy Troops in Lancashire, which he performed with great ease, by reason of his Family's Interest in those Parts. Edward having notice of it, sent an express Order to the Lord Wells, to come immediately to Court. His design was to oblige him to use his Authority, to persuade his Son to forsake the Rebels. The Lord Wells being come to London, and hearing how much the King was incensed against his Son, in a dread of feeling himself the Effects of his Relentment, took Sanctuary in Westminster Abbey. But the King sending him a Safe-Conduct, he immediately came to Court. He even writ to his Son, enjoining him to quit the Earl of Warwick's Party, and dismiss his Troops; but the Son refused to obey. Then Edward, enraged at not being able to succeed, ordered the Lord Wells to be beheaded, with Sir Thomas Dynock his Brother-in-law, who had accompanied him. Probably, he imagined them guilty of Connivance.

This violent Action was very injurious to Edward's reputation, and inspired young Wells with a desire of Revenge, which occasioned his own Ruin, and proved extremely prejudicial to the Earl of Warwick's Affairs. The King perceiving that Wells's Troops visibly increased, thought proper to fight him, before he was joined by the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick, who were raising Men in other Counties. Wells was encamped near Stamford, where he might easily have retired; but the desire of revenging his Father's death, made him resolve to expect the King. He fought with an undaunted Courage as long as he was supported by his Troops. At last, finding Victory declared for the King, he would have provoked his Enemies to kill him, but they refused him that favour, and spared his Life only to make him live it, a few Days after (5), on the Scaffold. In this Battle Edward obtained a complete Victory over his Enemies, of whom ten thousand were slain (6).

Sir Robert Wells's defeat broke all the Measures of the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick. They were not yet ready (7), and the King was now marching to attack them. In this Extremity they found no other remedy than to embark, in order to screen themselves from the impending Danger (8). The Earl of Warwick took his two Daughters with him, the eldest of whom, Wife of the Duke of Clarence, was ready to lye-in. His Intent was to retire to his Government of Calais, where he had left for his Lieutenant Vaulclair, a Gascon Captain, in whose Fidelity he entirely confided. But how great was his Surprize, when approaching Calais he saw the Cannon fired at him! He thought to move Vaulclair by the consideration of the Duchess of Clarence's Case, who was just delivered in the Ship of a Prince, named Edward. But all he could obtain, was a Present of two Bottles of Wine for the Duchess. Mean while, Vaulclair took care to send this small Present by a trusty Messenger, who told the Earl of Warwick from him, that he was still devoted to him, though forced to behave in this manner, the better to serve him, because if he entered the Town, he would not be safe; but he might depend upon his Fidelity. Edward, who knew not the Motive of Vaulclair's Proceedings, was so pleased with his Conduct, that he gave him the Government of Calais, to which the Duke of Burgundy, of his own accord, added a yearly Pension of a thousand Crowns.

Warwick seeing himself thus repulsed, steered his Course to Dieppe, where he safely landed with the Duke of Clarence, and his two Daughters. A few Days after, they departed from thence to wait upon the King of France, then at Amboise, who received them very civilly. Lewis, as I before observed, would not concern himself with the Affairs of England, when Edward and Henry were contending for the Crown. But when he saw the strict Alliance between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy, he found it equally his Interest to labour the ruin of both. To this reason of State was added, the desire of revenging the Affront put upon him by Edward, on account of his Marriage. In short, the Assistance Edward would have given the Duke of Bretagne, evidently showed, so long as he was on the Throne, the French Princes would ever find in him a Protector. All these reasons together moved Lewis, not only to receive the fugitive Edward, but moreover to promise them a powerful Aid. For, nothing could be to him more agreeable, and withal, more advantageous, than to see the Civil War re-kindled in England. Nay, very probably, he had already taken, for that purpose, private measures with the Earl of Warwick, and the Earl would never have ventured to declare against Edward, had he not been secure of this Assistance. However that be, an opportunity naturally offering to create Edward, in his own Country, Troubles which would prevent his interposing in the Affairs of his Neighbours, he sent for Queen Margaret to Court (9), who, some Years since was retired to the King of Sicily her Father. It was the Earl of Warwick that had been Author of all that Prince's Misfortunes, and the Earl, on his part, looked upon her as his mortal Enemy. And yet, their common Interest requiring them to stifle their Animosity, Lewis very easily reconciled them. At present, they could hardly proceed without each other. Warwick perceived, he wanted a pretence to dethrone the King, and could find none more plausible than Henry's Retraration,

1470. ration, which he could not endeavour, without being united with the Queen. On the other hand, the Queen saw this to be the only way to restore the King her Husband, or rather herself, to the Throne. So, beholding a ray of hope from that quarter, she readily received her old Enemy for Protector. Their Reconciliation therefore was made by the King of France's mediation, upon these Terms: That the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick should endeavour to restore Henry to the Throne: That the Queen should promise with an Oath to leave the Government of the Kingdom in their hands during the King's Life, and the Prince his Son's Minority, in case he came to the Crown before he was of age: Lastly, To strengthen their Union, the Prince of Wales should marry the Earl of Warwick's youngest Daughter (1). The last Article was immediately executed. Thus the Brother of King Edward (2) became Brother-in-law of the young Prince of Lancaster, and the Earl of Warwick was equally allied to both Houses.

The Duke of Burgundy, who had good Spies at the Court of France, being informed of these Transactions, gave Edward warning, who was very unconcerned. He could never believe, the Earl of Warwick, who was forced to quit the Kingdom for want of support, would be powerful enough, in his absence, to cause the People to rise in his favour. As for the Preparations in France, they gave him no uneasiness, being sensible how difficult it is for a foreign Nation to conquer England, if the People themselves do not assist. Thus, reasoning upon very doubtful grounds, namely, the People's Affection, and the Earl of Warwick's little Credit, he neglected his principal Affair, to abandon himself to Voluptuousness and Sensuality, to which he was extremely inclined.

What gave him most uneasiness was to see the Duke of Clarence his Brother strictly united with his Enemies. This Union had already produced ill effects, and might in time produce worse. He believed therefore, to make himself easy, he ought to endeavour to gain his Brother to his Interest. To that end he bribed one of the Duchesses of Clarence's Women, and instructing her in the part she was to act, granted her a Passport, to go to her Mistress. This Woman departing for Paris, passed through Calais, where she saw the Governor without telling him the Secret. It was very happy for Edward that Vaulclair, who was in the Interests of the Earl of Warwick, was not acquainted with the Affair; for he would have entirely discovered all. When the Woman came to her Mistress, she very artfully and successfully discharged her Commission. She represented to the Duke of Clarence from the King his Brother, "That the Course he was taking must end in his own Ruin: That supposing the designs he had formed with the Earl of Warwick should succeed to his Wife, he could not expect, that the House of Lancaster would put any trust in a Prince of the House of York, when there was no farther need of him: That his very Life would be in danger: That instead of relying on the Queen's Oath, he ought rather to consider it as a Snare to surprise him: That the Earl of Warwick would be the first to oppress him, as well to free himself from a Colleague in the Government, as to be rid of a Prince, who might one day have it in his Power to revenge the Injuries done to his House: That on the other hand, the King his Brother having only a young Daughter, whom Death might easily snatch out of the world, he was next Heir to the Crown: But if the House of Lancaster was restored, he would lose all hopes of mounting the Throne, since Henry's Son very possibly would have a numerous Issue." To these reasons, which were very strong, he added Motives taken from the Ties of Blood, some Excuses from the King, with a positive Promise to consider him for the future as his real Brother and the chief support of their Family. A Man must have wanted common sense not to yield to such convincing Arguments. The Duke of Clarence seeing at last his true Interests, charged the Woman to tell his Brother, he would not fail to declare for him, when he could do it with safety and probability of rendering him a considerable service. Edward being informed how the Duke of Clarence stood affected, grew perfectly easy, believing the Earl of Warwick's future Attempts would be fruitless, when no longer seconded by the Duke his Son-in-law. It must be confessed, the Earl of Warwick's Policy was very extraordinary, in making the Duke of Clarence an Instrument to ruin the King his Brother. He must have supposed, the Duke would openly act against his own Interest, which was not to be expected from the most stupid of Men. And indeed, he was afterwards very sensible, when it was too late, that he had taken false measures.

Whilst Edward lived in a deceitful security, the Earl of Warwick was preparing to return into England. He was sure of finding a powerful Party, to which were joined all the Friends of the House of Lancaster, whom he had taken care to acquaint with his design. Lewis XI furnished him, though sparingly, with Money and Troops. As far as can be judged, that Monarch's sole Aim was to foment discord among the English, to prevent their interposing in his Affairs. He still persisted in his design of subduing the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, in which he thought he could not succeed, so long as these two Princes might expect the Protection of England. Mean while, to facilitate the Earl of Warwick's descent, he ordered the Baffard of Bourbon to convey him with some Ships of War; but it was not easy to pass into England. The Duke of Burgundy's Fleet, much stronger than that of France, waited in the Mouth of the Seine to engage the French if they failed, and it was not likely, the Baffard of Bourbon would venture upon so unequal a Fight. Notwithstanding this, the Earl of Warwick repaired to Havre de Grace, to be ready to embrace any opportunity that should offer. This precaution was not in vain. Some days after his Arrival, a violent Storm so dispersed the Flemish Ships, that not being able to keep the Sea, they were forced to retire to their Ports. The Storm being over, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick set sail and arrived at Dartmouth (3), from whence they had passed into France four or five Months before.

The News of their landing was so far from alarming Edward, that he rejoiced at it. Possessed with the Notion that it was impossible for the Earl of Warwick to accomplish his designs, he fancied he could with for nothing more advantageous, than to see his Enemy come and deliver himself into his hands. Thus possessed, he desired the Duke of Burgundy to continue his Fleet at Sea, to hinder the Earl of Warwick's escape. But the Duke of Burgundy thought otherwise of this Expedition. He could not believe so prudent a Person as the Earl of Warwick, would have thus ventured, if he had not been sure of a Party in England capable of supporting him. And indeed Warwick had no sooner landed his Men, but he saw himself at the head of an Army, which in a few days increased to sixty thousand; immediately he caused Henry VI to be proclaimed, publishing an Order in his name, for all his Subjects from sixteen to sixty, to take arms and expel the Tyrant and Usurper.

So unexpected an Event opened Edward's Eyes, and showed him the Folly of his expectations. Mean time, he gave Orders to levy Troops, and appointed the Renardous about Nottingham (4). Some affirm, his Army was more numerous than the Earl of Warwick's. Others again say, it was much inferior, and this indeed is most probable (5). For, had Edward been superior in number of Troops, he would most certainly have marched to his Enemies; whereas upon their approach he retired towards the Sea. The News he received, that the Marquis of Montague, who commanded in the North, had declared against him, troubled him exceedingly, apprehensive as he was, that this defection would be followed by many others. He wanted to avoid a Battle, but knew not where to retire, because he was ignorant who were his real Friends. At length, he encamped near Lynn, a little maritime Town in Lincolnshire (6), and lodged in the Castle. This precaution, though perhaps taken without design, proved of great service. The Earl of Warwick being come within three Miles of his Army, caused the cry of King Henry VI to be every where re sounded. And the same cry, by some unknown practices, began likewise to be heard in Edward's Camp. Whereupon he commanded the Castle Gates to be shut, and the Bridge to be strongly guarded, whilst a Council was held to consider of what was to be done. But the Shoutings, which grew louder in his Army, not affording him time to deliberate, he saw no other remedy than to embark with four or five hundred of the most trusty Men (7), on board three small Vessels which had served to bring Provisions for his Army. The Lord Hastings placed himself in the Rear, to withstand the ef-

Edward being reduced to this sad condition, ordered his Ships to steer for Holland, not knowing where to retire, except into the Dominions of the Duke of Burgundy his Brother-in-law. Whilst he was beating the Seas, his Ships were decryed by eight Corsairs of the Low-Countries or Germany, whom the English called Easterlings, from their Country lying Eastward of England. Immediately these Corsairs gave chase to the three Ships, but as these were the more light, they had time to get into Almar Road at Low-Water, which hindered the Corsairs from pursuing them any farther, because they durst not come so near the Shore. Mean while they anchored in fight, desiring to attack them at High-Water. In this extremity, Edward had no other refuge than to make Signals to implore the protection of the Country. Happily for him, the Lord Gruthuyse, of whom I have before spoken, being then Governor of Holland, chanced to be at Almar. When he was told, these Ships desired assistance, he sent a Sloop to know what they were. As soon as he heard the King of England was there, he sent an order to the Corsairs not to approach, on pain of incurring the Duke his master's indignation. These people, though to near their prey, durst not disobey. They too often wanted the Governor's protection, to displease him. So, Gruthuyse went himself in a Sloop to wait on the King, and paid him all the respect due to him. Edward not having money to reward the master of the vessel that brought him over, made him a present of a rich robe lined with Sables. After that he was conducted to the Hague, where Gruthuyse bore his Expenses, till he had received the Duke of Burgundy's orders.

Mean while, the Queen, who was at London, hearing of the King's flight, took sanctuary in Westminster Abbey (2), where she was followed by a great number of Yorkists. There she was delivered (3) of a Prince called Edward, born Heir of a noble Kingdom, at the very time it was lost by his Father (4). Whilst Edward's friends were in the utmost consternation, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick, victorious without drawing their Swords, were marching to London, where they entered in triumph the beginning of October. On the 6th of the same month (5) the Earl of Warwick, attended by several Lords and a great crowd of people, went to the Tower and freed King Henry, who had been Prisoner six Years.

Whilst these things were transacting, the populace of Kent flocking together marched directly to London, with design to enrich themselves with the plunder of the City. But the Earl of Warwick meeting them with part of his Troops, easily repulsed this multitude, and ordered the most mutinous to be executed. He could not however prevent their plundering Southwark, parted from the City by the Thames.

The Tumult being appeased, Henry was solemnly proclaimed, as re-mounting the Throne. Next day there was a Procession, at which the new King, assisted with his Crown on his head (6), and followed by an innumerable crowd of people, who by their Acclamations shewed their Approbation of the late Revolution. Thus the Earl of Warwick had the Honour of restoring Henry to the Throne, after having deposed him, and of pulling down Edward, who had been raised entirely by his means. Wherefore, he was commonly called, The King-Maker.

HENRY VI. Restored.

Montague is made Esquire of the North. A.D. Pub. XI. p. 665. Hall.
Remark upon the Parliament.
 THE new King's first care, or rather the Earl of Warwick's, who governed in his name, was to restore the Marquis of Montague to the Government of the northern Counties, which Edward had taken from him, and given to the Duke of Gloucester his Brother. Then, a Parliament was called for the 26th of November, to confirm the new Revolution. This was a necessary Formality to satisfy the people, though the Parliament's Confirmation was of no great weight in an Affair transacted without it, and in which it could make no alteration. The same thing happened when Edward mounted the Throne. The contrary Resolutions of the Parliaments, in regard to the Quarrel between the Houses of Lancaster and York, clearly shew, these Assemblies acted not with freedom, but were swayed by the Events which happened before their deliberations. It is in vain therefore to urge the Authority of the Parliaments in support of the Rights of either House. Their Determinations are properly of no force, since they had not the liberty to judge according to their Understanding; unless it is said, their Understanding directed them always to side with the strongest.

Edw. ed de- clared a Traitor, and Usurper.
 Be this as it will, the Parliament voted Edward a Traitor and Usurper of the Crown, confiscated all his paternal Estate, and annulled all the Statutes made in his Reign, as wanting a lawful Authority.

An extraordinary Act is made to settle the Succession.
 By another Act, the Crown was confirmed upon Henry VI. and his Male-Heirs. But in default of such Heirs, the Crown was to descend to the House of York, that is, to the Duke of Clarence and his Heirs; Edward, eldest Son of the late Duke of York, being excluded for his Rebellion. Here would be a large field to expatiate upon the unlimited Authority of the Parliaments, if this Statute had been made with freedom, and after mature deliberation. But it is easy to see the little Freedom there was in this Parliament, if it is considered, this Act was only a bare Confirmation of the Earl of Warwick's Engagements. Moreover, out of pure condescension for the Earl, or rather by his direction, and contrary to the Laws and Customs of the Realm, it was not scrupled to deprive the Daughters of the House of Lancaster, of a Right enjoyed by the Princesses of the Royal Family, ever since the Norman Conquest. Thus, by a hasty Resolution, was established in England a kind of Salic Law, which the English had so much censured and derided, when Edward III. and Philip de Valois were contending for the Crown of France. This same Parliament restored to all their Honours and Rights, Jasper Tudor Earl of Pembroke, Half-Brother to Henry, and John Earl of Oxford, who were attainted under Edward.

Moreover, in consequence of Queen Margaret's Engagements at Amboise, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were declared and appointed Governors of the Kingdom. By this, the Parliament manifestly supposed Henry's Inability, who indeed was considered only as the Shadow of a King. A Pardon was likewise granted to the Marquis of Montague, for his crime in serving Edward, since by deserting him at so critical a time, he was the principal Cause of his Flight. But this was not all. To give the Earl of Warwick a plausible pretence to be revenged on his private Enemies, all that had borne arms in defence of Edward's pretended Right, were declared Traitors and Rebels (7). By virtue of this Act, John Tiptoft Earl of Worcester, Governor of Ireland, and High-Constable of England, having been found hid in a hollow Tree (8), was brought to London and beheaded (9). By these Acts of private revenge, the Nobles of the opposite Party were forced, as one may

Shortly after the breaking up of the Parliament, the Earl of Pembroke went for Henry Earl of Richmond his Nephew, who had concealed himself in Wales (1), and brought him to the King. It is pretended, Henry fleetly fixing his Eyes upon that young Prince, foretold, he should one Day mount the Throne, and put an end to the quarrel of the two Houses. But I do not know whether this fact be so well proved, as some Historians affirm. There seems to be reason to presume, it was invented in the Reign of Henry VII. whilst the Canonisation of Henry VI was solicited at Rome. For, the chief cause of the Pope's opposition, was, that though he was willing to own Henry VI for a good Man, he could not see in his Life any proof of an eminent Sanctity. So, this pretended Prophecy, if it had been well attested, would have been very proper to remove the Objection.

The Duke of Burgundy's trouble about Edward. Commis. Hall.

I left Edward at the Hague in a very melancholy State, deprived of his Kingdom, and living at the expense of the Lord Grubbeys, till the Duke of Burgundy was informed of his case. The news of the King his Brother-in-law's arrival in his Dominions, was by no means pleasing to the Duke. Philip de Commines affirms, he would have been less uneasy at the news of his Death. For, in that case, he would have had but one course to take; namely, to approve of Henry's Restoration. But Edward being alive and in Holland, could not but throw him into great perplexity. He had made an Alliance with him not out of Affection, but solely for reasons of State. He had sacrificed to his Interest his Aversion for the House of York; an Aversion wherein he had been educated by his Mother, Daughter of a Princess of the House of Lancaster. Mean while, he was reduced to the sad Necessity either of deserting his Brother-in-law, who was come for refuge into his Dominions, or of exposing himself, in protecting him, to the danger of drawing upon him the united Forces of France and England. On the other hand, the Dukes of Exeter and Somerset, who made a different sort of figure at his Court from what they did before this Revolution, earnestly pressed him to abandon Edward, and threatened him, in case of Refusal, with the Indignation of England. Moreover, the Earl of Warwick had now sent to Calais a Body of Troops, which only waited for orders to join the French, and invade some Province of the Low-Countries. Vaublair had not only received these Troops into the Town, but by many other Steps had shewn, that he was far from being unfaithful to the Earl of Warwick. Philip de Commines relates, that the Duke his Master having sent him to Calais, for a Confirmation of the Truce of Commerce between that Place and the Low-Countries, found the Governor, Garrison, and Townsmen entirely for Henry (3). He adds, that he saw no other way to succeed in his Negotiation than to tell the Inhabitants of Calais, that the Truce being made with England, and not with Edward's Person (4), the change of King was not a sufficient motive to break it. By that, he intimated his Master disliked not the Revolution.

Philip de Burgundy's distress. Hall.

It is certain, it greatly concerned that Prince to keep fair with the English. But the better to understand his embarrassment caused by Edward's retreat into his Dominions, it will be necessary to know the Situation of his Affairs. By the Treaty, Lewis XI signed at Peronne, he promised to give in Appenage to the Duke of Berry his Brother, Champagne and Bré in lieu of Normandy, which he had taken from him. He was not a little embarrassed by this Engagement. He plainly perceived, the Duke of Burgundy's Aim was to have Prince Charles for neighbour, to be able by his means to stir up Commotions in France whenever he pleased. But for the same reason he himself wanted to keep his Brother at a distance from the Duke. For that purpose, he tried to persuade the Duke of Berry to accept of Guienne and Rochelle, instead of Champagne, and, to succeed in this Project, bribed all those who had any influence upon him. The Duke of Burgundy being informed of this design, opposed it to the utmost of his power, by representing to the Duke of Burgundy, how much that Exchange would be to his prejudice. But perceiving these Reasons to be ineffectual, he insinuated to him by private Emisaries, that if he demanded his only Daughter in Marriage, he would certainly obtain her, and might, to prevent his Brother's Opposition, retire into England till the Marriage was concluded. This Negotiation, as has been carried so far, that Edward at the Duke of Burgundy's Instance, had ordered a Safe-Conduct to be dispatched for that Prince. But these measures were broken, because the Duke of Berry, persuaded by his treacherous Counsellors, determined at last to accept of the Exchange offered by the King his Brother.

Upon this the Duke of Burgundy listened but coldly to the proposal of the Marriage, which could no longer be subservient to his Designs. Mean while, the Duke of Breagne and the Constable de St. Pol, who were deeply concerned in the Negotiation (5), were extremely desirous of its Success. As they loved not the King, they considered, this Marriage would be an infallible means to keep up, between the two Brothers, a Diffension from which they hoped to reap great Advantages. There was nothing wanting but the Duke of Burgundy's Consent, and as they saw he had no Inclination, they undertook to obtain it by an extraordinary method. They pretended to be dissatisfied with the Duke, and advised the King of France to make War upon him, promising to assist him to the utmost of their power. Their Aim was to offer the Duke, when he should come to be pressed, to espouse his Quarrel, on condition he would give his Daughter to the Duke of Guienne. Lewis XI desired nothing more than to see the Dukes of Burgundy and Breagne at variance. Besides, he most passionately wished to take from the Duke of Burgundy, the Towns upon the Somme, delivered to him by the Treaty of Conflans. He would not however have attempted to make war upon him, for fear the Duke of Breagne and the Constable should have raised Disturbances in the Kingdom, whilst he was elsewhere employed. But when he thought himself safe from that quarter, he immediately resolved upon the War, as having no Intelligence of their Plot. Before he declared himself, he sent private Emisaries to the Towns he wanted to recover, to win the principal Burgers to his Interest. It must be observed, that the Duke of Burgundy kept but slender Garrisons in his Towns, and upon the Peace, disbanded his Troops to ease his Subjects.

Lewis having laid all his Plots, assembled the Estates at Tours in March 1470, where, upon frivolous Complaints brought by the Earl of Eu against the Duke of Burgundy, he was summoned before the Court of Peers, and the Citation was sent by a Summoner of the Parliament. The Duke not appearing, War was proclaimed against him, and St. Quentin taken, where the Constable de St. Pol entered without opposition. Amiens opened her Gates to the King by the like Practices, and the Duke was also very near losing Abbeville.

Such was the Situation of the Duke of Burgundy's Affairs, when Edward came for refuge into his Country. He saw himself unexpectedly attacked by the King of France, and presently after, the Earl of Warwick lent (6) four thousand Men to Calais to join the French, or make a Diversion. So, the Duke could do nothing more prejudicial to his Interest, than exasperate the Earl of Warwick by protecting Edward. It is not therefore strange, if Edward endured some mortifications during his retreat. It was necessary for the Duke of Burgundy's interest, that it should be thought in England, he was sorry to see him, and had no inclination to protect him. But in private, he promised to give him assistance as soon as he could do it with safety.

This policy did not serve Edward's turn. He could have wished, the Duke of Burgundy would have openly declared for him, imagining such a declaration would have greatly conduced to the support of his party in England. At last, finding the Duke remained firm to his resolution, and his Duchess's solicitations made no impression upon him, he demanded a private Audience. As the Duke could not refuse it, he represented to him, "That a longer delay was extremely prejudicial to him: That he lost his friends and creatures in England, whilst the Earl of Warwick was daily strengthening himself in his usurped power: That therefore there was no medium between assisting him speedily, and abandoning him to his ill-fortune." Then, he imparted to him his Brother the 1470. " Duke of Clarence's promises, adding, it was absolutely necessary to make haste, lest that Prince, who was naturally inconstant, should alter his mind, or the Earl of Warwick discovering his design, hinder him from executing it, by removing him from the Government. To these reasons, which concerned him in particular, he added the confirmation of their mutual oath, whereby they were bound to give each other proofs of a sincere friendship and a ready assistance, in case of necessity. Moreover, he instigated him to reflect, that in adding for him, he was also labouring for his own family, which might one day stand in need of assistance; not to mention the honour which would redound to him, by restoring a King his Brother-in-law to the Throne. Finally, he positively promised to enter into a strict alliance with him against France, the moment he was restored; adding, that such a league was the right way to resist their common enemy. He concluded with representing, that dissimulation would never be able to produce the effect he intended, since it would neither Lewis and the Earl of Warwick from jointly endeavouring to ruin him.

The Duke of Burgundy was moved with this discourse. He perceived, that in effect there was no medium in the alternative proposed to him by Edward. Above all, he seriously considered what that Prince had said in the last place, that he could not hope to repulse the attacks of the King of France, without the assistance of England, which could be expected only by Edward's restoration. That on the contrary, by deserting him, he would run the risk of seeing France and England unite all their forces against him. But on the other hand, he considered, he could give Edward but a very small aid, considering the present posture of his own affairs. That it was to be feared, this attempt happening to miscarry, he should furnish the Earl of Warwick with a plausible pretence to attack him. In this perplexity, he devised an expedient, whereby he imagined he could at once save the appearances with Warwick, and give some small assistance to the fugitive King. He equipped four large Ships at Verre, a free Port in Zealand, in other Persons names, who were furnished with Money. Moreover, he privately hired fourteen Ships of the Basterlings, to convoy the King into England, and to keep upon the Coast a fortnight after his landing, to conduct him back in case of necessity. Then, giving Edward a good sum of money (1), he left him in Holland, and went himself into Flanders. When all these Ships were ready, Edward disappearing, notice was sent to the Duke, who immediately ordered Proclamation to be made, that none of his Subjects should assist him directly or indirectly upon pain of death. It is likely, if Edward's attempt had miscarried, the Earl of Warwick would not have been deceived by this Artifice.

Whatever care was taken by Edward and the Duke of Burgundy to conceal their designs, the Earl of Warwick had received some intelligence of them. It was too much for his interest to have good Spies in Holland, to neglect to necessary a precaution. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that on the 21st of December, the Marquis of Montague had orders to levy Troops in the North, on pretence of a Rebellion (2), not mentioned by the Historians. Probably, it was only a farther precaution taken by the Earl of Warwick, upon some general advices of a Plot forming in Holland.

The 2d of January 1471, the Earl of Warwick was made High-Admiral. Doubtless, he did not dare to trust others with the care of equipping a Fleet, which he foresaw would be wanted, if the Duke of Burgundy attempted to assist Edward with open force. The advices from Holland being something more certain than hitherto, the Duke of Clarence, who was by no means suspected of holding intelligence with his Brother, was commissioned to raise an army to oppose his designs in case he should return into the Kingdom.

These measures being taken, the Earl of Warwick made haste to conclude with Lewis XI an alliance, projected some time before. But as it was difficult to make an alliance with a Prince actually in War with England, and as a Peace could not be concluded by reason of Henry's pretensions to the Crown of France, a long Truce was resolved upon, almost equivalent to a Peace. In the Treaty upon this occasion, it was agreed, the Truce should last till one of the two parties desired to break it, in which case he was to give the other five years notice, and the Truce was to continue ten years without being revocable (3). It was further agreed, that a place should be appointed to treat of a final Peace. Lewis XI was pleased, I know not for what reason, that the Duke of Guienne his Brother should be particularly included in the Truce.

The same day the Treaty was signed, the grand Prior of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem set out for France, to bring home Queen Margaret and the Prince of Wales.

Shortly after the Earl of Warwick, out of affection to the Duke of Clarence his Son-in-law, or to attach that Prince the more to the King's side, restored him the Government of Ireland, with several Manors in England, forfeited by Edward's adherents. The Marquis of Montague, and Jasper Tudor Earl of Pembroke, had likewise a share in the King's favours.

Mean while, Edward having finished all his preparations, sailed from the Port of Verre about the middle of March (4), bringing with him two thousand Men. He disembarked at Ravenpur (5), where Henry IV had formerly landed when he came to wrest the Crown from Richard II. He expected to be received with acclamations; but, contrary to his expectation, found the Inhabitants of those parts extremely displeased with his coming. Some were well affected to the House of Lancaster. Others, seeing Edward too thinly attended, were afraid to venture openly to espouse his cause. Mean while, as there were no regular Troops, he met with no opposition. But that was not all he desired. He would have been glad to be met by the People and see his army increase.

This disappointment obliging him to march with circumspection, he caused it to be rumoured, that he was come only as Duke of York to claim the private inheritance of his family, which had been confiscated (6). Henry IV had formerly used the same artifice, but more justly, since he was banished without legal Cause. But if Edward had no Right to the Crown, as he seemed to own, he must have been guilty of Usurpation, and consequently could not with justice complain that his Estate was confiscated. The reason why he did not carry his pretensions any farther, upon his arrival in the Kingdom, seems to be this. He was strongly persuaded, that the People in general were much more inclined to him than to his Rival, but that the Magistrates were against him. Indeed, as soon as the Earl of Warwick had the Government in his hands, after Henry's Restoration, his first care was to fill all the offices with his creatures. It was therefore convenient, that Edward should furnish the People with a pretence to favour him, how slight soever it might be, thereby to oppose the authority of the Magistrates, who would have had too great an advantage, could they have affirmed, he was come in arms to dethrone the reigning King. Whereas by demanding only his private patrimony, he moved the People's compassion, and inspired them with hopes, that the quarrel between the two Houses might at length be ended, by restoring his Inheritance. Be this as it will, Edward, though little pleased with the People's coldness, marched towards York, giving Henry every where the title of King, and styling himself only Duke (7).

The News of Edward's landing having reached the Warwick Court, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick departed from London to levy Troops. At the same time the Magistrates of the Town were ordered to shut their Gates upon the Enemy, and the Marquis of Montague, who kept at Pontfract with a Body of Troops (8), had Orders to fight Edward before his arrival at York (9). But if Edward had no Right to the Crown, as he seemed to own, he must have been guilty of Usurpation, and consequently could not with justice complain that his Estate was confiscated.

The reason why he did not carry his pretensions any farther, upon his arrival in the Kingdom, seems to be this.

He was strongly persuaded, that the People in general were much more inclined to him than to his Rival, but that the Magistrates were against him.

Indeed, as soon as the Earl of Warwick had the Government in his hands, after Henry's Restoration, his first care was to fill all the offices with his creatures.

It was therefore convenient, that Edward should furnish the People with a pretence to favour him, how slight soever it might be, thereby to oppose the authority of the Magistrates, who would have had too great an advantage, could they have affirmed, he was come in arms to dethrone the reigning King.

Whereas by demanding only his private patrimony, he moved the People's compassion, and inspired them with hopes, that the quarrel between the two Houses might at length be ended, by restoring his Inheritance.

Be this as it will, Edward, though little pleased with the People's coldness, marched towards York, giving Henry every where the title of King, and styling himself only Duke (7).

1471. March (1). Some ascribe this Conduct to his ignorance of Edward's Forces. But what likelihood was there of his wanting good Intelligence upon so important an occasion? Others tax him with Cowardice; but he was one of the bravest Lords of the Kingdom. Some believe there was a good Understanding between him and Edward; but the Sequel shewed the contrary. Those that reason with most probability, say, That Montague, imagining Edward would not return into England without a well-grounded hope of being restored, designed to reserve himself this way, in order to make his Peace with him. And, though his Attempt should miscarry, Montague did not despair of appeasing the Earl his Brother.

Mean while, Edward approaching York (2), two of the Aldermen came and intreated him, in the name of the Magistrates, to march another way; representing, that they could not receive into their City, a Prince that was come to take the Crown from their lawful King. Edward, purruiant to the Plan he had formed, replied, "That he was not come to take the Crown from the King; "That since the people had declared for Henry, he acknowledged him for his Sovereign, and had no intention to do him any prejudice: That he was come to request the King for the restitution of his estate, not with an army to use force, but only with a few followers, to secure him from the malice of his enemies: That the Parliament should be the Judge of his cause, and desired only to have means to pass his days quietly, in the allegiance becoming a good subject: That however, the inhabitants of York should of all others be the last to deny him admittance, since his Lands in the County, as well as his Title of Duke of York rendered him their Countryman. In fine, he prayed them to remember the favors which, on several occasions, the City had received from his Family."

The Aldermen returned with this answer, which was not sufficient to satisfy the Magistrates, devoted as they were to the Earl of Warwick; but Edward's Adherents in the City, persuading the People, that it would be very cruel to refuse the gates to a Prince, who submitting himself to the King and Parliament, was only come to demand his Inheritance, there was such a Commotion, that the Magistrates were not able to appease it. All they could obtain of the People was, that Deputies should be sent to Edward to make Terms with him, in order to preserve, as far as possible, the Rights of the King, and save the City from plunder. The Deputies found Edward ready to promise whatever they desired. He protested he was sincere, and promised he would do no damage to the City, and always remain the King's faithful Subject. Whereupon the gates were opened to him, and entering the City, he went to the Cathedral, and confirmed his engagements with a solemn Oath. Every thing being thus transacted, on his part, with great mildness and moderation, he borrowed some Money of the Citizens, and leaving a Garrison, departed, in order for London. During his short stay at York, his army was greatly increased. He would not however have ventured to march towards London, had he not expected, it would continue to increase in his rout, and the Duke of Clarence perform his promise (3).

In the mean time, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were parted in order to assemble their Forces. Their design was afterwards to join their Troops into one Body, and set at their head the Prince of Wales, Son of Henry, who was expected from France. The Earl of Warwick thought, he had sufficient time to prepare and join the Duke of Clarence, because he did not doubt that his Brother Montague would be strong enough to stop Edward. But contrary to his Expectation, he heard that Montague had suffered him to pass without Opposition; and that his Army continually increased upon his rout with great numbers of Officers and Soldiers, that came to him from all Parts of the Kingdom. He was extremely surprized with this News, and could not tell what to think of Montague, who behaved so remissly in an affair of such Importance. He dissembled however, and after sending him express Orders to come and join him, and desiring the Duke of Clarence to advance with all possible diligence, resolved to incamp near Coventry, and there expect Edward. His design was to follow him in case he had the boldness to come between him and the Duke of Clarence, or amuse him in those parts till his two other Bodies were arrived. Indeed, Montague began his march to join his Brother, and the Duke of Clarence likewise advancing, kept within distance, as if he intended the same thing.

Mean while, Edward, who was now about Coventry (4), approached the Earl of Warwick's Intrenchments, with a shew of attacking them. The Earl finding himself weak, sent frequent Expresses to the Duke of Clarence, to desire him to advance with all possible expedition. But the Duke still found some excuse to defer the junction. Whilst the two Armies were thus in fight, and ready, in all appearance, to engage, the Duke of Gloucester, with a small Train, rid forth from the Camp of Edward his Brother, and without demanding a Safe-Conduct, went directly to the Duke of Clarence. At their first meeting, the two Brothers tenderly embraced one another. Then, after a short Conference, the Duke of Clarence having gained the principal Officers, caused Edward to be proclaimed in his army. The same day Edward headed his own Troops, and joined the Duke of Clarence with all the marks of a mutual Friendship.

This was a stunning Blow to the Earl of Warwick, The Duke of who little expected it. However, in spite of this misfortune, which would have discouraged any other man, he could not resolve to hearken to any proposals of agreement, though the Duke of Clarence offered him his mediation. But such a mediator, who had so openly betrayed him, could not but be suspected by him. As his army would be soon reinforced by Montague's Troops, and he was strongly intrenched, he did not think proper, too hastily to treat of an accommodation, which must have been very disadvantageous to him. Besides, he hoped that London, where he had left the Duke of Somerset (5), and the Archbishop of York (6), would shut her gates against Edward, if he appeared before the City. In that case, he was resolved to follow him, immediately after Montague's arrival, and force him, either to retire elsewhere, or join battle at the gates of the Capital, with a manifest disadvantage. But these measures proved not very judicious.

Presently after the junction of the two Brothers, it was debated, whether they should attack the Earl of Warwick in his Intrenchments, or march directly to London; and the last was deemed most convenient. First, because Edward having many friends in the City, it was likely, that seeing him approach with a powerful army, they would use their endeavours to procure him admittance, and the Earl of Warwick's distance would greatly facilitate their attempt. Secondly, nothing could be more for Edward's advantage than to have London on his side. He wanted Money, and could not easily find it elsewhere. Moreover, he could not absolutely rely upon his Restoration, so long as he was not master of the Metropolis. Lastly, it was of the utmost importance to have Henry in his power. He began therefore his march to London (7), leaving the Earl of Warwick behind him, not without danger of being reduced to great straits, in case the Londoners refused to receive him.

When the news reached London, that the two Brothers were joined, and approaching the City, the Earl of Warwick was given over for lost. This belief inspired the People with a terror which Edward's Friends carefully cherished, by aggravating the City's danger of being exposed to Edward's Indignation, unless it was averted by a speedy submission. At the same time, they that after Edward's flight had taken Sanctuary in Westminster-Abbey, came out and supported that Prince's Interest. On the other hand, those that were against him durst hardly open their mouths, for fear their endeavours should turn to their ruin. So, without waiting the Resolution of the Magistrates, the People were ready to open the gates to Edward, and run out to meet him (8). In vain did the Duke of Somerset and the Archbishop of York oppose this resolution; they were not heard. In vain did they promise the People, that the Earl of Warwick would come to their relief in three days: Edward's army, which was now at the gates of the City, wrought a contrary effect. In fine, Edward's Party prevailing, the People went out in crowds to receive him with acclamations, which, whether real or feigned, were to him of great service. Whilst Edward entered London the 11th of April, and immediately thanked the People for their Affection, and promised to have it in everlasting remembrance. He seconded this promise with several acts of Clemency, which entirely won him the hearts of the Citizens. Mean while, Henry, who had not found means to escape, nor perhaps so much as thought of it (1), was again imprisoned in the Tower, from whence he had been taken seven months before to re-mount the Throne.

Continuation of the Reign of EDWARD IV.

EDWARD had not time to make a long stay at London. Two days after his arrival, he departed to put himself at the head of his Army, hearing the Earl of Warwick was advanced to St. Albans. Undoubtedly the Earl was extremely embarrassed. He had decamped from Coventry, and marched with great diligence, in expectation that the City of London would keep Edward at least a few days before the Walls, and the news of his approach hinder the Inhabitants from receiving him. But he saw the Metropolis left, King Henry in prison, and the whole Kingdom, as it were, ready to declare for his Enemy. In this extremity there was no other refuge, but to fight and vanquish Edward. A Victory was the only means of restoring his Affairs. But on the other hand, though he had a good Army, it was far from being so strong as Edward's, which too continually increased, since his being master of London. Besides, the Conduct of the Marquis of Montague his Brother was so mysterious, he could not tell what to think of it. He remembered he entered with reluctance into the Project of detroning Edward, and had lately twice neglected to fight him, upon occasions where all hazards were to be run. It is true, he was come to join him, but this farther increased his suspicions. The Duke of Clarence his Son-in-law's example, made him apprehensive, his own Brother was corrupted. In this state of fear and uncertainty, he would willingly have dismissed him, if he had not been afraid of discouraging his army. In short, after many reflections upon the posture of his affairs, flight being difficult and dishonourable, and the success of the Battle yet uncertain, he concluded, his only way was to venture a Battle, and die honorably, if Victory declared for his enemy. But withal, he resolved to order it, that the Marquis his Brother should run the same fortune with him, since it was the event only that could assure him of his fidelity. In this resolution, he marched from St. Albans, and advancing to Barnet, which is but ten miles from London, met Edward, who was likewise advancing to fight. There, upon the 14th of April, being Easter-Day, a terrible Battle was fought, which decided the fate of the two Competitors. Edward had brought Henry with him, not daring to commit him to any one's custody. Thus, that unfortunate Prince seemed born only to be the sport of fortune. Happy in being, by his natural weakness of mind, less sensible of his misfortunes than any other would have been (2).

The Battle began early in the morning, and lasted till Noon. Never perhaps had two Armies been seen to fight with more bravery and obstinacy. Every one considering himself as a Rebel in case the Enemy was victorious, no favour was expected. The barbarity usually practised in civil Wars was well known, and more especially in this, where sundry revolutions in favour of both parties, had carried animosity to the highest degree. This probably was the true cause of the continuance of the Battle. The Earl of Warwick's Troops, though inferior in number (3), fought desperately, being determined, by the example of their General, either to conquer or die. They had even reason to hope, for some time, that victory was going to declare in their favour. Some Squadrons detached by the Earl of Warwick from the third line, gained so much ground upon their Enemies, that several posted to London with the news of their defeat. But Edward not losing the presence of Mind for necessary to a General on such perilous occasions, ordered a body of reserve to advance, who falling upon the victorious Enemies in the Flank, put them in extreme disorder. The small number of the Earl of Warwick's Troops suffered him not to make a detachment to oppose to that body. At the same time, the Earl of Oxford, who had beat back Edward's Troops, considering he had left the line where he was posted, too much exposed, wheeled about, to return to his Post. This precaution, though prudent, occasioned the Earl of Warwick's Defeat. The Earl of Oxford's Badge upon his arms and colours was a Star with Streams, and Edward's device was a Sun. A small Mist, which arose during the Battle, hindering the Earl of Warwick's Troops from discerning the difference, they furiously charged these Squadrons as they were returning to their Post, and put them to rout before the Earl of Oxford had time to remove their mistake. This bred an extreme confusion in the Army. Some imagining they were betrayed, because attacked by their own men, ran away to the Enemies. Others seeing them fly that way, thought themselves attacked in the rear, and knew not what course to take. Mean while, Edward improving this mistake, cut in pieces the Troops that were flying towards him. The Earl of Warwick perceiving the disorder, did his utmost to remedy it, but it was to no purpose. At last, willing to animate his Troops by his example, he rushed, tho' on foot, among the thickest of his Enemies, where he quickly fell, covered with wounds. The Marquis of Montague his Brother, desirous to rescue him, perished in the attempt a few moments after him. Thus ended the Battle about Noon, by the entire defeat of Warwick's Army, ten thousand whereof were slain on the spot (4). It is said, Edward, who in all the other Battles was wont to publish before the fight, that the common Soldiers should be spared, and the Officers put to the sword, had ordered now that no quarter should be given. The Earl of Oxford and the Duke of Somerset fled into Wales, to the Earl of Pembroke, who was levying Troops for the Earl of Warwick. The Duke of Exeter was left for dead among the slain, but coming to himself again, he crawled to the next house, from whence he found means to be carried to London, where he took sanctuary in Westminster Abbey.

Such was the success of this bloody Day, and such the end of the famous Earl of Warwick, who since the beginning of the quarrel between the Houses of Lancaster and York, had made in England the greatest Figure any Subject had ever done before him. In a word, he had made and unmade Kings as he pleased. Nothing more glorious could be said of a private Man, if true Glory consisted in excess of Power (5).

Edward having thus obtained a complete victory which seemed to secure him the Crown, returned to London (6), where he was triumphantly received. The Inhabitants could not sufficiently express their joy, to see themselves freed from the danger to which they would have been exposed, had the Earl of Warwick been conqueror. The King's first care was to return God thanks for the victory at St. Paul's Church; after which, he ordered the unfortunate Henry to be sent to his old prison. A few days after, he granted a Pardon to the Archbishop of York, probably not to incense the Clergy by the punishment of one of their principal Members. Besides, he remembered the great service that Prelate had done

He found sent into France to conduct her to England. All these Lords, with several other Officers of distinction, strove to comfort her and revive her hopes. They represented to her, "That she had no reason yet to despair; That indeed Edward was victorious, but might be vanquished again; That the Kingdom still abounding with friends to King Henry, it was not so difficult as the imagination to form a new Army capable of stopping the Usurper's progress: That as the gaining of one battle had restored him to the Throne, so the loss of another might cast him down: That the sundry revolutions for and against the two Houses, since the quarrel began, ought to teach her, that there was still hope, provided the would not by an unreasonable fear relinquish her own interests, with those of the King her Husband and the Prince her Son: That her Armies had been frequently victorious under her conduct, and it was by no means impossible that victory should once more incline to her side. Lastly, That all the world considered the Prince of Wales as undoubted Heir of the Crown, and by setting him at the head of the Army, there was still room to expect a happy revolution."

If Margaret was afraid to expose herself once more to the vicissitude of fortune, it was not upon her own account. The Prince her Son was the cause of all her uneasiness. Her tenderness for him made her feel all the fatal consequences of the undertaking proposed to her, in case it was not crowned with success. She plainly perceived, he could not attempt to recover the Crown of his Ancestors, without hazarding at the same time his own life, and that consideration was so grievous to her, as to hinder her coming to any resolution. In this perplexity, the proposed sending the Prince into France, that in case the enterprise succeeded, he might reap the benefit, and if it miscarried, might at least be in safety. But the Duke of Somerset represented to her, that it was chiefly upon the Presence of the Prince that her hopes could be founded, which alone would be capable of drawing multitudes into his service, and induce the Troops to fight valiantly for him. At length the Queen, after enduring a violent conflict in her Soul, between the fear of losing her Son, and the desire of procuring him a Crown which she believed his lawful right, consented to follow the advice of her friends.

This resolution being taken, it was agreed, that the Queen and Prince should retire to Bath, and the rest go and assemble their friends, with the remains of the Earl of Warwick's Army (2). The Earl of Pembroke undertook to levy an Army in Wales, where his interest was great, and immediately departed, only desiring the Duke of Somerset, who was to command in chief under the Prince of Wales, to run no hazard till joined by the Welsh. The suddenness wherewith all these Lords levied or assembled their Troops, would be most surprising, if in the first place, the astonishing effects usually produced by hatred and revenge, especially in civil Wars, were not considered. Secondly, it must be remembered, that the remains of the Earl of Warwick's Army having dispersed themselves after the Battle of Barnet, wanted only a Leader to head them. Lastly, as it was but a few days since the Battle, it was not yet known how the Conqueror would behave to the vanquished. So most having greater reason to expect severity than mercy, chose rather to venture again their Lives in a Battle, than run the risk of dying on the Gibbet and Scaffold. Be this as it will, it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the 27th of April, thirteen days after the Battle of Barnet, the Lancastrian Lords had now re-assembled an Army.

Upon the same day, as appears by the date, Edward issued out a Proclamation, setting forth, that his title to the Crown was unquestionable: First, by Reason: Secondly, by Authority of Parliament: Thirdly, by his Victories, and particularly the last, where the Marquis of Montague and the Earl of Warwick were slain. That notwithstanding these three most firm Foundations, namely, Reason, parliamentary Authority, and Victory, sundry Persons had taken Arms against him: But to avoid the effusion of more blood, he had thought proper to give his People a list of the names of those Persons who were pronounced Traitors and Rebels, that their encouragers might not complain if any mischief befel them. The Persons prohibited were, Margaret, styling herself Queen of England, Edward her Son, the Duke of Exeter, the Duke of Somerset, John Earl of Oxford, John Courtney Earl of Devonshire, William Viscount de Beaumont, John Beaufort Brother to the Duke of Somerset, Hugh Courtney, with eleven others.

Mean while, Edward lost not a moment. As the Troops were ready to march, he put himself at their head (3), to give his Enemies battle, before the Earl of Pembroke joined them with Welshmen. How diligent however the Lords in league with the Queen had been, they were far from being in so good posture as the King, because of their want of Arms and Ammunition. So, knowing that Edward was marching in quest of them, they resolved to retire into Wales, where the situation of the Country would help them to avoid fighting as long as they pleased. Besides, they expected to be joined very soon by the Earl of Pembroke, and then should be in condition to give battle. The point was to pass the Severn before the King overtook them, and for that purpose they marched to Gloucester (4). But that City refusing her gates (5), and there being no likelihood of taking it at the first Assault, much less of believing it in form, they resolved to pass the Severn at Tewksbury. Mean time, Edward so closely pursued them, that upon their Arrival at Tewksbury, they consulted, whether they should venture to pass the River, at the peril of seeing their rear put to rout, or intrench themselves in a Park adjoining to the Town, till the Earl of Pembroke arrived. The Queen, who thought only of saving the Prince, was for passing. Some others, more out of complaisance to her than for any good reason, seconded her opinion. But the Duke of Somerset strenuously opposed it. He represented the Duke of Somerset as against it. He would retire into Wales. Hall, Hollingh. The Queen is for passing the Severn. them, and cut in pieces those who should have the misfortune to be left behind: That such an accident, which seemed unavoidable, could not but prove very fatal, and discourage such as were still friends to the House of Lancaster: In fine, tho' their Army was inferior in number to that of the Enemy, that disadvantage might be repaired by intrenching in the Park, and drawing lines which would balance the superiority of his Troops. After mature deliberation, this opinion was thought most advisable, considering the circumstances of time and place. Historians, of whom few understand the art of War, have taxed the Duke of Somerset with imprudence and rashness, solely because they considered not the difficulty of passing a River like the Severn, with the Enemy in the rear. But if that General had been guilty of no other fault, perhaps the Queen's Affairs would have taken another turn. At least he might have waited the Earl of Pembroke's arrival (6), and by fighting upon equal terms, caused her Enemy to run his share of the peril. This the Sequel will demonstrate.

1471. The Resolution being taken of expecting Edward, the whole night was spent in making intrenchments round the Park, which were finished before day; so ardently was it laboured to be secured from surprize. Edward approaching to view them, judged it absolutely necessary to attack them, before they were rendered more impentable, and before the Arrival of the Earl of Pembroke, who was hourly expected. So, without loss of time, he drew up his Army in two lines. He gave the command of the first to the Duke of Gloucester his younger Brother, and headed the second himself with the Duke of Clarence. The Duke of Somerset ranged his Army behind the intrenchments, in three bodies, of which he commanded the foremost himself (1), in order to sustain the first shock. Wenlock (2) conducted the second, under Prince Edward, who was considered as the Commander in chief. The Earl of Devonshire (3) was placed at the head of the third. Edward taking a closer view of the intrenchments, perceived an opening to be left to go out upon occasion. This made him think, the Duke of Somerset hoped to repel the first charge, and if he observed any disorder among the assailants, had resolved to fallly out and improve the advantage. So, the more easily to draw him out of his lines, he ordered the Duke of Gloucester who was to begin the fight, to retreat with some precipitation, in case he met with too strong a resistance; and, if he was pursued, to face about, and vigorously attack his pursuers, in the assurance of being supported by all the rest of the army. This order was founded upon Edward's knowledge of the Duke of Somerset's intrepidity, and good opinion of himself.

Every thing being thus disposed, the Duke of Gloucester began the attack of the intrenchment with great vigour. But finding, the enemies stood their ground, and appeared every where ready to sustain his assaults, he retreated toward the second line, with a precipitation that made the Duke of Somerset believe the whole Body to be entirely disheartened. Then it was that the Duke, not being able to curb the impetuosity of his Courage, and thinking he ought to improve the present Advantage, sallied out of his intrenchments to press the enemy's army, which he imagined to be now in confusion. At the same time, he sent Wenlock word to come immediately to his support. Mean while, the Duke of Gloucester, who was again drawn up at a good distance from the intrenchments, seeing the Duke of Somerset advancing towards him in good order, saved him some part of the way. As he was sure of being supported by the King his Brother, who was not far off, he furiously fell upon the Troops that were marching against him, and by this vigorous and unexpected attack, so astonished them, that they saw no other refuge than to fly in disorder to their Camp. The Duke of Somerset was in a fury when he perceived himself unsupported. He had depended upon Wenlock, and instead of finding him without the intrenchments with the second line, to oppose the Duke of Gloucester, he saw him motionless, in the very place where he first drew up his Men. Not being able at this fight, to bridle his rage, he furiously rode up to him, and clove his skull with a Battle-Axe.

Mean time, the Duke of Gloucester entering the enemy's Camp together with the run-a-ways, made a terrible Slaughter. Wenlock being dead, the young Prince knew not what to do, and the Duke of Somerset transported with passion, was incapable of giving orders, and making himself obeyed. Thus confusion instantly spreading in the army, and the Kings, who closely followed the Duke his Brothers, entering likewise the Camp, the Queen's Troops thought only of saving themselves by flight, without making any farther resistance. It is said, the Queen was found in a Chariot, half dead with grief at the sight of her forlorn affairs, without knowing what was become of the Prince her Son, and was brought in that condition to King Edward. A Historian however affirms, it was not till a day or two after the Battle, that he was taken out of a Nunney where she had fled for refuge, and conducted to the King then at Worcester. In this Battle, by which the Crown was entirely secured to Edward, there fell on the Queen's side but three thousand, because the two last lines ran away without fighting. Among the slain were found the Earl of Devonshire and Sir John Beaufort Brother of the Duke of Somerset (4). The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Somerset (5), and the grand Prior of St. John's (6) were made Prisoners. But it would have been more happy for them to have died in the Battle, since they saved their lives only to lose them in a less honorable manner. The young Prince being brought into the King's presence, appeared before him with an undaunted countenance, without degrading himself by submissions unbecoming his birth. Edward was surprized, and still more, when, asking him how he came to be so rash thus to enter his Kingdom in arms; the Prince replied, That he was come to recover his own inheritance, which had been unjustly usurped. Edward, full of indignation at this boldness, struck him on the mouth with his gantlet, and turned from him. This was, as it were, the signal to take away the life of that unfortunate Prince. It is said, immediately upon the King's withdrawing, the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester his Brothers, the Earl of Dorset (7), and the Lord Hastings, fell like wild beasts upon the young Prince, and stabbed him with their daggers. It is certain, he was murdered that instant, and probably, the King had given orders beforehand for that barbarous execution. But I do not know, whether the Historians are to be credited, who affirm, these four Lords killed him with their own hands. This Remark upon might be an effect of the prejudice of those that wrote the history, after the restoration of the house of Lancaster, since it is certain they have forgot nothing to render the house of York odious. It is likely however, the murder was committed in the presence of the fore-mentioned Lords. Some say, the Prince escaping out of the Battle, the King offered a pension of five hundred pounds Sterling, to any Person that should bring him dead or alive, promising, if he was alive, not to put him to death: That upon this promise Sir Richard Crofts, in whose hands he was fallen, brought him to the King, who performed not his word. This Prince lost his life at eighteen years of age (8). Next day the Duke of Somerset, and the Somerset grand Prior of the order of St. John were beheaded (9). Queen Margaret was confined in the Tower, where she remained a Prisoner till 1475, when Lewis XI. ransomed her for fifty thousand crowns (10). Such was the sad catastrophe of this Princess, who, for attempting to rule England with an absolute sway, caused a great effusion of English blood, and wrought her own as well as the ruin of the King her Spouse, of the Prince her Son, and of all the house of Lancaster, of which there remained but a single branch in the Person of the Earl of Richmond. There was, it seems, a sort of fatality with regard to the Kings of England, that married the Daughters of France. Edward II. Richard II. Henry VI and Charles I. were the only Kings that espoused French Princesses (11), and they all four underwent the same fate, three of them by the fault of their Queens.

The Battle of Tewkesbury fought on the 4th of May (12), eighteen days after that of Barnet, was the twelfth since the beginning of the quarrel between the two Houses. But it was not the last, though followed by no other in the rest of this reign.

Whilst Edward was employed in pursuing the Queen, there arose a fresh enemy against him. Thomas Nevill of Fauconbridge, known by the name of the Bastard of Fauconbridge, because he was natural Son to the Lord of that name, had been made Vice-Admiral of the Channel, during the Earl of Warwick's Administration, to whom he adhered. The Earl being dead, and King Edward re-inthroned, the Bastard had lost his place. As he was a Man of ill morals and without means, he saw no other way to subsist than turning Pirate. When he found the King employed in the West in pursuit of the Queen, he assembled some Ships, and many Persons of desperate fortunes, with whom he came upon the Coast of Kent, not imagining the War, newly kindled, would so quickly end. His design was to surprize London, and enrich himself with the plunder of the City. Accordingly, he began his march towards London (13), giving out, that he only intended to free King Henry from captivity. On this pretence, drawing in many adherents of the house of Lancaster, he formed an army of seventeen thousand Men. He presently became master of Southwark. At the same time, he ordered part of his Troops (14) to pass the Thames, and assault two of the City gates (15), whilst himself attempted to force the bridge. But the Citizens having had notice of it, he 1471. his march, were upon their guard, and repulsed him on all sides. In the mean while, the Bastard hearing of the success of the Battle of Tewkesbury, and knowing the King was diligently marching to London (1), retired in good order to Sandwich, where he fortified himself. Edward being come to London, passed through the City without staying, and marched to Canterbury, where the Bastard sent him word he was ready to submit, upon certain terms which were immediately granted him. The King even knighted him, and made him Vice-Admiral of the Channel as before. But he did not long enjoy these favours. Shortly after, he was beheaded, either for new, or the old, crimes.

The King pardoned him; and afterwards cut off his head.
The Bishop of Winchester is pardoned.
Abb. Pub. XL. p. 711.
Edward arriving at London the 21st of May, after two Victories in less than three weeks, granted an absolute pardon to William Waistest Bishop of Winchester (2), a zealous Lancastrian. But he had not the same generosity for King Henry, head of that house. The innocent life of that unhappy Prince, seemed to screen him from the cruelty of his victorious enemy. It was doubtless upon that account, Edward had twice before spared his Life. Nay, it is very probable, he would have suffered him to die a natural death, had he believed it consistent with his safety. But he was afraid he should never enjoy a settled repose, so long as that Prince was alive; and this consideration made him resolve to dispatch him. It was properly Queen Margaret that hastened her Husband's death by her last attempt to re-inthronize him. If she had won the Battle of Tewkesbury, and taken Edward prisoner, it is scarce to be doubted, that she would have put him to death on the Scaffold. She ought not therefore to think it very strange, that the ill success of her enterprize fell upon the heads of her Husband and Son. It is even very probable, she was herself indebted to her Sex for her own life. However this be, Edward resolving to sacrifice Henry to his safety, ordered the Duke of Gloucester, to whom all the Historians unanimously give the character of a brutish and bloody Prince, to put him to death in Prison. It is pretended, this Prince would be the Father's, as he had been the Son's executioner, and that entering his room he himself stabbed him to the heart. But as I observed, it is necessary to receive with some caution what the Historians say of the Princes of the House of York (3).

Death of Henry VI. Hall. Hollingsh. Stow.
His Character.
Thus died Henry VI. in the fiftieth year of his age, after a reign of thirty eight years before he was dethroned, and of seven months only after his restoration. Never had Prince been the occasion, though innocently, of more bloody Tragedies, or caused more blood to be spilt in his quarrel. Though his natural weakness rendered him unfit to govern his Kingdom, and for that reason, he always gave himself up to the guidance of others, he had some good qualities, which after his death, were extolled for virtues of the first class, on purpose to render the more odious the person that deprived him of his Crown and Life. All that can truly be said of this Prince, is, that considering him in his private capacity, his life was innocent, or at least, free from the crimes but too common in the world. But if he is considered as a Sovereign he will appear in his whole life, to have acted neither good nor bad. He founded Eaton College near Windsor, and King's College in Cambridge, for the benefit of Eaton Scholars. These two foundations are still in being. After his death, his body was brought to St. Paul's, where it was some time exposed to publick view; after which it was interred without any pomp, in a Village near London (4).

His Foundations.
A. 7. Pub. XL. p. 56. Hollingsh. Hall.
The twelve Battles, fought since the year 1455; and the consequent barbarous executions, had reduced the House of Lancaster to two persons only, namely, Margaret, (Daughter of John Duke of Somerset, Wife of Edmund Tudor Earl of Richmond, half-brother of Henry VI.) and Henry Earl of Richmond her Son. Margaret had two other Husbands, Henry Earl of Stafford, and Thomas Stanley, but had Children by neither. I mention not Charles Somerset, from whom the Earls of Worcester were derived, because being only natural Son of the Beaufort-Somerset Family (5), he could have no Title to the Crown.

The Family of Beaufort-Somerset.
Jasper Tudor Earl of Pembroke, Uncle of the young Earl of Richmond, not having been speedy enough to be present at the battle of Tewkesbury, was not a little embarrassed. As he found himself too weak to support alone the Interests of the House of Lancaster, he dismissed his Troops, and kept with the Earl of Richmond his Nephew in Wales, where he had many friends and great credit. Edward passionately desired to have in his power these two Lords, the only persons that could give him any farther disturbance. To accomplish this design, it was by no means proper to march his Troops against them. Besides that this would warn them to leave the Kingdom, it was not easy even to seize their persons, in a Country where they had as many friends as there were Inhabitants. So believing policy to be more serviceable than force, he sent into those parts Roger Vaughan, with orders to use all ways to seize or kill them. Vaughan not having been so secret as he ought, the Earl of Pembroke, who had notice of his design, pretending to fall into the Villain's Snare, slew him, and retired to Pembroke Castle (6), from whence he departed with Henry his Nephew, and embarked in a Vessel which was to carry them to France. Mean while, the winds driving them upon the coast of Bretagne, they were forced to put into a Port of that Country. Their design was to go to Paris, but as they could not be excused waiting on the Duke of Bretagne, when they would have taken their leave, they were told, they were not at liberty to pursue their Voyage. The Duke judging these two Lords might be of some advantage to him, assigned them the Town of Vannes for their habitation, with an honorable allowance. Mean while, though they outwardly received all the respect due to their Birth and Quality, they were, however, very narrowly watched.

Edward gets the Lords to the Duke of Bretagne.
Edward seeing himself perfectly restored, without any appearance of being again disturbed, in the possession of a Crown acquired with so much pains, assembled the Lords to his Spiritual and Temporal at Westminster (7). There, in a studied Speech, wherein he endeavoured to display the Title of the House of York to the Crown, and forgot not his Victories, he expressed his desire, that they would take the Oath to Prince Edward his Son, as to his apparent Successor, to which he found them all inclined. The two Archbishops, eight Bishops, five Dukes, with all the Earls and Lords there present took this Oath on the 3d of July. Many former examples had demonstrated the little use of such a precaution, and without going any farther, Edward might have remembered his Father's Oath to Henry VI., as well as his own at York. He was persuaded however, that people would be more scrupulous to him. But after his death, his Children unhappily experienced how little such assurances are to be depended upon.

Edward grants to seven Bishops.
Shortly after, Edward granted a pardon to seven Bishops (8), who had declared against him in the late revolution. From the beginning of his reign to the end, he always endeavoured to carry it fair with the Clergy. The rest of the year was spent in sundry Negotiations, which I shall briefly mention.

King of Scotland.
The first was with the King of Scotland. During the troubles in England, the Truce between the English and Scots had been frequently violated, contrary to the intention of the two Kings. After Edward's restoration, the King of Scotland sending Ambassadors to him, it was agreed, to hold a Congress at Amwick, the 24th of September, for a mutual reparation of the outrages committed by the two Nations upon one another. The two Kings were equally desirous to preserve the Truce, and even to conclude a final Peace. This Negotiation however, was not ended till 1473. It appears in the Collection of the

(4) His Body was bought, in an open Coffin, on May 29, through Cornhill, with a great Company of armed Men, to St. Paul's Church, where it was exposed, for one whole day, to publick view. The next day it was removed to the Black-Friars; and thence, without Priest or Cleric, Torch or Taper, Singing or Saying, conveyed to the Monastery of Chertsey in Surrey; but it was afterwards removed by Edward IV., or according to others by Richard III., in the second year of his reign, to Windsor, and there buried. A Monument was erected for him, of which there are, at present, no remains. Hall, fol. 253. Stow, p. 424. Sandford, p. 56.

And the Lords Spiritual and Temporal granted towards the furniture aforesaid, the tenth part of one whole year's Revenue, of all and singular their Possessions. The Truce between France
and England 1475-1476
p. 736-737

On the 30th of September, the thirty years Truce with Bretagne was confirmed. This confirmation was necessary, as the Truce, during the Earl of Warwick's Administration, had been often violated.

The Earl of Warwick
p. 731-732

Lewis XI was very lenient Edward had no reason to be pleased with him; but however he offered him a Truce, That with Henry VI being of no force, now Edward was restored. In the present situation of the English Affairs, it was by no means proper for Edward to renew the war with France. His Kingdom was too much exhausted, to think so early of such an undertaking. So, without much intreaty, he agreed to continue the Truce, from the 1st of September this year, to the 1st of May following. This was only whilst he prepared to be revenged of Lewis, for afflicting Queen Margaret.

1472. The year 1472 abounded not with so many important and remarkable events as the last. It was almost wholly spent in divers Negotiations, tending to secure the Tranquillity of the King and Kingdom, by Truces or Alliances with foreign Princes.

P. 735.

The Negotiation with Scotland still continued, though slowly, by reason of the obstacles which occurred in the reparations demanded by each King.

Differences
the English
and French
p. 731-732

It appears in several papers of the Collection of the Publick Acts, that some dispute arose concerning the Truce of Commerce for thirty years, between England and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions. Probably, during the Earl of Warwick's Administration, the English had injured the Duke's trading Subjects. These last demanded reparation for sundry damages sustained, affirming, the Truce was to be considered as made with England, and not with the person of the reigning King. Edward on his part did not think himself obliged to repair the damages done to the Flemings, during the Earl of Warwick's Ministry. But these differences properly concerned only the Merchants of the two Nations. As for the two Princes, it was for both their Interests to live in a good understanding. Wherefore in treating of the outrages committed against the Truce, they did not fail to negotiate a final Peace.

Negotiations with the Hanse Towns
p. 739

An affair of much the same nature with the Hanse Towns (1), created the King likewise some trouble. These Towns, whereof Lubeck, Hamburg, and Danzick, were the three principal, had obtained of the Kings of England several Privileges for their Merchants, because their Commerce was very advantageous to the English. But under the frequent changes of the Government during the Civil War, the English had injured the Merchants of these Towns, and violated their Privileges several ways. Whereupon these last had obtained of their Magistrates Letters of Mart, which had turned these differences into an open War, destructive to both Sides. At length, the troubles in England being ended, the Hanse Towns sent Ambassadors to the King, to demand satisfaction for their losses, and to propose a renewal of Alliance, to confirm their Privileges, and secure the Trade and Navigation of the English in the northern Seas. Edward received the Ambassadors very civilly, and appointed Commissioners, who after several Conferences, agreed with them, that a Congress should be held at Utrecht, to settle all things to the satisfaction of both parties. But this affair was so full of difficulties, that it could not be ended till 1474.

Alliance with Portugal
p. 741

Some time after, Edward, by his Letters Patents confirmed the antient Alliance between Richard II, and John King of Portugal, for them and their Successors. Alphonso King of that Country sent him the like Letters, dated the 30th of August.

The Earl of Oxford taken and imprisoned at Hamme

Whilst Edward was endeavoring to secure his Peace, by renewing the Truces or Alliances with foreign Princes, the return of the Earl of Oxford into England, gave him the fresh cause of uneasiness. The Earl, great favourer of the House of Lancaster, had retired into France, after the battle of Tewkesbury. But as he was not very favourably received by Lewis XI, he was returned into England (2) with seventy five Men, and had taken by surprise St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall. Edward, ever apprehensive that the least spark might re-ignite the flames he happily extinguished, ordered some Troops to march immediately into the West, and invited the Earl of Oxford to the Mount. But as the Earl had not time to provide against a Siege, he surrendered (3) before he was reduced to extremity. All he could obtain, was his Life only, but he lost his Liberty and Estate, which was all confiscated, without any allowance to his Countess, sister of the Earl of Warwick, for her Subsistence. From St. Michael's Mount, he was conducted to the Castle of Hamme near Calais, where he remained Prisoner twelve years.

The Archbishop of York had much the same fate. Though the King had pardoned him, and received his Oath at London the day before the battle of Barnet; he was Brother of the Earl of Warwick, and that was sufficient to render him suspected. So, notwithstanding the Pardon, he was confined in the Castle of Guines, where he died soon after (4).

The King had no considerable enemy left in the Kingdom but Henry Holland Duke of Exeter, who had taken Sanctuary at Westminster after the battle of Barnet. Growing weary of his Confinement, he employed his Wife, being Edward's Sister, to obtain his pardon. They had lived separate, ever since the beginning of the Civil Wars, because the Duke, whose Grandmother was Sister of Henry IV, adhered to the Lancastrian Party, and his Duchess had continued with the King her Brother. This Princess, instead of suing for her Husband's Pardon, desired, on the contrary, to be legally divorced, and though she had no lawful reason, obtained her desire. Probably, the King's Solicitation was very fervent to her. Thus the Duke of Exeter saw himself forced to remain in his Sanctuary, without any hopes of pardon, or any thing to subsist upon, but what was privately sent him by his friends. At last, not bearing to live thus immured, he left the place, without its being known how or when. It is only known, that in 1474, he was found dead upon the Seashore in the County of Kent.

Edward having nothing more to fear, after the death, imprisonment, or exile, of all the principal friends of the House of Lancaster, gave too great a loofe to his revenge, upon persons of an inferior rank, whom he ought not to have dreaded. Some were put to death, and others fined immoderately, as a punishment for taking Arms against him. But what troubled him most, was the escape of the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond. He seemed to foresee the evil that was to befall his family from that quarter. The Earl of Richmond, as I said, the only remaining branch of the House of Lancaster, or rather, the only person that could pretend to dispute the Crown with Edward, as being Son of a Princess of that House. He had with him the Earl of Pembroke his Uncle, who was a Lord of great Merit, and very capable to direct him. Though they were both absent, and as Prisoners in Bretagne, they made the King very uneasy, who wished to see the quarrel between the two Houses entirely ended, by the death of the young Earl, to whom all the Rights of the House of Lancaster, were fallen. For that purpose, he sent Ambassadors to the Duke of Bretagne, intreating him to deliver the two English Lords he had in his power; but the Duke very civilly desired to be excused. He promised however to guard them so carefully, that they should never be able to hurt him. Upon this consideration Edward paid him yearly a large Pension, under colour of a maintenance for the two Prisoners.

All this while the Negotiation with Scotland was continued, and as great difficulties occurred, it was agreed between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings, that the Truce should subsist till July 1473.

After Edward had settled his affairs to his mind, he remembered the honorable and hearty reception he had met with in Holland, from Lewis de Bruges Lord of Gruthuyse, and resolved to make him an acknowledgment. To that end, having so managed it, that the Parliament petitioned him to create that foreign Lord a Peer of England, he made him Earl of Winchester, and afterwards by Letters Patents, allowed him to bear the Arms of England in his Scutcheon.

Before I finish what relates to the events of this year, it will be necessary briefly to mention how matters stood between Lewis XI, and the Duke of Burgundy. The knowledge of their disputes is very requisite for the understanding of the History of England. Lewis, as I said, at the instance

(1) These are certain Towns in Germany confederate for the Benefit of Trade. They are so called from the word Hanse, signifying Alliance. Bruges in Lower Saxony, is said to have been the Founder of this Confederacy, about the year 1164. How many Towns were admitted at first is not known: But the design so visibly prospered, that most of the chief trading places in Europe, to the number of above two, entered into this Confederacy. In the flourishing times of their Alliance, these Hanse Towns had four general Assemblies, viz. London, Bruges, in Flanders, Legation in Norway, and Norwegen in Russia. At present, the Hanse Towns are in a manner reduced to three, viz. Lubeck, Hamburg, and Bremer, in Germany, and Cologne.

(4) One day as he was hunting with the King at Windsor, the King told him, he would come and hunt with him at 10 was called the Arrow in Hertfordshire. According to the Account he made great preparations, and bought a good deal of Plate from his Friends: But the day before the word was to come, the Archbishop was apprehended, and all his Goods and Effects, valued at twenty thousand Pounds, seized to the King's use. 1472. of the Duke of Bretagne, and the Constable de St. Pol, who fought only to deceive him, had begun the war with the Duke of Burgundy, and taken from him Amiens, and St. Quentin. As he did not want good Spies, he discovered at length, that he was engaged in that war, solely for the accomplishment of the projected Marriage between the Duke of Guienne his Brother, and the Duke of Burgundy's Daughter. In order therefore to free himself at once from the troubles that were designed to be raised by means of his Brother, he caused a poison to be given him, which was to operate slowly, that his death might be ascribed to a common distemper. Mean while, for fear the Duke of Burgundy, finding himself too much pressed, should take new measures with the Duke of Bretagne and the Constable, he sent to offer him a Truce. The Duke could wish for nothing more advantageous in his present Circumstances. But as he had reason to fear, the offer was designed only to amuse him, Lewis gave the Duke of Bretagne full power to conclude the Truce in his name. As this last could not refuse to undertake this affair, without discovering himself, he sent the Bishop of Leon in quality of Mediator, to Cambray, where the Treaty was to be negotiated. Both Parties were so willing to agree, that it was not possible for the Bishop to find any way to hinder the signing of a Truce for thirteen Months, from the first of April 1472, to the first of May 1473. About six weeks after the conclusion of the Truce, the Duke of Guienne died, and Lewis took possession of that Duchy without opposition.

The Duke of Burgundy perceived then, that Lewis had granted him a Truce only to have time to secure Guienne, and that, upon all occasions, he should be that Prince's Dupe, when their affairs were determined by way of Negotiation. So, being highly provoked to see himself thus amused, and finding, that with such enemies, the surest way is to act with open force, and make them at least run an equal share of the danger, he entered France, and destroyed whatever he met in his way with fire and sword. The Duke of Bretagne seeing his projects vanishing by the death of the Duke of Guienne, resolved ferociously to join with the Duke of Burgundy, being persuaded that the preservation of Both depended upon their strict Union. Mean while, Lewis perceiving the Duke of Bretagne would not fail to take that course, had already sent Troops into Anjou, to keep him in awe.

While Lewis was still employed in Guienne, the Duke of Burgundy made some progress in Picardy, and took Niſle and Roye. But unfortunately, he lost two whole months before Beauvais, without taking the place. This accident was the cause, that Lewis not perceiving himself much pressed left his Troops in Anjou. So, the Duke of Bretagne not daring to stir from his Country, was prevented from joining his Ally according to agreement. At length, the Duke of Burgundy raising the Siege of Beauvais, came into Normandy, in expectation of the Duke of Bretagne. Mean time, Lewis was a little embarrassed. By leaving his Troops in Anjou, he exposed Picardy and Normandy to the Duke of Burgundy's attack, and if he marched to the assistance of these two Provinces, he left the Duke of Bretagne free to make a powerful diversion in his neighbourhood. But he soon freed himself from this difficulty. By the help of the Duke of Bretagne's Ministers, whom he gained to his interest, he found means to make a Truce with that Prince (1), and persuade him to renounce the Duke of Burgundy's alliance. This unexpected defection obliged the Duke of Burgundy to accept of a Truce offered him by Lewis, and which was frequently prolonged.

Before we enter upon the events of the year 1473, it must be observed, that all the English Historians are mistaken in a whole year, placing in this what happened in the next. Biondi, the Italian author I have sometimes quoted, owns, the French place in the year 1475, what the English fix to the year 1474, and adds, that he chuses to follow the English, and so is guilty of their mistake. The Collection of the Publick Acts shows it so plainly, that there is no reason to question it. Indeed, the year 1473 was so barren of events, that it is not very strange if it was confounded or joined with the following. The affairs which ought to be assigned to the year 1473, though they are of little moment in themselves, they serve to distinguish these two years and rectify the Chronology.

The King of Portugal demanding the restitution of certain Portuguese Vessels taken by the English, enquiry was made, whereby it appeared that these Ships were plundered by the Bastard of Faucenbridge during his revolt against Edward. For which reason the King of Portugal desisted from his demand.

The affairs with Scotland employed Edward good part of this year. At length by a Treaty concluded at Alnwick the 28th of September, it was agreed, the Truce of Newcastle should be inviolably observed by both the Nations.

The differences Edward had with the Hanse Towns were also decided, at the congress of Utrecht the 19th of September (2).

There were likewise some negotiations, concerning the thirty years Truce of Commerce between England and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions; but it does not appear that any thing was concluded in the affair, which, probably, was only a pretence for more secret and important Negotiations, as will be seen presently.

The Alliance between England and Denmark being often violated during the confusion of the Civil Wars in England, the two Sovereigns were equally desirous to renew it. To that end they agreed, that without inquiring into the mutual damages, the English and Danes had done one another, the Alliance should remain upon the same foot as before the violation.

This is all worth notice in the Collection of the Publick Acts for the Year 1473. Let us proceed now to the following year, which will afford us more plenty of Matter.

The Duke of Burgundy, as I said, obtained a Truce which was afterwards prolonged two or three times till 1475. During this Truce, he employed his time in conquering the Duchy of Geldres. Arnold Duke of that name, being displeased with Adolphus his Son, who had for some time kept him in Prison (3), made a grant of his Duchy to the Duke of Burgundy. Upon this pretence entering Geldres, he defeated Adolphus, and taking him Prisoner seized upon the Duchy.

This acquisition exciting him to new conquests, he considered how to enlarge his Dominions on the side of Germany, and formed projects too vast, and too difficult to be performed. Mexerai says, he promised his Daughter in marriage to Maximilian Son of the Emperor Frederic, upon condition his Dominions should be erected into a Kingdom. He adds, this affair miscarried, because the Duke would have the condition performed before the marriage, in order to sign the contract as King; but the Emperor would have the marriage consummated first. Be this as it will, the Duke forming the project of extending his Dominions in Germany, embraced the first opportunity to carry his arms into that Country. A dispute concerning the Archbishop of Colign arising between Robert of Bavaria, and the Brother of the Landgrave of Hesse, furnished him with the wanted pretence. He immediately took the Prince of Bavaria's part, and laid Siege to Nuz, a strong Town in the Archbishoprick of Colign. He reckoned, the taking of that place would promote the execution of his other designs.

The Truce with the King of France being to last till June 1475, the Duke of Burgundy hoped to be master of Nuz before it was expired. But Lewis put such obstacles in his way, that he could not execute his designs so soon as he imagined. Lewis so managed by his intrigues, that the Emperor Frederic drew together a strong Army, to oblige the Duke to raise the Siege. The Duke of Lorraine, the Duke of Austria, the Switzers, entered into a league against him; so that finding himself extremely embarrassed to resist so many enemies, he remained ten months before Nuz, without being able to take it. While he was employed in the Siege, he saw no other way to free himself from the persecutions of his enemy, than to engage the King of England to make a powerful diversion in France. For that purpose, he sent Ambassadors to Edward, to persuade him to make War upon their common enemy. The better to engage him in this undertaking, he promised to join him with all his forces, the moment he landed in Picardy. He made him hope likewise, that the Constable de St. Pol would deliver him St. Quentin, the Duke of Bretagne league with them, and by the help of that Prince's adherents in France, he would put the Kingdom in such confusion, that the conquest of it would be rendered much easier than in the reign of Charles VI.

This was precisely the opportunity impatiently expected by Edward, to be revenged of Lewis XI. Every thing seemed to conspire to the downfall of that restless and turbulent Prince, since he was going to be attacked by three formidable powers, without reckoning his danger from his own Subjects. And indeed, if all his enemies had acted with the same ardour as Edward, he would doubtless have run the hazard of seeing his affairs in great disorder. But, on all appearance, the Duke of Burgundy only intended to ingage Edward to make a diversion in France, in order to prevent Lewis from disturbing him in Germany. However this be, acting as if he really designed to undertake the conquest of France jointly with the King of England, he gave very ample powers to his Ambassadors to treat with him upon that head. The Plenipotentiaries of the two Princes having settled all the Articles, signed about the end of July several Treaties concerning this important undertaking.

The first was a Treaty of Amity, Alliance, and Confederacy between the King of England and Duke of Burgundy, mutually promising to assist one another to the utmost of their power.

The second contained certain private conventions concerning the War they were to carry into France, comprised in the eight following Articles :

I. That Edward should pass into France at the head of ten thousand Men at least, all well armed and well appointed, before the 1st of July, 1475, to recover the Duchies of Guienne and Normandy, and the whole Kingdom of France.

II. That the Duke of Burgundy should assist him in Person with all his forces.

III. That the King should hearken to no proposal of Peace or Truce without the Duke's consent.

IV. The Duke of Burgundy promised likewise the same thing.

V. That the two Princes should cause the War to be proclaimed, each in his Dominions, against Lewis as their common enemy.

VI. That immediately after the War was begun or proclaimed, the two Allies should attack the common enemy, in the most convenient places, in such manner however as to be within distance to assist one another.

VII. That in case one of the two Princes should besiege some Town, or be forced to give Battle, the other should be obliged to join him with all his forces, and at his own charges, that both might run the same hazard. That their Lieutenants should be bound to the same thing.

VIII. That when the War was once commenced, neither should desist so long as the other should desire to continue it. That if one was absent, his Lieutenant should be obliged to obey the other, in whatever concerned the common good of the two Allies.

The third Treaty contained an explication of one of the Articles of the first, where it was said that each of the two Allies should assist the other with all his Forces. As this explication was too general, they agreed upon the Number (1) and Pay of the Troops they were to supply (2).

The fourth was a grant from Edward to the Duke of Burgundy of several Provinces of France, in consideration of the future services of that Prince, in aiding him to recover the whole Kingdom. This grant included the Duchy of Bari, the Earldoms of Champagne, Nevers, Reims, Eu, Guise, the Barony of Dunois, with all the Towns on both sides the Somme; and lastly, all the Lands possessed by the Earl of St. Pol and held of Guienne, Normandy, or the Crown of France. Moreover, he renounced the Homage of all diets Provinces, as well as of Burgundy, the Earldoms of Charolais and Mâcon, of Flanders, Artois, and in general of all the Territories the Duke was actually possessed of, or acquired by this grant. Finally, he added, his intent was, that this grant or conveyance should be as firm as if consented to by the Estates, promising to procure their confirmation of the whole, as soon as he was in possession of the Crown of France.

The fifth was an agreement, whereby the Duke of Burgundy engaged to furnish for the War, an Army of between ten and twenty thousand Men. The King promised on his part, to assign him yearly the pay of these Troops upon the Provinces included in the foregoing grant, in case they were conquered, and if not, upon other Demesnes of the Crown, in proportion to what should be wanted: That if the assignment of the pay was not made before the end of every year, he agreed, the Duke should not be obliged to find any Troops the Year following.

The sixth and last Act was in form of Letters Patents, whereby the Duke of Burgundy agreed that Edward and his Successors Kings of France, should have free Liberty to enter Rheims in order to be crowned, and depart without any impediment. This Act was necessary, because Champagne was included in the grant.

This was properly felling the Bear's skin before he was killed. However, it is not very difficult to discover the Motives of the conduct of these two Princes, since it is certain they both intended to deceive one another. They were both too wise, to expect to conquer France with the stipulated Forces. But the Duke of Burgundy, meant to ingage Edward to make a powerful follocation in that Kingdom, by persuading him, it would be very easy to conquer it. Edward feigned on his part to be assured with these hopes, the better to ingage the Duke of Burgundy to lend him a sufficient supply, to recover Guienne and Normandy. This is neither the first nor the last time that Princes have played Counterfits in their Treaties.

Edward having signed all these Treaties, began seriously to make preparations for the intended War. His first care was to assemble a Parliament (3), which readily granted him a subsidy. Since the Reign of Edward III, the Parliaments seldom wanted much sollicitation to grant money for a War with France. As soon as Edward saw himself supported by his Parliament, he issued out Commissions to levy a much greater number of Troops, than what he had promised to supply by his Treaty with Burgundy. Indeed as the War was upon his account, it was his part to exert himself answerably to the greatness of the undertaking. Whilst he was hastening his preparations, he sent ambassadors to divers Courts, as well to make alliances with several Princes, as to endeavour to hinder their union with his Enemy. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he sent to the Emperor Frederick, to Ferdinand King of Sicily, to the King of Hungary, and some others, to ingage them to enter into the League.

At the same time, he secured himself against any diversions from the Scots, by concluding a marriage between Cecily his second Daughter, and the King of Scotland's eldest Son. The first overture concerning this Marriage was made in the beginning of the year, and it was afterwards negotiated in divers conferences between the plenipotentiaries of the two Kings. At length, it was concluded the 30th of July, and October the 18th the young Prince and Princess were affianced by Proxies. Some days after (4), the Truce of Newcastle, which was to last till 1579, was again ratified at Edinburgh. As the affianced Couple were yet too young, it was agreed the Marriage should be accomplished as soon as they were both of fit age; and in the mean while, Edward should pay at several times his Daughter's Dowry, consisting of twenty thousand Marks Sterling.

Edward having thus secured himself against the diversions his Enemy might have caused, continued his Preparations, with great hopes of succeeding in his designs. The Subsidy granted by the Parliament not seeming sufficient, or part of it perhaps being applied to other uses, he borrowed Money of all his Subjects that were known to be rich. Some contributed cheerfully; others were gained by the King's Flatteries; and some feared to incur his displeasure, and perhaps some Violence in case they refused. In general, there were but few who dared to disobey. This sort of Aid levied after this manner was called by the new Name of Benevolence; intimating that private Persons had granted it freely and of their own accord. Mean while, these Loans raised without Authority of Parliaments, were of a very dangerous consequence: But as it was to make war upon France, there was no murmurs. It is reported, the King himself asking a rich Widow what she would lend him, she replied, She could not refuse twenty thousand Sterling to a Prince who borrowed with so good a Grace. The King, as much pleased with the Lady's Boldness as her present, very courteously gave her a Kiss, which she took as such an honour, that she doubled the sum she had promised.

Amongst the new-raised Troops there were three thousand Men designed for the Duke of Bretagne, pursuant to a secret Treaty between him and Edward. That Prince however had lately changed into a perpetual Peace the

(1) Which was to be six thousand Men.

(2) If either Party wanted Troops for his own Defence, he was to pay two thousand four hundred Men out of those six thousand, and he that wanted them was to pay the remaining three thousand six hundred. But if they were wanted for any other occasion, he that employed them was to pay them alone. Rymer's Fed. Tom. ii. p. 809.

(3) This was no new Parliament, but the same as first met on October 6, in the 12th year of this King's Reign, and is mentioned at ve. It was by James Parliaments continued to the 6th of June, 1475, when it granted the King one Tenth, and one Fifteenth; and fifty one thirteenth pence and seventy Pounds, four Shillings and seven-pence three Farthings, in full payment of the Wages of the fourteen thousand Archers and Peasants, towards the payment whereof every County, City, and Town, was severally taxed. This Parliament was summoned till March 14.

Every thing being ready for the Army's departure, Edward embarked at Sandwich the 20th of June (2), having appointed the Prince of Wales his Son, but five years old, Guardian of the Realm in his absence. A Historian affirms, he found at Dover five hundred transports sent by the Duke of Burgundy, which is not very likely. Mezerai says, on the contrary, that the English Troops spent three weeks in passing to Calais, which is a sign, there were but few Vessels, or a very great number of Troops. Philip de Commines assures, never did King of England lead into France so strong an Army. But this is speaking hyperbolically, or not exactly according to truth. It is certain, this Army was not comparable for number, to that, led by Edward III into France a little before the Treaty of Bratigny (3). However, it is not easy to know the precise number of the Troops, since the Historians only mention the number of the Horse, without speaking of the Foot. But if we judge by the usual proportion in those days, when the Cavalry was much more relied on than the Infantry, this Army was not so numerous as it is pretended, since there were but fifteen hundred Men at arms, and fifteen thousand Archers on Horseback. Besides, by Edward's Treaty with the Duke of Burgundy, he was obliged to find but ten thousand Men. In fine, it will be seen in the sequel, that he made peace with Lewis without opening the Campaign, when he found he could not depend upon the Duke of Burgundy's assistance, which doubtless he would not have done, before he had rendered himself formidable by some exploit, had he been so superior as he is represented.

Upon Edward's arrival at Calais (4), he sent a Herald to Lewis to summon him to restore the whole Kingdom of France, and in case of refusal, to proclaim War against him. Lewis hearing the Herald in private, told him, he was very well informed, Edward was not come of his own inclination to make war, but by the instigation of the Duke of Burgundy, and the Constable de St. Pol (5), who, he might assure his Master, would both deceive him. Then after asking him some questions, which gave the Herald occasion to say, that when he made any offers of Peace, he should apply to the Lords Howard and Stanley, he presented him with three hundred Crowns (6), and thirty yards of Velvet, to make him a Robe. He did not expect, doubtless, to reap great advantages from the Herald by this liberality, since the Man was a stranger to his Master's inward resolutions; but meant to show Edward's Courtiers, what they might expect from him for more important Services. The Herald failed not to magnify his Present, and relate to the Lord Howard, who held the chief place in the King's Favour, what passed between Lewis and him.

Mean while, Edward advancing into Picardy, where he expected to meet the Duke of Burgundy, found not so much as a single Man from him. Surprised at so seemingly strange a Proceeding, he sent to the Duke (7), who was still before Nuz, to know the reason. But before I proceed, it will be necessary briefly to mention the Duke of Burgundy's affairs.

The Duke was intent upon the Siege of Nuz, in hopes of taking that Place, and Calais too, before Edward's arrival in France. But the Emperor approaching the Siege with an army four times as strong as the Duke's, without however offering him Battle, the Besiegers were so harassed, that the Siege, instead of advancing, was retarded. And yet, the Duke, from a motive of Vain-glory, obstinately continued it, to show that the Emperor with all his forces was not able to raise it. Nothing could be more advantageous to the King of France, or more prejudicial to the Duke's affairs, than this unseasonable obstinacy. In the first place, it hindered his joining the King of England. 2. In the mean time, Sigismund Duke of Austria took from him the Earldom of Perette (8), and the Duke of Lorraine ravaged Luxemburg. 3. As soon as his Truce with France was expired, Lewis made himself master of Roye, Corbie, and Montdidier. In fine, when it was too late, and he was within eight days of being master of the Place, pressed by Edward's instances, he agreed, it should be delivered to a Legate, to be disposed of according to the Pope's pleasure. After the raising of the Siege, the Duke's Army was so little able to march, that instead of speedily joining the English, it was put into Summer quarters.

Then he went himself with a very small Train, to make his excuses to Edward. It was difficult for the King to digest such a negligence, in so important an affair. He began from that time to open his eyes, and perceive, he was engaged in the War for the interest of others, whereas he had imagined, it was for his own. On the other hand, the Duke of Burgundy's precaution, not to admit but few English at a time into Peronne, confirmed the King's suspicions. At last, he was quite undeceived by the behaviour of the Constable de St. Pol, who commanded in St. Quentin. The Constable, who was one of the chief promoters of the War, because he founded his greatness solely upon the dissention between the King of France and the Duke of Burgundy, had positively promised, to deliver St. Quentin to the King of England. Upon this assurance, the Duke of Burgundy would have conducted Edward into the place, that having so good a Pledge in his hands, he might be patient. But upon their approach, they were fired upon from the Town. At the same time, a body of Horse falling out, killed some English Soldiers, who were most eager to enter, expecting to be admitted without difficulty. Very probably, the Duke of Burgundy himself was deceived, upon this occasion, by the Constable. For it is not likely, he should designedly cause such an affront to be put upon a Prince whom he yet wanted, and who had him in his power. He did all he could however to excuse the Constable, and feed the King's hopes. But finding Edward gave no credit to his words, but on the contrary bitterly reproached him, he left him next day, under pretence of hastening his Troops. It may be, he was not without some apprehension, that Edward might pursue his resentment.

Edward feeling himself thus deserted by the Duke of Burgundy and the Constable, and not hearing that the Duke of Bretagne made any motion, or there was any appearance of the Insurrections in France, he had been made to expect, found himself extremely embarrassed. In the mean time, a French Prisoner, the only one taken since the English Army's arrival, being released by the King's order, the Lords Howard and Stanley charged him, to present their respects to the King his master. The Prisoner discharging his Commission, Lewis began to think it was not without design, that this Compliment was made him, remembering what the English Herald told him concerning these Lords. He perceived, the Court of England desired to enter into Treaty, but would not make the first Advances. For his part, who was not so scrupulous, he resolved to improve this sort of overture. Philip de Commines says, he caused a certain Person of little note, but of good Sense, to be dressed like a Herald, and fully instructing him, sent him to the English army, to demand a Safe-Conduct for Ambassadors, and address himself for that purpose to the Lords Howard and Stanley. The pretended Herald being admitted into the King's presence, told him, "That he was ordered by the King his master to represent to him, that the war between their two Kingdoms could not but be destructive to both, and the mutual Trade of the two Nations was on the contrary a manifest advantage, which ought to be cherished. Then, he excused the King his master's countenancing the Earl of Warwick, assuring, it was not out of ill-will to Edward, but on the account of the Duke of Burgundy's irreconcilable enemy. He added, that the Duke of Burgundy's and the Constable's insincerity was so evident, that it was needless to mention it, since he was very sensible of the effects. That he was come in arms into a Country where he had neither Castles, nor Friends, and he left it to him to judge, whether the Conquest of France was so easy as he had been made to believe: That however, the King his master, knowing so great an Armament could not be made without vast expence, was very willing so to make him amends, as he should have reason to be satisfied: That therefore he demanded a Safe-Conduct for Ambassadors, with a Train of one hundred Horse, that they might treat in a proper place, with those of England, concerning a firm and lasting Peace, between the two Kings and their Subjects."

1475. In Edward's circumstances, the King of France's proposal was very acceptable. Accordingly, the Herald was disarmed with a Present (1), and the desired Safe-Conduct. The same day, or the next, Edward called a Council (2), at which were present all the Lords in the Army, to the number of eighteen. It was resolved, almost unanimously, that the Lord Howard and three others (3) should confer with the King of France's Ambassadors, and a full power was given them to conclude a Peace upon these terms: 1. That Lewis should pay the King, within a fortnight, the Sum of seventy five thousand Crowns, and from thence forward fifty thousand Crowns yearly, at two payments, during the Life of the two Kings. 2. That the King of France should promise to marry the Dauphin his Son to the King's eldest or second Daughter, and allow his Daughter-in-law sixty thousand Livres a year. Upon these two conditions, the Ambassadors were empowered to promise in the King's name, that he would return into England with his Troops, immediately after the receipt of the seventy five thousand Crowns; To conclude a Treaty of Amity and Alliance between the two Kings, with promise of mutual assistance against their rebellious Subjects; And lastly, to sign a Truce for seven years.

The Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings (4) meeting near Amiens, at almost an equal distance from the two Armies, the Treaty was concluded the 28th or 29th of August, as Edward desired, without any considerable alteration. Every thing being thus settled, separate writings were drawn, on each particular Article of the Treaty.

By the first, the two Kings promised to decide all their differences by arbitrators, namely, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Gloucester for the King of England, and for the King of France, the Archbishop of Lyons, and the Earl of Dunois. Moreover, Edward engaged to quit the French territories, upon the receipt of the seventy five thousand Crowns, without doing any damage, and to leave Hostages for the performance of his word.

The second concerned the seven years Truce, in which were included all the Allies of both the Kings, and expressly the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, if they desired it.

The third contained a mutual engagement of brotherly friendship between the two Kings, and expresses articles concerning the Dauphin's marriage with Elizabeth Daughter of Edward.

The fourth was in form of Letters Patents, whereby Lewis promised to pay annually to Edward during their lives, the Sum of fifty thousand Crowns. This the English Authors call a Tribute, though the Letters Patents express not under what title this yearly pension was to be paid. Some say, it was limited to nine years. But no other limitation appears than the lives of the two Kings.

Lastly, Edward promised to release Queen Margaret, for a ransom of fifty thousand Crowns, which the King of France was to pay for her, within five years. We find in the Collection of the Public Acts, that Margaret was accordingly released the beginning of November this year, and Lewis XI punctually paid the Sum promised.

The Duke of Burgundy having notice that the two Kings were beginning to treat, departed immediately from his Army, to which he was returned, and made all possible haste, in expectation of preventing this blow, but found the Truce was already signed. He fell upon Edward with bitter reproaches; to which Edward returned a suitable answer, telling him however he had taken care to include him in the Truce. But the Duke fiercely replied, he wanted not his mediation, and valued it so little, that if he treated for himself it should not be till three months after his arrival in England. Thus parting extremely angry with each other, the Duke retired into his Country. The Constable de St. Pol did all that lay in his power, to persuade Edward to break the Truce, offering to deliver St. Quentin, and lend him fifty thousand Crowns. But Edward was far from renewing the War for his sake, and trusting to his promises after having been so manifestly deceived.

Before Edward's departure for England, it was thought proper, that the two Kings should confer together upon Pequigny Bridge, with a Bar [or Grate] between them. 1475. Lewis came first to the place, attended with the Cardinal of Bourbon, and five other Lords. Edward arrived afterwards, accompanied likewise with a small number of Lords (5). After they had both sworn to observe the late Treaty, Lewis inviting Edward to Paris, told him, he would procure him agreeable diversions with the fair Ladies of that City, and if he chanced to trespass upon his chastity, the Cardinal of Bourbon should be his Confessor, who would easily absolve him. After some other raileries, Lewis made sign to the Lords that were with him, to retire, and the English likewise did the same. When the two Kings were alone, they talked a good while together, and it was afterwards known, that the Constable, and the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the subject of their conversation. As to the Constable, Edward would not be concerned for him. As for Burgundy, Lewis asking him, what he should do if that Prince refused to be included in the Truce, Edward replied, he might do as he pleased, if, after another offer, the Duke should refuse. But as for the Duke of Bretagne he plainly told him, that he would assist him to the utmost of his power, if attacked. Lewis thought proper to insist no farther upon that subject, and in fine, they parted very well satisfied with each other (6).

The interview being ended, Lewis repaired to Amiens, where the Lord Howard followed him as Hostage. Whilst Lewis was washing his hands before supper, Howard whispered him in the ear, that he would undertake to persuade the King his master to take a journey to Paris; to which Lewis returned no answer. Howard frequently hinted the same thing at table, without the King's seeming to hear him. However, he caused him to be afterwards told, that the War he was going to wage with the Duke of Burgundy not permitting him to go to Paris, he was very sorry he could not enjoy the honour the King intended to do him. Philip de Commines remarks upon this occasion, that there was nothing more feared by Lewis, than to see Edward relish France, nor any thing more passionately desired by him, than to see him return into England. He was under such apprehension that Edward would repent of the Truce, that he privately bestowed pensions upon his principal Counsellors, to induce them to keep him in the resolution to observe it. Commines could speak of these things with certainty, since he was then in Lewis's service and confidence. He adds moreover, that the Duke of Gloucester, who was against the Truce, waiting upon the King of France, was received with extraordinary respect, and that the King forgot nothing to gain to his interest such of Edward's Courtiers as were in any credit. The English Army approaching Amiens, Lewis caused the gates to be kept open, and sent orders to the public Inns, to entertain at free cost all the English that came there. Moreover, he sent to the King of England a present of three hundred waggon-loads of wine, for the use of his army; so desirous was he to gain the hearts of the English, for fear some one of them should make Edward sensible of his error. This present gave occasion to say, that he found means to send home the English with cart-loads of wine. At length, all Lewis's fears vanished with the departure of the English, who went away, says Hall, a Historian, extremely well pleased with the French gold and wine; adding, the pensions assigned to Edward's principal courtiers, amounted to sixteen thousand Crowns a year (7).

The Duke of Burgundy not bearing the thoughts of deserting to be included in the Truce, made by Edward without his knowledge, stood out for some time, and at last accepted of a separate Truce (8) offered him by Lewis. As for the Constable, who had deceived the three Princes, and been the principal author of their division, he saw himself in the end forsaken by all, and forced to retire into the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions, upon the faith of a Safe-Conduct. But notwithstanding that security, he was delivered by the Duke to the King of France, who commanded his head to be struck off. A notable lesson for such as labour to sow discord among Princes!

Lewis would have been glad the Duke of Bretagne had been thus sacrificed to him. But that Prince had in his hands a pledge which obliged Edward to protect him; the Duke of Bretagne.

1475. otherwise he would have regarded him no more than the Duke of Burgundy. This was the Earl of Richmond, who, tho' absent, made the English Monarch extremely uneasy. If the Duke of Bretagne had suffered that Prince, with the Earl of Pembroke his Uncle, to escape, they might in time have revived the Lancastrian party, and thereby exposed Edward perhaps to the hazard of a thirteenth Battle, to maintain himself in the Throne. This was the true reason of Edward's supporting the Duke of Bretagne, and telling Lewis, who earnestly pressed him several times to desert that Prince, that, on the contrary, he would defend him to the utmost of his power.

1476. This open demonstration of friendship for the Duke of Bretagne, causing Edward to imagine the Duke would be glad of an opportunity to shew his acknowledgment, he sent Ambassadors (1) to him, under colour of renewing their Truce. There were but few difficulties in this negotiation. The Duke readily agreed to confirm the Truce (2), though often violated on the part of the English. He even desisted from his demand of fifty thousand Crowns, for the damages sustained by his Subjects. The King, on his side, quitted his demands upon him for the armament made in his favour. Every thing being thus upon the terms of a perfect good understanding between the two Princes, the Ambassadors acquainted the Duke with the principal business of their embassy. They told him, the King their master was extremely desirous, entirely to extinguish the flames of the two factions which had been so long kindled in England; that the Earl of Richmond, who was in Bretagne, being the only surviving Person of the House of Lancaster, he intended to marry him to one of his daughters, in order to unite the two Houses; that therefore he desired him to send him the Earl, that he might give him marks of his favour, and thereby manifest to his whole Kingdom his earnest desire of procuring them a happy tranquility.

The Duke of Bretagne was a good Prince, who judging of others by himself, and not believing Edward concealed ill-designs under these appearances of moderation, ordered the Earl of Richmond to be put into the hands of the Ambassadors, to be conducted to England. Some however affirm, that a large Sum of Money presented to the Duke by the English Ambassadors, rendered their instances more effectual. However this be, they departed with their prey, to embark at St. Malo's. But whilst they were on the road, one of the Duke's Counsellors (3) represented to him, that by this proceeding, he would be eternally infamous; that besides, he could not in conscience deliver a Prince, who thought himself safe under his protection, to his most mortal enemy, who demanded him only to destroy him, under the false pretence of an honorable settlement; that he would be accountable to God for this action, whatever colour he might put upon it in the eyes of Men; and conjured him to consider, what Honour, Justice and Religion required of him on this occasion. Whether this remonstrance made the Duke sensible of what he had not hitherto fully known, or stung him with remorse of what he had done, he immediately dispatched Peter Landais his favorite to St. Malo's, with orders to recover the Earl of Richmond out of the hands of the Ambassadors, if they were not yet embarked. Landais arrived, just as they were entering the vessel that was to carry them to England. He immediately gave private orders to help the two Prisoners to escape, whilst himself conferred with the Ambassadors. The conference being ended, the two Earls were found to have taken sanctuary in a Church, from whence Landais pretended they could not be removed. The Ambassadors complained of this fraud; but, after some frivolous excuses, he plainly told them, the Duke his master, upon second thoughts, believed he could not deliver the Earl to the King, without an indelible stain on his honour; that however, he would promise to guard him so carefully that Edward should never receive any damage. The Ambassadors finding themselves the weakest, were forced to be content with this promise, which eased in some measure their vexation to be thus disappointed. Thus, by a sort of miracle, the Earl of Richmond escaped the danger to which he was exposed, Providence having preserved him on this occasion, in order to place him one day on the Throne of England.

The rest of the year 1476, affords nothing remarkable concerning the affairs of England, but a Negotiation to renew the Alliance with Denmark; the death of the Archbishop of York at Guisnes, where he was Prisoner; and some other inconsiderable affairs. But it will be necessary to speak of those of the Duke of Burgundy, which became of great consequence both to England and France.

The Duke had accepted of the Truce offered by Lewis, 1476. not so much out of fear of his Arms, as from a desire to carry war into Germany. He wanted to be revenged of the Duke of Lorraine, the Swiss, and the Duke of Austria; but this would have been impossible, if the War with France had continued. In October, 1475, presently after signing the Truce with Lewis XI, he attacked the Duke of Lorraine, and subdued his whole Duchy, without meeting much resistance, except at Nancy, which endured a Siege of two Months. Lorraine being conquered, he formed the Project to humble the Swiss, who had dared to declare against him, whilst he was employed in the Siege of Nuss. He used for pretence the Injury they had done to James of Savoy Earl of Romont, in seizing his Territories. The Swiss, who made yet no great Figure in Europe, seeing the Storm approaching, humbly sued for Peace; but the Duke was inexorable. So leaving Lorraine in March, 1476, he passed through Burgundy, and threw himself into the Country of Vaux, where he took three or four Towns. Then he laid Siege to Granfon, where were seven or eight hundred Swiss, bent upon making a gallant defence. The Town having at length capitulated, the Duke broke the articles, and put the Garrison to the sword. Mean while, a body of Swiss was advancing to relieve the Besieged, but came too late. The Duke, contrary to the opinion of his Council, resolved to meet this body, which was still in the narrow Passages of the Mountains. To that end, he detached a hundred Archers to seize a certain pass, and presently after he marched himself to support them. These Archers meeting the Swiss coming out of the Mountains, hastily retreated towards the body which was marching after them. Whereupon, the Duke's Army imagining the Horsemen were repulsed by the Enemy, were seized with a panic, and took to flight, without the Duke's being able to rally them. He lost only seven Men at arms, but all his baggage became a Prey to the Enemy.

This ill success not being capable of discouraging him, he assembled his scattered Troops, and soon rendered them fit for action. About fifteen days after he took the field, and laid siege to Morat, a small Town not far from Bern. Mean time, the Swiss receiving supplies from some neighbouring Princes, marched, to the number of thirty thousand Men, to fight him. The Battle was fought three weeks after the rout of Granfon, and the Duke was entirely defeated, with loss of eight thousand Men.

This terrible misfortune so struck the Duke, that he sickened with grief. Philip de Commines even affirms, he was somewhat disordered in mind. He remained six weeks at a Town called la Riviere, where he kept himself as it were concealed, and none durst venture to speak to him to comfort him. Mean time, several of the Princes who before were his Friends (4) declared against him. Then the Duke of Lorraine, perceiving it to be a favorable opportunity, appeared before Nancy, and took the place upon terms, without the Duke of Burgundy's stirring to its relief. At length, when it was too late, and the Town surrendered, the Duke of Burgundy approached, and his Enemy being retired, undertook the Siege, where he met with difficulties which made him lose a great deal of time, and proved the occasion of his ruin.

Mean while, the Duke of Lorraine drew together Forces from all quarters, Lewis XI finding him Money for his subsistence. When he thought himself sufficiently strong, he approached Nancy, and encamped at St. Nicholas, expecting the effect of his correspondence in the Enemy's Army, with Campobache, a Neapolitan Captain, in whom the Duke of Burgundy entirely confided. This City being now reduced to extremity, the Duke of Lorraine advanced to join battle. Then Campobache suddenly deserted his master with about two hundred Lances (5), and went over to his Enemy. He left in the Army fourteen Men whom he had bribed, who were to alarm the Troops during the fight, and kill the Duke of Burgundy, if they had an opportunity. The Battle being fought on the 5th of January 1477, the Duke of Burgundy's Army was routed, and himself slain in the forty sixth year of his age. He had reigned nine years and a half, amidst continual troubles, employed one while in defending himself against the open or secret Attacks of Lewis XI, another while, in executing Projects beyond his strength, which argued more ambition and rashness, than prudence and counsel.

The Duke of Burgundy's Death made a great alteration not only in the Affairs of the Low-Countries, but also in those of the neighbouring Princes. Nay it may be said to be the first and principal source of most of the Wars, wherewith Europe has been troubled ever since. The 1477. Duke of Burgundy left but one Daughter, called Maria, who was Heiress to his large Dominions, and whom he had in some measure promised to Maximilian of Austria, Son of the Emperor Frederic. This Princess, about nineteen years old, saw herself not only forsaken by all the late Duke her Father's friends, but moreover exposed a Prey to Lewis XI., who immediately deprived her of Burgundy, with the Towns on the Somme, and even formed the Project to dispose of her of all the rest of her Dominions. In this pressing necessity, her only refuge was the King of England's assistance, whose interest it was to oppose the growth of Lewis's Power. But Edward's whole Council being bribed and corrupted by the King of France's bounties, Maria obtained from that quarter empty wishes only for her prosperity, and compliments, which ended in nothing. To complete her misfortune, the young Princess saw herself also exposed to the Tyranny of the Gentils, who seizing her Person, removed all her Counsellors, beheaded two, and gave her a new Council entirely composed of their Creatures.

Mean time, this Princess's marriage was thought of. Some were for her espousing the Dauphin of France. But Lewis having already entered into engagements with Edward, durst not disoblige him at such a juncture. Others would have her married to the Duke of Gueldres, and some to a German Prince. All but herself were consulted about the choice of a Husband. Mean while Lewis continued his conquests. In May 1477, the Emperor Frederic sending Ambassadors to Gant, to renew the Treaty concerning the Marriage of his Son Maximilian with Maria, the Duchess Dowager of Burgundy, Mother-in-law of the Princess, desired her Brother Edward to send Ambassadors into Flanders to assist her in that Affair. Edward consented, but would not promise to aid Maria against the King of France, though the Flemings and the Duke of Bretagne strongly pressed him. On the contrary, he agreed to prolong the seven years Truce concluded at Amiens, till a year after the death of one of the two Kings. Thus Edward acted directly contrary to the interests of England, in suffering the advancement of France, and the ruin of the house of Burgundy. Three principal reasons hindered his quarrelling with France. The first, that being grown corpulent and heavy, he was no longer fit to bear the hardships of War. The second, that his chief Counsellors were Pensioners to France. The third, that having promised his Daughter Elizabeth to the Dauphin, he was unwilling by any proceeding to obstruct the marriage. Mean while, Lewis was extremely careful to keep him in these dispositions, by punctually paying him the Pension of fifty thousand Crowns, and ten thousand yearly for Queen Margaret's ransom.

Thus Maria of Burgundy feeling herself forsaken by all whose interest it was to support her, had no other refuge than to marry Prince Maximilian, from whom however she could expect no great assistance. The Nuptials being celebrated in July, Lewis XI. out of regard to the Emperor, granted the new Duke of Burgundy a Truce for a year, and restored him some Towns in Hainault which he had seized. Shortly after, he received Ambassadors from England (1), who were come to settle the arbitration agreed on, concerning the differences between the two Crowns. But he had then other Affairs, which hindered him from thinking of this, and obliged him to defer it to a more proper season (2).

The beginning of the year 1478 was very quiet, with respect to the general Affairs I have been speaking of. But at the same time, there passed at the Court of England, things which wholly ingrossed the attention of the publick: I mean the tragical death of the Duke of Clarence, which it will be necessary to insist upon a moment. This Prince was haughty and ambitious, of ungovernable Passions, of an inconstant Temper, taking no care to conceal his Sentiments; in a word, of a very mean Genius. Whilst the King his Brother lived unmarried, he could not help entertaining the hopes of sitting one day on the Throne, though it was very unlikely, Edward would always remain in a state of Celibacy. The King's Marriage destroying these hopes, he was displeased with the King himself, and especially with the Queen and her family. As he was not careful to hide his discontent, he drew on himself the aversion of the Queen, and her Creatures, who did not fail to do him ill offices. So, Edward began by degrees to neglect him, and took no care to procure him advantages, which may easily be procured by a King for his Brothers. The Duke so resented this contempt, that he scrupled not to join with the Earl of Warwick, to dethrone his own Brother. He repented it afterwards, and his repentance, as hath been seen, proved Edward's preservation. He was in hopes a reward would quickly follow so signal a Service, reflecting only upon what he had done for the King, without considering the danger to which he had exposed him. But Edward, prejudiced against him, thought, on the contrary, the more pardon of the injury to be a sufficient recompence for the service he had received. These Sentiments were instilled into him by his Queen, who having lost the Earl of Rivers her Father during the Rebellion, could not forbear looking upon the Author of it, as the objects of her vengeance. On the other hand, the Duke of Gloucester, to the utmost of his power, privately sowed dissension between his Brothers. He was a Prince of greater ambition than the Duke of Clarence, but withal of a very different Character, proceeding to his ends by deep and artful Contrivances, which rendered his ways imperceptible. He always thought before he spoke, whereas the Duke of Clarence ruined himself by too freely discovering his Sentiments. It was difficult for two Brothers of so contrary tempers to love one another. But in their discord, the Duke of Clarence used no Ceremony with his Brother, whilst Gloucester strove never to give him publicly any advantage. Mean while, he gave him secret stabs, the more unavoidable, as they came from an unsuspected hand. All the Historians agree, that, from this time, the Duke of Gloucester thought of securing the Crown after the King's death, and therefore the Duke of Clarence could not but very much incommode him. This was however, an undertaking, the execution whereof seemed very difficult, since his two elder Brothers had Children. But his Ambition made him think it not impracticable, in proceeding by degrees. The first step was, to dispatch the Duke of Clarence. To that end, he endeavoured to render him odious to the King, and cause him to consider him as a secret enemy, who was privately labouring to supplant his Children. The Duke of Clarence's rash expressions were extremely subservient to his design. On the other hand, the Queen, who had a great Influence over the King, failed not to confirm his suspicions.

Matters standing thus, the King, as he was hunting in a Park belonging to Thomas Burdet (3), Confident of the Duke of Clarence, chanced to kill a white Buck, in which that Gentleman greatly delighted. Burdet was so concerned for the death of his favorite Buck, that in the first transports of his passion, he swore, he would the horns in the belly of him that killed it. Whereupon he was accused of High-Treason, condemned, and executed, within the space of two days. Some say, his Imprecation concerned only the person that advised the King to hunt in his Park. Be this as it will, the design, no doubt, of those who so hotly prosecuted that unfortunate Gentleman, was, to induce the Duke of Clarence to expose himself by some rash proceeding; of which his inconsiderate, impetuous, and haughty Temper, afforded great assistance. Accordingly, the Duke, who was then in Ireland, being returned to Court, talked very boldly to the King, of his Friend's death, and bitterly complained of his disregard for a Brother, to whom he owed his Restoration to the Throne. In fine, he was so far transported with anger, that he threatened to be revenged. Neither was this all. After leaving the King, he dropped some farther no less impudent expressions, intimating, his Brother was a Bastard, and consequently had no Right to the Crown. Nothing being more agreeable to the desires of his enemies, than to see him thus run into their Snare, they so exasperated the King against him, that he resolved to destroy him. For that purpose, he held a Council, entirely consisting of the Duke of Clarence's enemies, where it was resolved to apprehend him, accuse him of High-Treason, and bring the Accusation before the Parliament, then assembled. All this was immediately executed, that the Duke might not have leisure to repent, and beg the King's Pardon. For had he been allowed time to come to himself, and implored the King's Mercy, his rash expressions must have been considered only as the effect of a sudden Passion, which deserved not the rigorous punishment intended him. His Story, affair being brought before the Parliament (4), he was accused of several Crimes, under the eight following Articles. I. By his seditious discourses, he had endeavoured to draw upon the King, the hatred of his Subjects, by accusing him of unjustly putting Burdet to death. II. He had bribed some of his domesticks, and others to spread such a report, 1478. III. He had said the King made use of Necromancy to know the future. IV. He had said the King with poisoning innocent person, whom he thought he could not legally destroy. V. He had affirmed, the King was not Son of the Duke of York, but of an adulterer admitted by the Duchess, his Mother to her bed. VI. Inferring from thence, that the Crown was fallen to him, he had discovered his design to seize it, by requiring many persons to swear to be true to him and his Heirs, without any exception of their Allegiance to the King. VII. He had accused the King of using Magic to take away his Life, by causing him to consume away like a Taper. VIII. Lastly, He had openly shewn his design to dethrone the King, in procuring an authentic Copy of the act of Parliament passed during the Earl of Warwick's Usurpation, whereby the Crown was adjudged to him, after the death of Henry VI, and his Issue-Male.

All the Historians agree, it would have been very difficult to prove all these Articles of Impeachment, if the King had not declared himself a Party, and the Queen and the Duke of Gloucester acted underhand to have him found guilty. Be this as it will, he was condemned to die. But there is in this Sentence a very remarkable Circumstance. One of the chief reasons of his Condemnation was, his affirming, the King not to be the Duke of York's Son, and that very thing served afterwards for foundation to the Duke of Gloucester to mount the Throne, in prejudice of Edward's Children. Herein must be admired the blindness of Men, and the Justice of God. Edward makes use of a false Accusation to put his Brother to death, and thereby gives occasion to suspicions, which are to serve hereafter to ruin his own Children. The Duke of Clarence being condemned, all the favor he could obtain of the King his Brother, was, to chuse the manner of his death. To avoid appearing on a Scaffold, he desired (1) to be drowned in a butt of Malmsey (2). He left one Son named Edward, who inherited from his Grandfather, by the Mother's Side (3), the Title of Earl of Warwick, and a Daughter called Margaret, who was Countess of Salisbury. As the death of the Duke of Clarence raised among the People a general Indignation, and murmurs against the King, it was designed to put a stop thereunto, by exposing his body in St. Paul's Church, and giving out, he died of immoderate Grief. But this Artifice was not capable of amusing the People, who too plainly saw, in the Condemnation of that Prince, the terrible effects of his enemy's malice (4).

About three Months before, the King had created Edward his eldest Son Prince of Wales (5), and his second Son Richard, Duke of York. The rejoicings at Court upon this occasion, expressed not so much the Joy of the Favorites, for the two Princes Promotion, as their satisfaction to see the Project of the Duke of Clarence's Ruin so near accomplished. Edward did not foresee, that his unjust Plot against his Brother, was the first step towards the ruin of his own Sons. Had the Duke of Clarence lived, the Duke of Gloucester would never have thought of sacrificing them, as he did, to his ambition.

Shortly after the death of the Duke of Clarence, the Term taken by Lewis XI, and Edward, to decide their differences by arbitration, was further prolonged, and the Duke of Gloucester appointed by Edward one of the Arbitrators (6), in the room of the Duke of Clarence.

Whilst these things passed in England, the Truce between Lewis and Maximilian being expired, Maximilian entered Burgundy, and took several places with great ease, by reason of the People's affection to the House of Burgundy. Probably, he would then have taken possession of the two Burgundies, if he had received from the Emperor his Father, a supply answerable to his occasions. This Lewis very much feared, and as he knew it to be Edward's Interest to join forces with Maximilian, he forgot nothing to divert him therefrom. In July this year, he sent a full power to prolong the Truce, till a hundred years after the death of the two Kings, and oblige him to the payment of the annual Pension of fifty thousand Crowns, so long as the Truce should last. Moreover the Ambassador was empowered, to prolong for three years the Term agreed upon, to decide the differences by Arbitrators, and to promise for Lewis and his Successors, to prolong it every third year, till all things were settled. The Ambassador being arrived at London, Edward appointed Commissioners to treat with him, and at length the Treaty was concluded as proposed by Lewis, though not till February the 15th, 1479 (7).

What retarded a little this Negotiation, was, Edward's desire to secure, first, his Daughter Elizabeth's Marriage with the Dauphin. To that end, he sent two Ambassadors (8) into France, with power to perform the Ceremony of betrothing. But Lewis, it is likely, found some excuse to defer it. Mean while, he made the second Payment of ten thousand Crowns for Queen Margaret's Ransom.

Thus Edward, contrary to his own, and the Kingdom's Interests, suffered himself to be managed by the King of France, or rather by his own Ministers, bribed by that Prince. Lewis not content with diverting him by his Intrigues from assisting the Duchess of Burgundy, sent him also a Proposal to divide between them that Prince's Dominions, offering him for his part Flanders and Brabant (9). Edward closed with the Proposal, but upon this condition, that in exchange for the Towns conquered in Flanders, Lewis should give him others in Picardy, and particularly Baugne (10). But Lewis was too apprehensive of the neighbourhood of the English, to accept that condition. If he proposed to him the Conquest of Flanders, it was only to engage him in a war with Maximilian and Maria, for fear he should one time or other repent his deserting them.

But Edward was far from such a thought. Instead of meditating War, he entirely abandoned himself to his pleasures, with intention to pass the residue of his days in effeminate Sloth. Mean while, these pleasures which he so eagerly pursued, cost him more than the most burdensome War. And therefore, his Coifers being empty, he used divers illegal means to extort Money from his Subjects. The most terrible was, that of causing the rich to be accused of High-Treason, in order to confiscate their Estates, or exact large Sums for their pardon. In the mean time, he continued, with several Princes, negotiations, tending to secure him the continuance of that repose he so passionately loved.

The first of these negotiations was with the King of Denmark, their Alliance not having been well observed on either side. At last, that Prince sending Ambassadors to London, the Alliance was confirmed and renewed, and a congress appointed at Hamburg, to decide all their differences. One of the conditions of the Treaty was, that the English should not set foot in Iceland, without a Pass-port from the King of Denmark.

Two days after the conclusion of this Treaty, the French Ambassador and the King's Commissioners signified that before-mentioned, whereby Lewis XI promised, for himself and Successors, to pay to the King of England fifty thousand Crowns every year, as well during the life of the two Kings, as a hundred years after, to commence at the death of the survivor. Next day was also signed another Treaty, prolonging the Truce, friendship and good understanding between the two Kings during their life, and between their Successors for the space of a hundred years, with promise of mutual assistance against their rebellious Subjects. The other Articles were, that if one of the two Princes was driven out of his Kingdom, the other should be obliged to receive him, and assist him with all his Forces: That they should make no Alliance without a mutual consent: That the King of France should ratify this Treaty, and cause it to be confirmed and ratified by the States: And that Edward should likewise procure the Emperor's approbation. Lastly, that the Dauphin's Marriage with the Princess Elizabeth should be accomplished, according to the agreement at Amiens, and this new Treaty not be derogatory to the former. It does not appear that Lewis XI ever ratified this Treaty, which, probably, was made only to amuse Edward. Lewis knew, he was bound to nothing without a formal ratification, which doubts he was resolved not to grant, tho' the Treaty contained only such Articles as were proposed by himself.

1479. himself. This was one of Lewis's Artifices, against which it is very difficult to be prepared. With Princes of this character the shortest and most secure way, would be never to enter into a negotiation.

As Lewis amused Edward with the Marriage of Elizabeth to the Dauphin, Maximilian used the same means to gain him to his interests. Though Philip his Son was but a year old, he offered Edward to marry him to Anne his third Daughter. Edward accepted the offer, and whilst the Marriage-Articles were settling, the two Princes sent one another Letters Patents, promising not to marry their Children without a mutual consent, during the space of three years.

About the same time, Edward had thoughts of marrying Catherine his fourth Daughter to John, Infante of Castile and Arragon, Son of King Ferdinand, and Isabella of Castile. Nay, it appears in the Collection of the Public Acts, that Ambassadors were sent into Spain to hasten the Treaty, which however came to nothing.

Mean while, Lewis duly paid the Pension of fifty thousand Crowns, as appears by several acquittances in the Collection of the Public Acts. We find there likewise, that in March 1480, he completed the Payment of Margaret's ransom.

Lewis readily performed all the Articles of the Treaty of Amiens, except the Dauphin's Marriage, for which he still found some fresh excuse, though he still persisted in his promise to fulfil that engagement. Edward, surprized at all these delays, called an extraordinary Council, where it was resolved to send Ambassadors to Lewis, peremptorily to demand the performance of his promise and the ratification of the late Treaty at London. The Lord Howard and Thomas Langton Treasurer of the Church of Exeter, were chosen for this Embassy. Howard, who was one of Edward's Confidants, was very likely, the chief of those that suffered themselves to be corrupted by the King of France's favours.

Mean time, Lewis was not a little embarrassed. He had given his word for the Marriage, and even bound himself by a Treaty, though he had never any thoughts of accomplishing it. On the other hand, his Ambassadors at London had signed another Treaty upon the foot proposed by himself, and yet he was resolved not to ratify it. His sole Aim had been to amuse Edward, for fear of his joining with the Arch-Duke. To free himself from these difficulties, he resolved to dissemble and continue to promise the completing of the marriage, whilst, by Ambassadors sent into Scotland, he tried to perfwade James III to break the Truce with England. This Negotiation succeeded to his wish. King James suffered himself to be governed by three Favorites, raised from the Dust, without advising with any Lord of his Realm. It was very easy, for the King of France to bribe those mercenary Souls, who promised to induce their Master to break the Truce with the English. And indeed, presently after, James made preparations which plainly discovered his design. Edward, surprized at the impending rupture between the King of Scotland and him, readily guessed the Author. He dissembled however his resentment, and only ordered an Army to be raised, the command whereof he resolved to give to his Brother the Duke of Glocester. Then it was, that he began to open his eyes, and perceive the King of France's infincerity, who, ever since Burgundy's death, had amused him with false promises. Mean while, though he had lost all the favorable Opportunities, he turned his thoughts, though too late, to revenge. 1480. This appears in several pieces of the Collection of the Public Acts, all dated the Year 1480, before the Scots had actually broke the Truce.

First, he sent ambassadors (1) to Castile to make reparation for certain Outrages committed by the English, during the Earl of Warwick's administration, contrary to the Alliance between Castile and England. When a Prince offers of himself to repair the damages, his Subjects have done to another Nation, there is reason to presume it is with a view to some other design. Edward's aim was to engage the King of Castile to make war upon France, or at least, to hinder his assisting Lewis.

In the second place, he ratified the Treaty concluded by his Ambassadors at Hamburg, with the King of Denmark.

Thirdly, he confirmed his Treaty of Alliance with the late Duke of Burgundy, and promised to send Maximilian and Maria an aid of six thousand Men, pursuant to the Treaty. The Archduke promised on his part to pay him fifty thousand Crowns yearly, in case the King of France discontinued his Pension, and a War ensued upon that account.

Lastly, the Marriage of Philip Earl of Charolais Son of Maximilian and Maria, with Ann Daughter of Edward was concluded, with promise on both sides to cause it to be consummated as soon as the Parties were of age. By this Treaty Edward gave with his Daughter a hundred thousand Crowns. But by a subsequent Treaty, the Dowry was set against the yearly Pension of fifty thousand Crowns, to be paid by the Archduke instead of the King of France, and they mutually forgave one another.

By another Treaty, Edward promised to use his Endeavours to procure Maximilian a Truce with the King of France; to offer to be arbitrator himself between Lewis and him; to try to be received as such; and if Lewis refused, engaged to declare against him. This Proceeding was not very fair, but probably, he did not think himself obliged to act more sincerely than Lewis had done.

Edward having thus settled his matters with Maximilian and Maria, sent again Ambassadors to France, to press the Marriage of his Daughter Elizabeth with the Dauphin. If Lewis had complied, very likely he would not have scrupled to relinquish the Archduke. But Lewis according to custom, using some ill excuse, he equipped a Fleet, and gave the command to John Middleton, to go to the assistance of his new Allies.

Mean time, the King of Scotland continued his preparations with intention to break with England. But before I speak of the success of this War so little expected by Edward, it will be proper briefly to relate what passed then in Scotland, with the situation of the Affairs of that Kingdom.

James III. who came to the Crown at seven Years of age, being out of his Minority, had suffered himself to be so corrupted by Flatterers, that he made his will the sole rule of his actions. Without entering into a needless detail of the outrages he committed upon his Subjects, it will suffice to say in a word, he was deemed a real Tyrant. He had three Ministers or Favorites (2), Men of mean birth who governed him entirely and whose sole view was to render him independent of the Laws, that they themselves might rule in his name with an arbitrary power. The King had two Brothers, namely, Alexander Duke of Albany, and John. The last speaking too freely of the King his Brother's conduct, was thrown into Prison, and there put to death by having his Veins opened. As the Favorites were afraid, Alexander would revenge his death, they perfwaded the King to confine him in a Castle.

At this Juncture it was that James, hated by his People, and particularly by the Nobility, undertook, without the least pretence, to break the Truce with the English. Edward was vexed to see the approaches of a rupture that would divert him from the War with France, to which he was much more inclined. Mean while, not to neglect all necessary precautions, he gave orders for the defence of the borders, and at the same time committed to certain Persons of Ireland, the care of making an Alliance in his Name, with the Earl of Reis Lord of the Iles, to give his Enemy a diversion from that quarter.

In June 1481, the Scots made an irruption into the borders before Edward's Army was ready. They carried away some booty, and that was all these mighty preparations came to. Edward made no haste to send an Army against Scotland, as well because he still hoped to end this Affair amicably, as because he knew King James's circumstances to be such, that he could not do him much hurt. His grand design was to be revenged of Lewis XI. For though that Prince, with his usual dissimulation, still put him in hopes, he would perform his promise with respect to the Marriage, and though he punctually paid twenty five thousand Crowns every six Months, Edward plainly perceived, he intended not to call in his word with regard to the first Article, and that a rupture was unavoidable.

For this reason he renewed his Alliance with the Duke of Bretagne, and concluded the Marriage of the Prince of Wales his Son, with Ann eldest Daughter of that Duke, or in case she died before consummation, with Isabella her youngest Sister, upon these conditions: That if there should be several Sons, the second, or next to the Heir of the Crown of England, should be Duke of Bretagne, and reside in the Country; That if the Duke should hereafter have a Son born in wedlock, he should espouse her of Edward's Daughters that was most fitable to his age; That if Edward had no Daughter to give him, the Duke should not marry his Son without the King's consent. Lastly, it was agreed betwixt them that if the King of France made war upon the Duke of Bretagne, Edward should send the Duke three thousand Men at his own

In the beginning of the year 1482, Edward renewed his Alliance with Portugal. Shortly after, he sent Ambassadors to Castile, to conclude the marriage of his Daughter Catherine with the Infante. But that affair did not succeed to his wish. All these Treaties, these renewings of Alliances, these projects of marriages, show, Edward intended to carry War into France (7).

Whilſt Edward was intent upon every thing conducive to the good ſuccels of his undertaking, Alexander Duke of Albany, Brother-in-law to the King of Scotland, eſcaped out of priſon, and arriv'd by Sea into England, to implore the King's protection. Besides the general reasons which all the Scots had to complain of their Sovereign, Alexander had very particular ones. The Death of the Duke his Brother, and his own imprisonment, violently incited him to ſeek means to be revenged, and doubtleſs, ambition greatly conſpired to inflame his piſſion. The English and Sarab Hithertofore have limited his deſire of revenge, to ſome general views of reclaiming the King his Brother, and procuring to himſelf the reſtitution of his eſtate. But the Collection of the Publick Acts furniſhes authentick proofs, that Alexander's deſign was to be poſſeſſed of the Throne. We find there his Treaty with Edward, wherein he aſſumes the Title of King of Scotland, and promiſes to do homage for that Kingdom to the Crown of England. He engages moreover to break the antient Alliance of France with Scotland, and make one with Edward againſt Le-

That if he could not succeed, he promises to marry his Son only to a Princess of England. Edward obliges himself on his part, to assist him with all his power to take possession of the Throne of Scotland. The Treaty being signed, Edward sent an Army against Scotland (-), under the command of the Duke of Gloucester his Brother, whom the Duke of Alban would accompany, but without taking however the title of King. Probably, this Treaty was a secret known to few Person. At the same time, Edward gave the command of a Fleet to Robert Rastell, to set against Scotland. The Duke of Gloucester advancing to the borders of the two Kingdoms, took the Town of Berwick, and being unwilling to lose time in besieging the Castle, left it invested (-) and marched directly to Edinburgh.

 When the Duke of Gloceſter was advancing at the head of his Army, King James who had wantonly undertaken this War without concerting meafures to proteſt againſt it vigorouſly, was greatly embarraſſed. The only means he had to refute the Engliſh was to aſſemble the Nobility; but he durſt not attempt it, knowing how much they were diſpleaſed with him and his Miniſters. He was forced however to refute it, or caſt himſelf upon the mercy of the Engliſh. So, the Lords being ſummoned, came with their Troops to Lauder, where they were expected by the King. But to what ſtreights ſooner that Prince was reduced, he altered not his conduct. His three favorites were his ſole Council, and ſcarce any dared to approach him but themſelves or their creatures. The Nobles, full of indignation at this conduct, reſolved to embrace fo fair an opportunity to be rid of thoſe by whom the King was beſet. After conſulting together upon what was to be done, ſome of them well-attended came to the King's apartment, and crying away the three favorites who he ſheltered themſelves in his room, brought them to the Army, where they called them to be immediately ſlain. James, extremely terrified, ſending alſo an ambaſſador to the Engliſh, promiſed to reform his conduct for the future; but a few days after, withdrew to the Caſtle or Edinbrough. So, the army being without a leader, diſbande'd themſelves, and the Lords returned to their homes.

quarters of Edinburgh, that if, before September, the King of Scotland did not observe the Peace made with the King of England, he would destroy the whole Kingdom with fire and sword. King James's engagement were chiefly to keep the Truce, and return the Money received for the dowry of the Princess Cecily, affianced to the Prince his son. To this the Duke of Glasgow added, that he should recall the Duke of Albany and restore him to his estate and honours, James equally unable to resist his enemies and to perform his engagements, made no answer. Mean while, the Nobles being assembled at Haddington, sent Deputies (4) to the Duke of Glasgow, to acquaint him, it was their earnest desire, the intended marriage should be consummated, and that neither they nor the States were to be blamed, that the Truce was not punctiliously observed. The Duke of Glasgow replied, the marriage being projected only to maintain a good understanding between the two Nations, and King James having wantonly broke it without any provocation, he did not know whether the King his Brother desired the marriage to be consummated: That however he had orders to receive the sums that were paid in part of the Princess's dowry: That as for the Truce, it would be ill redreedy observed by England, provided the King his Brother was put in possession of the Castle of Berwick, or at least, the Scots would promise not to assist the Besieged.

Matters flanding this, the Duke of Albany demanded of the Scotch Lords a Safe-Conduct, and obtaining it, he went and conferred with them. In the conference it was agreed, That the Duke of Albany should be made Regent of Scotland: That the Citizens of Edinburgh should be obliged to pay the King of England the money received by James, in case the projected marriage did not take effect: Lastly, That the Castle of Bellinzie should be surrendered to the Duke of Gloster. For the Duke of Albany's private security, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Bishop of Dunkeld, the High-Chancellor, the Earl of Argyle, promised to procure him a general pardon for all crimes whatever, even for attempting to dethrone the King; and to cause him to be restored to his w^l. estate. On the other hand, the Duke promised to acknowledge the King his Brother for his lawful Sovereign, and to swear Allegiance to him. This gives occasion to preface, his Treaty with Edward was known in Scotland, or the Duke thought proper to discover it, that this clause might be included in the pardon. This agreement being made (5), the Duke of Albany, 'either out of pure generosity, or because he thought he should meet with too many obstacles, relinquished his project of placing himself on the Throne. On the other hand, the Duke of Gloster spent some time at Newcastle, till the King his Brother should acquaint him with his pleasure, concerning his Daughter's marriage (6).

The Duke of Gloucester hearing of this disorder, hastened his march to Ellisburgh, and entered the City without opposition. He would have conferred with the King, but it was not even possible to inform him of his desire. This obstinacy to hearken to nothing, obliged the Duke of Gloucester to publish, by sound of Trumpet, in all the

The War with Scotland being ended, Edward turned all his thoughts to the War he designed to carry into France. But he was far from being in so favorable circumstances to be revenged of Lewis XI, as before the rupture with Scotland. Maria Duchess of Burgundy, being killed by a fall from her horse in March 1481, the Archduke her Spouse had so little authority among the Flemings, that he was forced to suffer his Children by that Princess to remain in the hands of the Gantois. Then Lewis XI, using all his policy to inspire the Flemings with a dread of the House of Austria's power, managed so dextrously with the Gantois, that he obtained their consent to give the Dauphin his Son, Margaret Daughter of their deceased Duchess, with the Earldoms of Artois, Burgundy, Montreuil, Auxerre and Chablais. This Treaty was made with that secrecy that Edward had no notice of it; so that Lewis still continued to amuse the English Ambassadors, even after it was ended to his wish. The first news they had of it, was the arrival of the young Dauphiness, two years old, who was brought to Paris in April 1482. The nuptials were solemnized in July. This was a great vexation, and most outrageous affront to Edward, who caused the Princess his Daughter to be titled Madam the Dauphiness. He had perhaps forgot the affront he himself put upon Lewis with regard to his own marriage, or thought love would excuse it; but Lewis believed himself no less executed by politics, and what Kings call reasons of State. Be this as it will, Edward full of indignation and rage, bent all his thoughts to revenge; but it was too late, the opportunities he had neglected were irretrievably lost. He could no longer rely upon the assistance of the Flemings, who had so openly shown their attachment to the interests of France. The Duke of Bretagne was seized with a melancholy, which rendered him incapable of any considerable undertaking. The King of Scotland had no reason to be pleased, and all that Edward could expect from his Alliance with the Kings of Spain and Portugal, was, that they would not give any Assistance to Lewis. So to be revenged, Edward must, like Henry V, attack France with the forces of England alone. But France was very far from being in the same circumstances, as when Henry V began the War. Nevertheless, in spite of improbability of succeeding in such an undertaking, Edward was bent upon it. For that purpose, he assembled all the Lords that were at Court or near London, and in a very moving speech represented to them how great reason the English nation, and himself in particular, had, to resent the grievous affronts put upon them by the King of France. He forgot not to display the title of the Kings of England to the Crown of France. That was the chief topic to touch the hearts of the English. In short, he added whatever he thought capable to persuade them, not only of the necessity of a War with France, but also of the great probability of a happy success. There is no need of much eloquence to induce the English to wage War with France. All the Lords unanimously declared, they thought the War just and necessary, and assured the King, they were ready to serve him with their lives and fortunes. The report being spread in the Kingdom, that a War with France was resolved, an extraordinary joy appeared in Peoples faces, as if the news of some great victory had been received.

But whilst preparations were making for this important war, Edward was seized with a mortal distemper, which discovered to him the vanity of all his projects. When he found himself mortally sick, he beheld with another Eye than before, whatever had ingrossed him during his past Life; and it is pretended, he shewed marks of a sincere repentance. But in the last moments, the great sear of hearts alone can perfectly judge of the sentiments expressed by the Tongue. Edward died the 9th of April, in the forty second year of his age (1), after a Reign of two and twenty years and one month. The cause of his death is variously reported. Some accuse the Duke of Gloucester of poisoning him. But this Accusation being groundless, ought not to be too lightly credited. Philip de Commines pretends, Edward died with great vexation, to see himself baffled and deceived by Lewis XI. But what he says is to be considered only as a bare conjecture, and the rather, as Edward was convinced, two years before, of Lewis's Innuity. The most probable opinion is, that he died of a surfeit, being used to divert his cares with excessive eating and drinking (2).

I have hitherto spoken only of Edward the IV's most shining Actions, by reason of their connexion with the publick Affairs. It will be necessary now to say something of his person, and describe the good and bad qualities of his body and mind. But first, I cannot forbear once more to remark, that a man must be upon his guard, with respect to the Historians that speak of this Prince, as well as of his Brother Richard III. The greatest part wrote when the Throne was filled with the notions of the House of Lancaster, who were extremely jealous of their Rights, and would not willingly have injured them to be blamished, or the Kings of the House of York to be praised. The After-writers, when the Civil Wars were forgot, transcribed what they found in these first Historians, and frequently gave for truth, what was only the effect of the prejudice or policy of the former Hilliards. In every part, who have no Interest to blacken the Plantagenet's reputation, I have endeavored to avoid that error, without concealing however either of failings or ill qualities.

When Edward ascended the Throne, he was one of the handsomest Men in England, and perhaps in Europe. This is acknowledged by all. His noble Mien, his fine and easy Air, his amiable Carriage, procured every one in his favor. These qualities, joined to an intrepid Courage, gained him among the People, an esteem and affection, extremely reasonable in him, in many circumstances of his Life. Philip de Commines admires, beyond his restoration, to the Inclination, the principal Ladies had for him. But that would have been inconsiderable, had he not likewise acquired the affection of their Husbands, and in general, of most part of the English. If he had not depended upon the hearts of the people, he would never have ventured to attempt the recovery of the Throne, with the help of two thousand Men, who were mostly foreigners. For some time, he was exceeding liberal, but at last became covetous, and too much from his natural Temper, as from a necessity to supply the immediate expenses, into which he was thrown by his pleasures. Though he had a great extent of wit, and a solid judgment, he committed however several very great errors. The first was, when he looked himself to be assisted by the Earl of Warwick. But that fault was in great measure repaired, by the docility and readiness wherewith he used himself from the Archbishop of York. The second was, to trust such persons as betrayed him, and were sold to France. The third, to suffer himself to be so far deceived by Lewis XI, who was unweariedly, exclaimed against for his Faith. Most Historians have extremely aggravated this error, as being ignorant, that from the year 1450, he began to take measures to make war upon Lewis, as appears in what has been quoted from the Collections of the Parket Book. Two other errors are also ascribed to him, which may be more easily excused. The first is, his breaking off the war with France for an inconsiderable sum, at a time when he might have flattered himself with the hope of success. But the circumstances of this affair be well examined, it will be easily seen, that being forsaken by the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne his Allies, it would have been very hard to pursue with his own Forces alone, the execution of so great an enterprize, which, probably, would have proved unsuccessful. Another error laid to his charge, is, his not joining with the Helms of Burgundy, to stop the progress of the King of France. I own, that was a real fault. However, it may be considerably lessened, by the examples of several Princes eminent for their Abilities, who observed the same conduct on like occasions. Uncertain of the events, Princes often run the race, and are great gainers by setting their neighbors at variance, in hopes of their weakening one another. But the fault sometimes happens not to answer their expectations. It is certain, if Alonso of Castile, afterwards the Archduke her Husband had more vigorously resisted the attacks of Lewis XI, nothing was more capable to render Edward the Umpire of Europe, than the mutual weakening of these two powers. By this conduct it was that he became himself courted by the King of France, and the Duke of Burgundy, because he was always in concert to make the balance incline to one side. He repaid, perhaps, it would be always the same; but he had to deal with a more artful Prince than himself.

These are properly political faults, which are often considered as such, only because of the events which were the result of them. But the Crimes Barbarous is much more charged upon, are his Cruelty, Envy, and Inconstancy. The first appears in the great number of Princes and Lords, whom, after taking from prison, he put to death on the Scaffold. It was there, when he was put to exercise Mercy in case of Richard, it was at that fatal time when it was almost impossible to stand neuter, and to 1483. difficult to chuse the justest side between the two Houses, that were contending for the Crown. And yet, we don't find, Edward had ever any regard to that consideration. The death of the Prince of Wales, Son of Henry VI., murdered almost in his presence; and that of Henry himself, notwithstanding his innocence, may perhaps be justified in some measure, by those who think nothing unlawful when a Throne is in question; but they will never be excused by those who have any tincture of Religion. As for the death of the Duke of Clarence, I don't know whether it would be possible to find the least softning, if it be true, as it is very probable, that he was innocent.

His Breach of Faith.

Edward's breach of faith was visible, in the unjust punishment of the Lord Wells and his Brother-in-law, after drawing them out of Sanctuary by a Safe-Conduct; in that of the Bastard of Faucunbridge, whose Crime he had pardoned: And lastly, in his Oath at York, taken even with intention to break it. All these actions are of the number of those, that can be excused only by reasons of State; weak excuse in things where Honour and Religion are concerned.

His Inconti-
Moore.

As for Edward's Incontinency, his whole Life may be said to be one continued Scene of Lust. He had many Concubines, but especially three, of whom he said, One was the merriest (1), the other the wittiest, and the third the holiest in the World, for she was always in a Church, but when he sent for her. He had however but two natural Children, both by Elizabeth Lucy, (to whom he is said to have been contracted before his marriage,) Arthur surnamed Plantagenet, created Viscount L'Isle by Henry VIII. (2), and Elizabeth, Wife of Sir Thomas Lameley. I shall say nothing of Edward's Religion, since Historians mention it only in relating his Death-bed discourses.

Fortune.

What is most surprizing in the Life of this Prince, is his good fortune, which seems to be almost miraculous. He was raised to the Throne after the loss of two Battles, the first by the Duke his Father, the other by the Earl of Warwick, then devoted to the House of York. The head of the Father was still upon the Walls of York, when the Son was proclaimed at London. Edward escaped, as it were by Miracle, out of his Confinement at Middleham. He was restored to the Throne, or at least received into London at his return from Holland, before he had vanquished, and whilst his fortune yet depended upon the decision of a Battle, which the Earl of Warwick was ready to give him. In a word, he was ever victorious in all the Battles where he was present (3).

Elizabeth his Queen brought him a numerous Issue, His Issue, namely, three Princes, and eight Princesses, of whom one Son and two Daughters died in their Infancy (4). We shall see presently the fate of his eldest Son Edward his Successor, and of his Brother Richard Duke of York.

Elizabeth the eldest of his Daughters (5) was promised in marriage to the Dauphin, Son of Lewis XI. afterwards King of France by the Name of Charles VIII. In process of time, she was married to Henry VII. King of England.

Cecily, who was affianced to the Prince of Scotland, espoused the Lord Viscount Wells, and after his death, another whose Name I know not, she died without Issue (6).

Ann was contracted to Philip, Son of Maximilian of Austria and Maria of Burgundy. But that Marriage not taking effect, she espoused Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, by whom she had two Sons, who died without Issue (7).

Bridget was a Nun, [at Dartford.]

Mary, who was promised to the King of Denmark died at Greenwich before her marriage was solemnized.

Catherine, whom the King her Father would have given to the Infante of Spain, was married to William Courteney Earl of Devonshire, by whom she had a Son created Marquis of Exeter, in the reign of Henry VIII.

It must be remarked, that in the English Histories there is a continual Anachronism of a year, and sometimes of two, from 1474, to the end of this reign (7).

In the year 1483, the last of this Reign, was born Thomas surnamed a Shropshire Man, noted for his extraordinary great Age. By an Indenture of the 4th of Edward IV., a Pound Weight of Gold of the old Standard, was to make by Tale twenty Pounds, sixteen Shillings and Eight-pence; and a Pound Weight of Silver, old Sterling, was to make thirty seven Shillings and Six-pence. By other Indentures of the 5th, 8th, 11th, 16th, and 22d of the same King, a Pound Weight of Gold of the old Standard, was to make forty five Nobles, going for ten Shillings six-pence, or ninety half Nobles, or one hundred and eighty quarter Nobles, or fifty seven and a half of the Piece impressed with Angels, going for six Shillings and Eight-pence each, and consequently was coined into twenty two Pounds ten Shillings by Tale; and the Silver Money were from at thirty seven Shillings and Six-pence the Pound Weight Troy. These Indentures were made between the King, and the Lord Hoffings his Chamberlain, Master, Worker, and Warden, of all his Exchanges and Outchanges in England and Calais. King Edward IV.'s Monies are distinguished from those of Edward III. by the Form of the Letters, particularly II, which is not made like an H, as in those of Edward III.; as also by the Weight, his Groats being above twenty Grains lighter; moreover, the Title of Island is wanting on his Coins. The outer Circle on the Groats is wanting, leaving the Letters extended to the very edge, and generally worn part away, in other respects like his Predecessors; and of several Mints, as London, York, Canterbury, Bristol; some of them, besides the Name of the Place of Mintage on the Reverse, have the initial Letters E. C. R. on the King's Breast. (Fig. 1.) The Irish Groats have the King's Head within a Rose, and generally make no mention at all of England, with the Place of Coinage on the Reverse, at Dublin, Down, Waterford; the power of coining Money being taken from other Places. These fall short of the English Groats near ten Grains; the first difference betwixt the Standards of the English and Irish Money beginning in this Reign. Of this Irish Money there is one piece having on the Reverse, CIVITAS. DVBLINIE. with a large Star, that fills the whole Area: This is reckoned a great Curiosity. (Fig. 2.) There is another in Speed, having on one Side the Arms of France and England quartered, inscribed, REX. ANGLI. E. FRANCIE. Reverse, three Crowns, denoting the three Kingdoms DOMINVS. HIBERNIE. (Fig. 3.) The Ryal is like Henry VI.'s Rose Noble, only here is added a Flag at the Stern of the Ship, wherein is the Letter E. EDWARD. DI. GRA. REX. ANGL. Z. FRANC. DNS. IB. Reverse, IHS. AVT. TRANSIENS. PER MEDIVM. ILLORV. IBAT. Instead of a Cross, there is a Rose in the Center, with Rays like a Sun, extending to the Lions and Fleurs-de-lis interchangeably. The Angel is exactly like that of Henry VI.

17. EDWARD V.

AFTER the death of Edward IV, the Prince his eldest Son, between twelve and thirteen years of age, was proclaimed King by the name of Edward V. The reign of this Prince was short and unfortunate; if the two months and twelve days that he bore the title of King, and which were wholly spent in depriving him of the Crown, even before he had solemnly received it, is not rather to be deemed an Interregnum. However, as during that short space, he was generally acknowledged for Sovereign of England, Historians have made no scruple to rank him among the Kings. The whole subject of this reign confits only of the means used by the Duke of Gloucester to dispossess the young King his Nephew, and place himself in the Throne. But before I enter upon the relation of these detestable practices, it will be necessary to shew the state of the Court of England before the death of Edward IV.

Elizabeth Woodville, who from a subject was become Queen, by her marriage with Edward, held the first rank at Court, as well by the privileges common to all Queens, as by her great credit. From the time of her marriage, she had acquired an influence over the King which she preferred to the day of his death. Her birth by her Father's side was not very considerable (1). But her Mother, who had been Wife of the famous Duke of Bedford, was of the House of Luxemburgh, illustrious for the Princes, Kings, and Emperors it had given to Europe. So, considering Elizabeth as derived from thence, it is not at all strange, she should have a great soul, and think herself as worthy to command, as the noblest Lords of England. Mean time, as being Queen gave her no right to interpose in the public affairs, she artfully assumed it by her ascendancy over the King. Though Edward often proved false to her, she bore it with patience and without any signs of uneasiness. Edward charmed to find himself at liberty to pursue his inclinations, without danger of continual reproaches, repaid this moderation with all sorts of concessions, which the Queen knew how to improve. The advancement of Sir Richard Woodville her Father to the honour of Earl of Rivers (2), and the marriage of her Brother with the richest Heiress of the Kingdom, were the first proofs she gave of her power. After that, Edward heaped honours and riches upon this family, even to the desiring to marry his Brother-in-law Anthony to the King of Scotland's Sister (3), as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. When the Prince of Wales was of age to have a Governor, this same Lord, become Earl of Rivers, was entrusted with that high Office. The Queen forgot not her own Children by her former Husband Sir John Grey [of Groby.] Thomas Grey her eldest Son, was made Marquis of Dorset, Governor of the Tower, and keeper of the King's treasures. Richard Grey his Brother, was created a Baron, and had a considerable post about the Prince of Wales.

If the Queen had confined her favours to her Sons, her Father, and her Brother, there would have been no reason to think it very strange. But it cannot be denied, that she made an ill use of her power, by causing to be created Peers, many persons who would have had no pretension to that honour, if they had not been supported by her favour. This gave occasion to the distinction in those days, between the ancient and the new Nobility. But if this distinction redounded not to the honour of the last, that disadvantage was amply repaired, by the places of honour and profit procured them by the Queen. By degrees she had as they were banished the ancient Nobility from the Court, where appeared scarce any but Lords of the new Creation, all attached to the Queen. It was much the same in all the rest of the Kingdom, where the most considerable posts were filled by such as the Queen knew to be her creatures. Her aim was to preserve her power during the King's life, and in case she survived him, to secure the Government of the Kingdom in her Son's name, when he should be on the Throne. But by a fatality very common to the best contrived projects, this very thing proved the occasion of her own and her family's ruin.

The Queen having thus openly declared against the ancient families, it is easy to conceive she was not beloved. Accordingly she took all possible care to hinder the Lords whom she did not like, from having the King's ear. Mean while, it was not in her power to expel the Court three Lords of the ancient Nobility whom the King loved, because they had done him signal services. These were Henry Stafford Duke of Buckingham, William Hastings, and Thomas Stanley.

The first, who was of a very ancient Family (4), had moreover the advantage of being descended from a Daughter of Thomas of Woodstock Duke of Gloucester, seventh Son of Edward the third, and enjoyed the office of High-Chamberlain.

The Lord Hastings (5) was High-Chamberlain. The King had a singular affection for him, because of his constant loyalty, of which he had given proofs in the time of his adversity; particularly when he was forced to fly into Holland. This Lord was extremely attached to the King's person, but loved not the Queen; if he paid her any respect, it was with reluctance and solely out of compliance to the King his master.

The Lord Stanley (6), of an ancient family, was in the same dispositions. He was devoted to the King without making much court to the Queen.

The King's Concubines held likewise a considerable rank at Court, by reason of their influence over him. There were three especially, of whom Jane Shore alone was concerned in the events of this new Reign. She was Wife to a Citizen of London, whom Edward had debauched, and taken from her Husband. She was surprisingly beautiful, and withal of a generosity very uncommon in persons of her character. The King was as much in love with her temper as her beauty. He never heard her speak ill of any person, nor ever perceived her to try to prejudice him against any man whatever. If the importuned him sometimes, it was in behalf of the unfortunate. When she had done a good office, she scorned to take a reward, being unwilling to give occasion to think she acted from a motive of interest. And therefore she had amassed but few riches, in comparison of other Concubines, whose greediness can never be satisfied.

The Duke of Gloucester the King's Brother was embarrassed between the two parties formed at Court, and in the Kingdom. The only way to please the King, was to make court to the Queen. But on the other hand, the Duke perceiving the Queen's aim was to ingross the Government in case the King happened to die, could not be attached to her, without forfeiting the affection of the ancient Nobility, of which he might one day stand in need. As he was naturally a great dissembler, he resolved to make his court publicly to the Queen, but in private, he joined with the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Hastings, and the Lord Stanley.

It is needless to say much of the two young Princes the King's Sons, the eldest of whom was but twelve, and the Duke of York his brother but nine years old, when the King their Father died. It will suffice to say, that before Edward IV. was seized with the distemper that laid him in his grave, he had sent the Prince his eldest Son, with the Earl of Rivers his Governor, into Wales to appease some commotion (7). The young Duke of York remained at Court with the Queen his Mother.

Edward saw with some concern the two parties that were formed in his Court. But his affection for the Queen not suffering him to hold the balance even, he took no care to prevent the consequences. So long as he enjoyed his health, he imagined, that during his life he should be always master of both, and by strengthening the 1483. new Nobility hinder the old from being able to prejudice the Queen and her Children after his death. But when he came to die, he beheld this division in another light. He considered, that he left for support to his house only new families, which had not had time to establish themselves, and owed all their authority and credit entirely to his favour, of which they were going to be deprived. This thought sensibly troubling him, he sought in himself the means to repair this error, and in his present condition, found no better way, than to persuade the two parties to be reconciled for his sake. Weak expedient! which could hardly produce the desired effect. The regard for a dying King, never beloved by the antient Nobility, was little capable of extinguishing their hatred and envy of the Queen's relations, which unhappily, had been but too much fomented. However, before he expired, Edward had at least the satisfaction to see this reconciliation, which he thought sincere, because of the seeming readiness and cheerfulness wherewith both Parties consented to his request. The Earl of Rivers being absent, the Queen his Sister passed her word for him, and the Marquis of Dorset her eldest Son, as representing the family of Grey, embraced the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Hastings, who were the heads of the opposite party. The Duke of Glocester being then at York, upon the King's affairs, had it not in his power to obstruct this reconciliation, which indeed would have been very much to his prejudice had it not been insincere.

As soon as Edward's eyes were closed, the two parties forgetting their late mutual protestations of friendship, thought only of gaining the advantage one of another. Mean while, they unanimously agreed to proclaim the deceased King's eldest Son by the name of Edward V. That done, each took such measures as were thought most proper to attain his ends. The chief thing was to become master of the King's person, in order to govern in his name. The Queen hoped to maintain and even to increase her authority, during the King her Son's Minority, and the other party saw themselves irrecoverably lost, if the young Prince was once in the hands of his Mother. However, thus far the advantage was entirely on the Queen's side. Immediately after the death of the King her Husband, she had dispatched a courier to the Earl of Rivers her Brother with the news. She told him withal in the letter, that she believed it absolutely necessary for him to raise forces in Wales, and the adjoining Counties, to enable him to conduct the new King safely to London, in order to his Coronation.

On the other side, the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Hastings sent an express to the Duke of Glocester (1), acquainting him with the King's death, and the Queen's measures; and withal representing to him, that being the King's Uncle by the Father's side, the Government of the Realm belonged to him, during the Minority; but if he did not prevent the Queen, it would be in vain to expect afterwards to obtain his due Right. In fine, that at all adventures, they offered him a thousand Men well armed, and ready to march at the word of Command.

It is very difficult to judge, whether before the death of Edward IV. the Duke of Glocester had thought of mounting the Throne, to the prejudice of his Nephews. But it is scarce to be doubted, that he formed this design the moment he heard of his Brother's decease. All his after-proceedings, too plainly appear to be consequences of a Scheme laid to compass that end. As for the Lord Hastings, his sole Intention was certainly to take the Government out of the hands of the Queen and her Relations. His constant attachment to Edward IV. would never have suffered him to be concerned in a Plot to dethrone his Son. As for the Duke of Buckingham, his Conduct is more ambiguous. Besides his hatred of the Queen and her Family, he had always preserved a particular respect for the Duke of Glocester, which gives occasion to suspect, he had joined with him at first in the design to place him on the Throne. However, the Historians ascribe to him (at least in the beginning of this Reign,) the same Intention only with the Lord Hastings, namely to remove the Queen from the Government of the King's Person, and of the Realm. Be this as it will, the Duke of Glocester, upon news of the King's death, sent back the Express, with orders to desire the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Hastings, to come and confer with him at Northampton.

These two Lords, with some others of their Party, repairing to the place appointed, the Duke of Glocester, in a long Speech, demonstrated to them, the great and impending danger, if the Queen was possessed of the Government. He told them, "They would be exposed to "the Mercy of an imperious Woman, and of the two "Families of Rivers and Grey, newly raised by the King

"his Brother, who would never think themselves per"fectly safe, till those whom they considered as their ri"vals and enemies were destroyed. That the late King
"had kept them, by his Authority, within some bounds,
"but when they should be possessed of the supreme Pow"er, in the name of the young King, nothing would be "capable of curbing their Insolence. He added, that no "person had more Right, or was more concerned than "himself, to take care of the affairs of the Kingdom,
"during the Minority of the King his Nephew. That "every one knew his constant attachment to the King
"his Brother, and therefore his tender affection for his "Children suffered him not to leave them to the Mercy "of those, who had never appeared to have any other "view than their own advancement. That for these "reasons he was resolved, zealously to apply himself to "promote, to the utmost of his power, the good of the "Nation, and the honor of his Nephew, principally by "giving him an Education that should render him ca"pable of treading in the Steps of his illustrious Ancestors.
"But that he could not hope to execute such a Project,
"without the assistance of all honest Men, and particu"larly of those to whom he was speaking, who, with"out doubt, had, like him, no other view, than the Na"tion's welfare and glory. That he had assembled them "to consult with them upon what was to be done in the "present emergency, being resolved not to proceed with-
"out their advice."

This Speech meeting with applause, all the Lords entered into a serious debate, concerning the means to be used to become master of the King's person. To succeed by force was extremely difficult. The Earl of Rivers had not only assembled a good number of Troops, but it would have been also very easy for him to conduct the King to London, before they were in condition to prevent it. Besides, they would have given him too great an advantage, if without any apparent necessity, they had begun to soon to take arms. Such a step would have infallibly caused the people to side with their enemies, and been looked upon as tending to obstruct the King's Coronation. These considerations made the Lords resolve to use policy. To that end, they agreed, that they should continue to shew a great zeal for the King, in order to deprive the Queen of all pretence to raise Forces, or keep those on foot that were assembled by the Earl of Rivers. That the Duke of Glocester should try to persuade her to dismiss these Troops as useless. That in case he succeeded, it should be endeavoured to become master of the King, before his arrival at London; but if, on the contrary, the Queen was bent to keep these Forces, she was to be amused with Negotiations, till her designs could be openly opposed.

The Conference being ended, the Lord Hastings posted to London, where his presence was necessary, by reason of his great Interest in the City. Presently after, the Duke of Glocester sent the Queen a Letter (2) of condolence upon the King's death, expressing an extreme affection for the young Prince, his Successor, and an extraordinary respect for her. After this beginning, he told her, "He "beheld with great Joy, all hearts united in the same "Sentiments, which made him hope, that the King his "Nephew would pass his Minority in a perfect Tran"quillity. That, for his part, he would do all that lay "in his power, to keep the People in the obedience due "to their Sovereign, by giving them himself an example "of unlimited Submission. That he did not question,
"he would likewise contribute to cause all the King's "Subjects, to enjoy the peace and quiet they had reason "to expect. That therefore, he took the freedom to "advise her, to use her endeavours to dispel the old Je-
"alousies among the great Men, and confirm, by her pru"dence, the Reconciliation lately made before the King
"her Husband's death. That his advice was, that with"out affection or prejudice, care should be taken to re"ward Merit wherever it was found, that no man might "justly complain of being neglected for mere Party-con"cerns. That this was chiefly to be endeavoured, left "by acting otherwise, divisions, which ought to be buried "in eternal oblivion, were renewed. That therefore he "could not forbear telling her, he was surprized to hear
"the Earl of Rivers was gathering Forces, to conduct
"the King to London, since they seemed to be entirely "needless. That he was really convinced of the good"ness of her Intention, but it was to be feared, this "proceeding would be ill-construed. That Troops, "raised upon the frivolous pretence of providing for the "King's safety, when none appeared to give him any

"disturbance,

1483. "disturbance, could not but breed suspicions in the opposite party, lately reconciled. That the precautions several Lords would undoubtedly take, to screen themselves from the mischief they would have reason to dread, were the natural and infallible fruits of these suspicions. That therefore, to avoid a groundless peril, and by a needless precaution, the peace of the whole Kingdom was endangered. That when once these suspicions should take root, and two armies be on foot in the Kingdom, God alone knew what might be the issue. That for these reasons, of which doubtless she perceived the strength, he advised her to dismiss her Troops, that all the Nobles of the Realm might come, without fear and suspicion, to pay their respects to their young Sovereign, and contribute, every one according to his power, to the preservation of peace and union in the State."

The Queen very imprudently followed this advice, of which she perceived not the venom. She thought it was the sooner to be complied with, as it came from a Brother-in-law, who had always been firm to the Interests of the late King, and still shewed himself very zealous for her and her Children. During Edward IV's life, the Duke of Gloucester had been very respectful to the Queen, so that she had no reason to suspect him. Besides, there was not in his Letter a single word to induce her to think he intended to dispute the Government with her. In fine, she considered, the Duke could not aspire to the Crown, without supplanting two Nephews, and five Nieces, who were not in his power. This alone would have been capable to remove her suspicions, supposing she could have entertained any. So, believing herself sufficiently supported, since the Duke of Gloucester expressed so great an attachment to her Interests, she writ to the Earl of Rivers her Brother, that she thought it proper, he should dismiss his Troops, for fear of raising jealousies without occasion. The Earl immediately obeyed her orders, and keeping only the King's domesticks, began his Journey to conduct him to London.

The young King approaching Northampton, the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, who had brought into the Town nine hundred armed Men (1), went to meet him, and saluted him very respectfully. In discoursing with the Earl of Rivers, they told him, the Town of Northampton was so full of strangers, and ill provided with Provisions and other Conveniences, that it would be very inconvenient for theirs, and the King's Retinue to lodge in that place. Then, they advised him to carry the King to Stony Stratford (2), which is but twelve Miles farther in the road to London. They added, for their part, they would return to Northampton, and wait upon the King in the morning, before he sat out. Upon parting, one of them proposed to the Earl, in a free and easy manner, as if it had been a sudden thought, to go and pass the night with them at Northampton, whilst the King rested at Stony Stratford. The Earl not suspecting their design, complied with this kind Invitation. He was even glad of an occasion to cement their mutual reconciliation, by this mark of Confidence.

The three Lords being come to Northampton, spent the Evening together in perfect Harmony, with mutual professions of friendship and offers of service. Bed-time being come, the Earl of Rivers withdrew to his Lodgings. But the other two passed the rest of the night in consulting what was to be done, since the Earl of Rivers had indiscreetly put himself into their hands. Their consultation being ended, they secured the Keys of the Inn where they lodged, under colour that they would be the first that should attend the King in the morning. For the greater precaution, they sent a good number of Men to line the way, and suffer no person whatever to enter Stony Stratford. At break of day they were ready to mount, whilst the Earl of Rivers was still in bed. Mean time, one of his People waking him, and telling him, the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham were ready to depart, and that no body was suffered to go out of the Inn, he immediately put on his Cloaths, to know the reason of this proceeding. But he found them in a very different disposition from that wherein he had left them some hours before. Upon his Approach they began to quarrel with him (3), taxing him with alienating the King's affection from his most faithful Subjects, adding, they should take care to prevent the like practices for the future. The Earl began to return a calm answer to this accusation, but refusing to hear him, they committed him to the custody of some of their Servants, and mounting their Horses rid away to the King.

They found the young Prince ready to depart, and paying him their respects, re-mounted in order to attend him. Before they were out of the Town, they quarrelled with the Lord Grey (4), the King's Half-Brother, and charged him, that jointly with the Marquis of Dorset his Brother, and the Earl of Rivers his Uncle, he had formed the project to become master of the King's Person: And that the Marquis of Dorset had moreover taken out of the Tower, the Treasure committed to his custody by the late King. Whereupon the King said, that for what concerned the Marquis of Dorset he could say nothing, but would answer for the conduct of the Earl of Rivers and the Lord Grey, since they had been continually with him. To this the Duke of Buckingham replied, they had taken care to conceal their Plots from his Hivhness, which however were not the less certain. At the same time, he ordered his people to arrest the Lord Grey, with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Huseye, and instead of proceeding to London, carried the King back to Northampton (5). The same or next day the Prisoners were conducted to Pontefract Castle (6), the Governor whereof was the Duke of Gloucester's Creature. The King appeared extremely concerned for the disgrace of his Brother and Uncle, as well as for the violence to his own Person. But he had no way to free himself from his new Governors, but his tears, which were little regarded. Mean while, they paid him outwardly all the reverence usually paid to a Sovereign, in order to blind the Eyes of the People by these marks of respect and submission.

The news being brought to the Queen, she perceived her error in relying on the Duke of Gloucester, and suspected immediately, he would not stop there, and had formed designs still more destructive to the Royal Family. So, finding herself deprived of the assistance of her Brother and Sons, as well as of their Counsels, she saw no other refuge, than, with the Duke of York her Son and the rest of her Family, to take sanctuary in Westminster (7).

The Lord Hastings, then at London, hated the Queen, as I observed, but loved the King and all Edward IV's Family. It is true, he was engaged in Gloucester's and Buckingham's plot, but it was with a belief that it tended only to hinder the Queen from assuming the Government, which he thought just and reasonable. He had intelligence in the night of what had passed at Northampton, and instantly sent the news to Dr. Rotherham the Archbishop of York and Lord Chancellor, assuring him withal, he had no reason to be alarmed: That the King's Person was in no danger, and very shortly what had happened would turn to the welfare of the Kingdom. The Archbishop rising that moment, went to the Queen, and carried the great Seal along with him. He found her in a very disconsolate condition, sitting upon the ground, lamenting her own and her Children's Fate, whilst her Domesticks were busy in carrying such goods as were necessary into the Sanctuary. He endeavoured to comfort her, telling her what the Lord Hastings had declared to him. But he found her very backward to believe, that any good could come from such an Enemy. Then the Prelate, to give her hope, told her, the King's Person was safe, since the Duke of York his Brother was not in the power of those whom she considered as her Enemies. He added, if they should be so audacious as to put the King to death, or give the Crown to another, he assured her he would immediately crown the Duke of York. In fine, to give her all possible assurances of his fidelity, he left the Great Seal with her. But reflecting afterwards upon his error, in refusing so precious a pledge committed to him by the late King, he sent for it again as soon as he came home.

Mean while, the whole City of London was in commotion. Several Citizens had taken arms, not knowing what might be the end of the news they had just received, which probably was very much aggravated. The Lord Hastings being sensible, that an Insurrection at London might break the measures of his friends at Northampton, instantly came into the City, and as his credit was great among the Citizens, he assured them that the King was in no danger: That indeed the Earl of Rivers, the Lord Grey, and some others, were arrested for conspiring against the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, but would be brought to a legal Trial: That however, it was no just reason for them to take arms, and it was to be feared they would be called to an account for the tumult, if they did not lay them down as readily as they had taken them up. The Citizens supposing the Lord Hastings to be perfectly informed, by reason he was of the Duke of Buckingham's Party, retired to their houses, being unwilling

The King is brought to London, Moon.

Shortly after, the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham conducted the King to London, paying him all the respect due to his dignity. As they travelled along, they caused a report to be spread, that the Earl of Rivers and the rest of the Prisoners at Pontefract had intended to kill them; and their Servants shewed the People Barrels of Arms, which were said to be found among the baggage of the Conspirators. The news of the extraordinary respect paid the King, flying to London before his Arrival, the City grew much more quiet, because there was reason to believe, there had been no attempt upon the King's Person or dignity. At his approach, the People went out in crowds to receive him, and the young King entered the City (1), attended by a great number of Lords, and particularly by the Duke of Gloucester, who followed him bare-headed (2). He was lodged in the Bishop's Palace, to shew the Citizens the great confidence placed in them, and that his safety only was consulted (3). This management entirely removed the suspicions of the Duke of Gloucester, raised by the Northampton Affair.

The Duke of Gloucester calls a grand Council, Moon.

The Rejoicings for the King's safe Arrival being ended, it was necessary to think of settling the Government during his Minority, which was to last seven years. The most natural way would have been to call a Parliament, as was practised after the death of Henry V. But as, during a Parliament, all other Authority would have ceased, till the Government was regulated, the Duke of Gloucester did not think fit to part with the power he had acquired by seizing the King's person. Indeed he might have expected, that the Parliament would confer on him the dignity of Protector of the Realm, since he was the only Prince of the blood capable of holding the Reins of the Government. But withal the care of the young King's Person and Education would have been certainly committed to others. It is a constant and very just rule not to trust a minor King to those that may be Gainers by his ruin. But this was what the Duke of Gloucester feared above all things. He resolved to continue Master of the King's Person, otherwise it would have been very difficult to accomplish his designs. These considerations made him think it more agreeable to his Interests to call a great Council, and not summon a Parliament till he had secured the Crown. This Council, mostly consisting of the antient Nobility and the Duke of Gloucester's friends, declared him Protector of the King and Kingdom, usurping a Privilege belonging only to the Parliament. But as I have often observed, it is easier to cause the Parliament to confirm what is done, than induce it to do what is desired.

He is declared Protector, Moon.

Dreadful Rebellions, Moon.

The seizing of the King's Person, and the getting himself declared Protector, were the two first steps by which the Duke of Gloucester intended to mount the Throne. Each had its fair and foul side. In the first place, after the death of Edward IV., the Queen and her Relations having no right to seize the Government of the Realm, it could not be thought strange, that the Duke of Gloucester should assume near the King, the rank to which he was intitled by his Birth. But his fraud and violence to the Queen's Relations, gave occasion to suspect, he had formed deeper designs. In the next place, nothing was more natural than to see the King's Uncle Protector of the Realm. But at the same time, his affecting to obtain that dignity, without vouchsafing to call a Parliament, and his causing to be annexed to the office of Protector of the Realm, that of Protector of the King, which should have been separated from it, was an extraordinary Proceeding, which might have raised just suspicions. And yet the consequence was not perceived till it was too late to prevent it. But for fear these irregular things might open People's eyes, the Duke took care to conceal himself under the veil of an extraordinary zeal for the King his Nephew's interests, and a great respect for his Person.

At a Council, Moon.

As soon as the Duke was declared Protector, he took the Great Seal from Archbishop Rotherham, who had given him a very plausible pretence, and delivered it to the Bishop of Lincoln (4). The Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Hastings were confirmed in their places; but there were great alterations made in all the rest of the Posts, the new Protector putting in his own creatures in the room of the Queen's, who filled them before. Tho' the Lord Hastings was not trusted with the secret of his principal design, he did not despair of gaining him, when his affairs were more advanced. Besides, Hastings was a mortal enemy to the Queen and her Family, and had a great interest in London. This was sufficient then, for, without knowing it, he could be serviceable to the Pro-tektor in executing his projects, which it was not yet proper to discover.

To proceed with any appearance of success in his design, it was necessary for the Duke of Gloucester to have the young Duke of York in his power, as well as the King his Brother. To dethrone or murder the King, would have been to no purpose, so long as the Duke of York was out of reach. For he would still have had the same thing to act over again. In order to accomplish this Design, he moved in the Council whether it would not be requisite to get the Duke of York out of the Queen's hands, and place him with the King his Brother. He made, upon this occasion, a very long speech, wherein, after testifying an extraordinary zeal for the Royal Family, and confirming what he said with a great oath, he displayed the reasons which required the young Prince's removal from the Queen. The first was, "That the Queen's flying to sanctuary without any apparent danger to herself or family, could not but be construed as an affront to the Government. In the second place, her sole aim must have been to raise disturbances by making the people believe the King was in danger, since no other consequence could be inferred from her conduct. That therefore it was necessary to undeceive the people by procuring the Duke of York, and causing him to be educated according to his quality. That the more visible the Queen's malice was, the more it should be endeavoured to prevent its effects. That it was manifest, she was striving to form in the Kingdom a party capable of setting her at the head of affairs, as she was in the late Reign. That it was with difficulty and by great chance, that they were freed from the imperious rule of that Princess and her Family; but if the King should happen to die, the Realm would be again plunged into the same calamities, since she had the lawful Heir in her power. On the other hand, it was necessary to consider what Foreigners would say when they heard, that whilst one of Edward's fourth's Sons was crowned, the other was forced to keep in sanctuary. That it would be dishonorable to the Government, to suffer themselves to be thus braved by a Woman, who had attempted to cause the King's Council to be considered as enemies of the Royal Family. That besides, the King being young and wanting some diversion, he could not have a more agreeable companion than his own Brother, and there was no reason to keep them asunder. In fine, it would be indecent to proceed to the Coronation, in the absence of the Duke of York, the second person in the State, who having an evident right to be present, could not be debarred of it without injustice. Upon all these accounts, he concluded that Deputies should be sent to the Queen, to desire her to deliver the Duke of York to the King his Brother. He added, that, in his opinion, the Cardinal Archbishop of Canterbury (5), was the properest person for this deputation. That if, notwithstanding all the Archbishop's arguments, he should obstinately keep the young Prince with her, and persist in her groundless suspicions, he saw no reason why the Council should not take him away by force. This was his opinion, and he desired every member of the Council to speak his own with freedom."

The Cardinal readily took upon him to go and acquaint the Queen with the Council's pleasure, but by no means approved the motion of violating the privilege of sanctuary. He said, the Church of Westminster was consecrated, five hundred years since, by St. Peter himself, who descended from Heaven (6), attended by multitudes of Angels. That no King of England had ever dared to violate that Sanctuary, and that such an attempt would certainly draw down the just vengeance of God upon the whole Kingdom.

The Duke of Buckingham replied with great warmth this part of the Cardinal's Speech. He shewed that sanctuaries were intended only to protect such as had reason to fear oppression and violence, and not to countenance frivolous and malicious suspicions, detrimental to the King and Kingdom. After many sharp reflections against the Queen, he enlarged upon the abuses of Sanctuaries, particularly as they afforded those who fled thither means to escape. He added, tho' the Duke of York was neither guilty nor oppressed, there was room to fear the Queen his Mother would carry him out of the Kingdom, which might one day give the Queen opportunity to invade England, by the help of some foreign Prince, upon frivolous pretences, which would never be wanting. In fine, after alledging

The Cardinal being come to the Queen (1), used all possible arguments to induce her to comply, and to persuade her that neither the King, nor herself, nor the Duke of York were in danger. He spoke with the greater assurance, as he was satisfied of the truth of what he said, never suspecting the Duke of Gloucester of having ill designs. For, as to the violence used to the Queen's relations, he considered it as no great hurt. Besides that he was ignorant whether they were innocent, he did not think it any great injustice to detain them some time in Prison, in order to prevent their disturbing the Kingdom by their immoderate ambition. But all his eloquence was not capable to persuade the Queen, who plainly saw in the Duke of Gloucester's conduct too much reason to strengthen her fears. At last, the Cardinal perceiving his arguments were fruitless, told her, that the Council, apprehensive of her carrying the Prince her Son out of the Kingdom, had resolved to take him by force out of his Sanctuary, if he obstinately insisted upon keeping him there. The Queen hearing these menaces, dwelt upon the privileges of Sanctuaries, which was entirely needless, since she spoke to a Prelate who was thoroughly convinced of the same. At length, seeing herself pressed to obey the Council's order, she freely declared to the Cardinal the real cause of her fears. She told him, she could not help suspecting the Duke of Gloucester of having designs destructive to the Royal Family, which he could not accomplish without having both the Brothers in his power; and that the only means to preserve the King, was to keep the Duke of York out of their Uncle's reach. The Cardinal growing warm at this discourse, replied, since she obstinately terrified herself with vain and groundless suspicions, he would say no more upon that head. That being only the Council's deputy, and the business not concerning him in particular, he would press her no farther, lest he should give her occasion to think him in the plot she apprehended. That however, he saw with grief her ill opinion of the members of the Council. That she must believe them to be either void of understanding, not to perceive what she fancied she saw so plainly, or else so wicked as to lend their assistance to the Duke of Gloucester. That for his part, he believed he might confidently affirm, the Duke had never entertained such a thought; and that the Council would be very sorry to see themselves taxed with treachery or extreme imprudence. The good Cardinal, to remove the Queen's fears, said nothing but what he really thought, because he was not in the Protector's confidence. Accordingly the Queen felt herself very much shaken by the assurances of a person of his character. It was apparent, that if the Council intended to deceive her, they would not have made him their instrument; and yet she could not lay aside her fears. Mean while, she saw the Cardinal ready to return, and herself going to be exposed to the violence of her enemies, and obliged to do by force, what was civilly desired. So, suddenly resolving to give up the young Prince, she caught him in her arms, tenderly took her leave of him, and with a shower of tears delivered him to the Cardinal, who brought him to the Protector. As soon as he saw his young Nephew, he ran to him with open arms (2), to embrace him and give him marks of a feigned affection, telling him, he carried him to the King, instead of a Father. Then, he carried him to the King, who, without knowing how he came there, was overjoyed at his company. A few days after, the Protector found some excuse to convey them both to the Tower (3), whereas before they lodged in the heart of the City at the Bishop's Palace (4).

It is generally believed, that hitherto the Duke of Gloucester had not communicated his most secret thoughts to the Duke of Buckingham, nor imparted them to him till after he had the two Princes in his power. Buckingham mortally hated the Queen and her Family, because it was through their means that the late King refused to give him possession of certain Lands in Hertfordshire, to which he laid claim (5). His Hatred had even passed to the King's Person, though he had not dared to show it. He had joined with the Duke of Gloucester, to deprive the Queen and her relations of the Government of the Realm, during the King's Minority; but it is not believed, his thoughts had gone any further. For as he wanted only to preserve or increase his credit, a Minority seems to have been more for his purpose than the Government of a young King, such as the Duke of Gloucester. However, as he was a Man of ill principles, it was not difficult for the Protector to engage him in his plot, by the hopes of a reward. It is said, he promised not only to procure him the Lands he desired, but also to give him part of the late King's Wardrobe, to furnish his house in a stately manner, and secure to his Heirs the Office of High Chamberlain, of which he was in possession (6). Be this as it will, the Duke of Buckingham so engaged in the project, to set the Protector on the Throne, that from thenceforward he appeared no less eager than the Protector himself to accomplish it. The thing being resolved, the question was only how to put it in execution.

From that time the conferences between the Duke of Gloucester and his trusty friends became more frequent than before. They debated the principal difficulties that might occur in the execution of the design, and the means to surmount or prevent them. In short, they came to the following resolutions, which were considered as the plan whereon they were gradually to proceed. First, As the strongest Opposition was probably to be expected from the Queen, it was resolved to dispatch the Prisoners at Perth, in order to deprive the Royal Family of their chief support. The Lord Hastings, to whom this design was imparted, readily gave his consent, though he knew not the Protector's real motive to put these Lords to death. 2. It was agreed to endeavour to engage in the plot the properest persons to accomplish it, that is in other words, Villains capable of any undertaking, without regard to honour, justice, or conscience. 3. It was judged necessary to find some foundation to support the Duke of Gloucester's pretensions, that the people might be amused with some appearance of reason. 4. As it was no less requisite to keep the Plot secret till matters were ripe for execution, it was resolved still to show publicly a settled design to cause the King to be crowned, till it was no longer necessary to dissemble. 5. Lastly, It was agreed, that the Lord Hastings should either be gained or dispatched out of the way. One of the two seemed absolutely necessary, considering his great Interest with the People of London.

This Plan being laid, the Protector writ to Sir Richard Ratcliff Governor of Pontefract and his Creature, to behead the Prisoners at head, on a day appointed, the four Lords that were under Pontefract.

After that, he applied himself particularly to gain Sir Edmund Shaw then Mayor of London, and succeeded to his wish. The Mayor engaged in the plot his Brother John Shaw a famous Preacher, and one Pinker Monk and Provincial of the Augustine Fryers, who were much esteemed by the people. To these the Protector joined one Catesby, a particular friend and confidant of the Lord Hastings.

By means of these men the Protector's secret Council resolved to spread among the people the reasons which might strengthen his pretensions. This seemed very difficult, since there were three Princes and six Princesses before him, namely, the King, the Duke of York his Brother, Edward the Fourth's five Daughters, the Earl of Warwick Son to the late Duke of Clarence, and Margaret his Sister. One single expedient seemed proper and sufficient to destroy the rights of these Princes and Princesses; which was, to intimate that Edward IV's Children were all Bastards, and Edward himself and the Duke of Clarence his Brother not Sons of the late Duke of York. To exclude Edward's Children, it was resolved to urge the validity of his pretended Marriage-contract with Elizabeth Lucy before he espoused Elizabeth Woodville, from whence it followed, that the Children by the last Marriage were illegitimate. This pretension was to be proved by the Duchess of York's testimony, who had used that Argument to hinder the King her Son from marrying Sir Richard Woodville's Daughter. Philip de Commines says, the Bishop of Bath and Wells then affirmed that he married Edward IV to a Lady called Eleanor Talbot, before he espoused the Queen; that it was done without witness, and the King had strictly charged him never to mention it to any person whatever. But we do not find in the English Historians, that the Duke of Gloucester, at the time we are speaking of, made use of this reason, which however would have been more plausible than that taken from Edward's marriage with Elizabeth Lucy. For, Edward had taken precautions with regard to this last, as observed in the History of his Reign, whereas the first had been unanswerable, being supported by the evidence of the very Bishop that pretended to officiate. It is therefore unlikely, the Duke of Gloucester should neglect so great an advantage. But it may very well be that Philip de Commines was wrong informed, or at least mistaken in the name of the King's Mistress.

The Protector's Emphasis spread Reports of Edward IV. Moor.

Mean while, as it was not easy to prove Edward's pretended Marriage with Elizabeth Lucy; and as, on the contrary the Bishops had declared, there was no mutual contract, the Protector's Council judged that the other point should be chiefly insisted upon, namely, that Edward IV and the Duke of Clarence were not Sons of the late Duke of York. Thereby, were excluded at once the posterity of these two Princes, and then the Duke of Gloucester was next Heir. To support this assertion, it was resolved to plead the Duke of Clarence's own testimony, who, as was pretended, maintained that Edward IV was illegitimate. Moreover some of the late Duke of York's Servants were already suborned, who took care to spread divers reports which confirmed what was intended to be intimated to the people. They gave out that the Duchess of York had taken to her bed certain persons perfectly resembling Edward IV and the Duke of Clarence, and that the Duke of Gloucester alone was Son to the Duke of York.

Pretence to exclude the Duke of Clarence's Heir. Moor.

As for the Earl of Warwick and his Sister, another way was used to exclude them, namely, the attainder of the Duke of Clarence their Father, which, as they pretended, rendered them incapable of inheriting at all. Thus, the Duke of Gloucester did not scruple to accuse his own Mother of adultery. But this was one of the least crimes which cleared his way to the Throne, so blinded was he by his ambition.

Two Councils erected. Moor.

Every thing being thus prepared, the Protector feigned to hasten the King's Coronation. For that purpose he appointed a particular Council, which was to meet every day (1), and regulate the preparations. He took care to compose this Council of such Lords as were most attached to Edward IV's family, among whom the two Archbishops, the Bishop of Ely (2), the Lord Hastings, and the Lord Stanley were the principal. At the same time, he had another Council consisting of his Creatures, which also met regularly (3), but whose consultations were only how to defer the Coronation, and place the Protector on the Throne.

Moor.

The Lords appointed to hasten the preparations for the Coronation, quickly perceived, all their orders were retarded by obstacles from another quarter. On the other hand, they were something surprized, that the Protector seldom suffered the King to be seen; that the young Prince had but very few Attendants, whilst the Protector's house was full of unnecessary people, and a crowd of Courtiers, who were always well received and caressed. These things joined to the affected delays of the Coronation, began to breed suspicion in those who were really friends to the King's Person. The Lord Stanley, a Man of deep penetration, was the first to discover his fears of the protector's ill designs. He freely spoke his mind to his Fellow-Councillors, and declared, he did not like the Duke of Gloucester's proceedings: That the other Council which so frequently met, and whose resolves could not be known, was to him very suspicious. That therefore it was his opinion, they should think betimes of means to prevent the mischiefs which might happen. This advice was prudent; but the Lord Hastings, still prepossessed that the Protector thought only of humbling the Queen's Party, removed all these suspicions. He affirmed there was no danger from the other Council, and he would pawn his Life, that if any thing were transacted there detrimental to the King and the State, he should be instantly informed of it by one of the members who was entirely devoted to him. He meant Catesby his friend and confidant (4). But he did not know that Catesby betrayed him, and was therefore trusted by the Duke of Gloucester. So, Stanley and the other Lords of the same party preferring the Lord Hastings's assurances to their own judgment, took no meaasures to stop the Protector's progress, which they might easily have done, had they endeavoured it in time.

Mean while, the Duke of Gloucester, knowing what a firm friend the Lord Hastings was to the King, thought it time to execute the project he had formed concerning him, that is, to engage him in the plot, or destroy him. To that end, he ordered Catesby to sound him, but with all the caution imaginable, for fear of discovering the design before he was sure to be gained. Catesby having put the Lord Hastings upon discoursing of State affairs, told him, People talked very much of the Duke of Gloucester's title to the Crown preferably to Edward IV's Children, and many were persuaded this title was not groundless. That it was openly said, it were to be wished, the reasons alleged in his favour were good, since it would be more advantageous to the Nation to be governed by a Man, than by a Child. That for his part, he had not yet examined the matter, and should be glad first to know his opinion. Hastings not suspecting his friend, disclosed all his thoughts, and imparted to him the Lord Stanley's suspicions of the Duke of Gloucester. He added, for his part, he had rather see the ruin and destruction of the Protector, and the Duke of Buckingham, than the late King's Children deprived of their Right. That if he perceived any plot in favour of the Duke of Gloucester, he would employ his Credit, his Estate, and his very Life, to prevent its succeeding. This reply was immediately carried to the Protector, by the treacherous Catesby, with many aggravations, to hasten the Lord Hastings's destruction, for fear he should one day discover his treachery.

The Duke having thus founded the Lord Hastings, was greatly embarrassed. He passionately desired to gain that Lord, knowing how serviceable he could be to him. But for that very reason he could not help fearing him, if he persisted in his attachment to the King. To free himself from this uneasiness, he ordered Catesby to sound him once more. Catesby speaking a little too plainly in his second Conversation with Hastings, and not doubting that his treachery was known, told the Protector, that not only he had nothing to hope from that quarter, but moreover was to expect to find in Hastings a professed enemy. Whereupon the Protector resolved to dispatch him, looking upon him now as his real adversary.

This resolution being taken, he called a Council at the Tower (5), under colour of finishing the affairs of the King's Coronation. He came himself at nine a clock in the Morning, with a cheerful Countenance, courteously saluting all the Lords, as if he had nothing in his mind that gave him the least uneasiness. After that, he went out, and deferred the Lords of the Council, to continue their deliberations in his absence.

About an hour after, he returned with an angry Countenance, knitting his Brows, biting his Lips, and showing all possible signs of the perturbation of his mind. Remaining some time without speaking, he broke silence with these words: My Lords, what punishment do they deserve who have plotted against my Life? The Lords not immediately answering, the Lord Hastings replied, Whoever was guilty of such a Crime ought to be punished as a Traitor. It is, answered the Duke, that Sorcerers my Sister-in-law with her Accomplices. These words astonished many of the Council who favoured the Queen, being afraid this Accusation concerned them. But the Lord Hastings was far from any such fear. All knew he was sworn Enemy to the Queen, and consequently there was no likelihood of his joining with her in such a design. Besides, he had lately approved of the order sent to Pontefract, to behead the Lords Prisoners, who were to be executed that very day. After a short pause, the Protector, unbuttoning his left sleeve, showed the Council his arm, dried and withered, saying with extreme emotion, See what that Sorceress, and Shore's Wife have done by their Witchcrafts. They have reduced my arm as you see, and my whole body would soon have been the same, if by God's Mercy their infamous plot had not been discovered. These words caused a greater surprize than the former, the whole Council knowing the Duke's arm had long been in that condition. Besides, if the Queen had framed such a project, Jane Shore would have been the last person, she would have imparted it to, since of all Women the most hated her. The Lord Hastings, who since Edward's death had kept Jane Shore, perceiving, she was involved in the Accusation, could not forbear to show how much he doubted her being guilty, by saying, If they had committed such a Crime, they deserved to be punished. Then the Protector raising his voice, What, says he, dost thou

From thence he took occasion to remark, that it was to be feared, the Reign of Edward V. would be fatal to England, since he was born of an illegitimate marriage. Moreover, that neither Edward IV. nor the late Duke of Clarence were Sons of the great Duke of York, as was certainly known from officers of his household, witnesses of the Duchess their Mother's scandalous life. That she had taken to her bed, in the sight of all her servants, Men whom the two Brothers perfectly resembled. But that the Duke of Glocester alone could truly be called the Duke of York's Son. That besides, Edward IV. was not lawfully married to his Queen, since he had before plighted his faith to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, as could be shown by good evidences. That consequently his Children could be no better than Bastards. That therefore the Duke of York's real posterity was not to be looked for in the Children either of Edward, or of the Duke of Clarence, and that their race would infallibly perish, because Bastard Plants still take no deep Root. But my Lord Protector, continued he, raising his voice, that noble Prince, the pattern of all virtue, carries in his countenance, in his air, in his carriage, in his soul, the perfect image of his illustrious Father. At these words, it was designed the Duke of Glocester should appear, in hopes that the people, moved by the preacher's eloquence, would salute him King. But the Duke happening to stay a little too long, the Doctor had begun another subject, when he saw him entering, which however he left, and repeated the same words before-mentioned, whilst the Duke was pressing through the crowd to come to his place. But instead of hearing the cry of Long live King Richard! as he expected, he perceived, all kept a full silence, the people detesting the baseness of the preacher, instead of applauding his eloquence. The sermon being ended, the Doctor went and hid himself for shame, neither durst he ever show his face again in the World. It is said, he died presently after with grief at his ill success, and for losing the esteem of his audience.

Line of his Sermon.

The Duke of Buckingham being enraged by the People at this in favour of the Duke of Gloucester.

Shaw's Sermon not producing the expected effect, other means were to be used; for the Protector had proceeded too far to recede. So, the Duke of Buckingham, being a fine Speaker, took upon him to harangue the people, imagining, a polite Speech would be more successful than Shaw's methodical Sermon. To that purpose, the Lord Mayor had orders to assemble the Aldermen, Common-Council, and principal Citizens, in the Guild-Hall (1). Which being done, the Duke of Buckingham came to the Assembly (2), and taking his place near the Mayor, told the people, he was come from the Council, to acquaint them with a matter of the greatest Importance to the whole Kingdom, but especially to the Inhabitants of London. His Speech ran at first upon the Calamities endured by the people of England in the last Reign. He aggravated in a very violent manner, the Cruelty, Avarice, and Intemperance of Edward IV. and endeavoured to the utmost of his power, to render him odious. Then, he put his Audience in mind, the Sunday before, that excellent Man, Dr. Shaw had clearly proved to them, that Edward was not lawfully married to his Queen, and consequently their Children were bastards: That neither Edward himself, nor the Duke of Clarence his Brother, were the Duke of York's Sons, and to the proofs alleged by the Doctor, he himself could add many more, did not his respect for the Protector, hinder him from dwelling upon the Duchess his Mother's loose Life: That for these reasons, the Lords of the Council, and the Commons of the Realm, particularly of the northern Counties, had declared, that a Bastard should not sit on the Throne of England, and petitioned that the Crown should be adjudged to the Duke of Glocester, only Son of the late Duke of York: That indeed there was reason to fear, the magnanimous Duke would refuse the offer; but on the other hand, it was to be hoped, all the people, and especially the Inhabitants of London, uniting with one accord, he would be prevailed with to take upon him the burden of the Government, too weighty for a Child: That upon all these Considerations, he required them in his own, and the name of the Lords of the Council, to declare their Intention. Here he stopped, in expectation to hear the people cry, Long live King Richard! but every one stood speechless, so great was their surprise, to hear so unjust a proposal. The Duke, surprized in his turn at so unexpected a silence, asked the Mayor the reason, who replied, perhaps, they did not well understand him. If that's the case, answered the Duke, I will make my self better understood. Then raising his voice, he repeated the sense of what he had said in other words, with a gracefulness and eloquence worthy a nobler subject. But the people still kept a profound silence. The Duke, in confusion that his Rhetoric should produce so little effect, talked some time in a low voice with the Mayor, to consult with him what was to be done. At length, the Mayor told him, perhaps the people were silent because they were used to be harangued only by the Recorder, who was the Mouth of the City. Whereupon he commanded the Recorder (3) to speak to the People, which he did with great reluctance. However, he so managed his Speech, that without any addition of his own, he repeated to the people the substance of what the Duke had said. He concluded, with requiring the people (4) to give a positive answer, whether they would have the Duke of Glocester for King or not? At these words there was a confused murmur in the Assembly, and as it was yet uncertain whether the People answered Ay or No, some of the Duke of Buckingham's Servants, who had slipped in amongst the crowd, fell to crying, Long live King Richard! Some of the Citizens who had been bribed, but would not venture to begin, seconded the Cry, and the Apprentices, with the Rabble, who stood near the door, followed their example, and throwing up their Hats in token of Joy, cried out King Richard! King Richard! The Duke of Buckingham plainly perceived, the Cry came from the Rabble without, and not from the principal Citizens in the Hall. Nevertheless, improving this advantage, he commanded silence, and returning his Speech, said, he was overjoyed to see so general and unanimous an approbation to his proposal. Wherefore, continued he, my good Friends, I desire you to meet me here to-morrow about this time, that we may all go together, and present our humble petition to his Highness, and intreat him to condescend to our request. Then, the Mayor dismissing the people, the Citizens returned to their Houses with tears in their Eyes, and grief in their Hearts, without daring to show it, for fear of offending those whose Interest it was to have it concealed.

He orders the Recorder to speak to the People.

Some of the Mob cry, a Richard! Moore.

The Duke perceives it was a general Approbation.

Next day the Duke of Buckingham, with the Mayor, Aldermen, and many other Persons of the Cabal came to the Protector's Palace (5) and sent a Message to him, that the Magistrates of London desired an audience. The Protector scrupled to appear, pretending to fear, that such numbers were assembled for no good design. Whereupon Moore the Duke of Buckingham observed to the Mayor and those about him, that his Highness was not conscious of their intent, intimating thereby that he was not concerned in the transactions of the foregoing day. At length, upon the repeated desire, that his Highness would be pleased to grant an audience, he came forth with signs of great mistrust, and as not daring to approach such multitudes, for fear of some mischief (6). Then the Duke of Buckingham, without giving the Mayor time to speak, briefly set forth the grievances of the Nation in the late Reign. After that, he said to the Protector, the People had found no better way to free themselves from their evils, than to pray his Highness to assume the Royal Authority, which of right belonged to him. He added, the Mayor and Aldermen of London whom he saw there, were come to petition him in the Name of all the people, who were united in the same intention.

He waits upon the Protector with the Mayor, and offers him the Crown.

The Duke of Glocester seeming surprized at this proposal, answered, "he was convinced that all he had heard was true. But he had so great a veneration for the memory of the late King his Brother, and so tender an affection for his Children, as out-weighed all the Crowns in the world, and therefore he could not comply with their request. However he willingly pardoned their petition, and thanked them for their affection: But advised them to be obedient to the Sovereign under whose dominion they lived: That for his part, he would continue to the utmost of his power, to give the King his Nephew such Counsels, as he should judge most conducive to render his Kingdom flourishing, and his People happy, as he believed he had hitherto done to the satisfaction of all the world."

The Protector refuses it at first.

The Duke of Buckingham seeming dissatisfied with this answer, murmured some words to himself expressing his discontent, and at length desired leave to speak once more, and having obtained it, he plainly told the Protector, "that all the people were unanimously resolved not to acknowledge for King any of Edward IV's Children: That they had proceeded too far to go back, and therefore if he would not receive the Crown, the People would be forced to offer it to one who would not refuse it." At these words the Protector began to be a little more compliant, and at last, spoke to the people in this manner: Since I see the whole Kingdom is resolved not to suffer EDWARD'S Children to reign, for which I am extremely concerned, I am fully convinced, the Crown can of Right belong only to me, who am the undoubted Son of the late Duke of YORK my Father. To this Title I now joined the free Election of the Lords and Commons of the Realm, which of all Titles I shall consider as the chief and most effectual. From these considerations I graciously receive your Petition, and instantly take upon me the Government of the two Kingdoms of England and France, the former to be governed and defended, and the latter by God's help, and my people's assistance, to be subdued. At the close of this Speech was heard a great shout of, Long live King Richard III! The Comedy being over, the people retired to their homes, making upon this occasion such reflections as were suggested by their respective Understandings, Interests, or Passions.

THE Duke of Gloucester having attained to his ends by such extraordinary ways, and in spite of all the obstacles that opposed his ambition, was proclaimed the 22d of June (1), by the name of Richard III. He might have been crowned the next day, since the preparations for Edward the fifth's coronation were finished: But he delayed the ceremony till the sixth of July, expecting the arrival of five thousand Men, which he sent for out of the North, because he did not entirely confide in the Citizens of London.

During this interval, he gave the Great Seal to the Bishop of Lincoln (2), one of his favorites. On the 28th of June he conferred the office of Earl Marshal upon the Lord John Howard (3), and the next day, the title of Duke of Norfolk. The day following, he commissioned him to exercise the office of High-Steward during the Coronation. A few days after, he created Thomas Howard his Son, Earl of Surrey, William Berkeley Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Lovel one of his Confidants, Viscount of the same name (4).

Thomas Rotherham Archbishop of York, and the Lord Thomas Stanley, who were imprisoned the day the Lord Hastings was executed, were released at the same time, and the new King made the Lord Stanley, Lord Steward of the Household. It was not from a motive of affection or confidence, but out of fear that the Lord Strange his Son (5), who was beginning to levy forces in Lincolnshire (6), should raise commotions, the consequences whereof he much dreaded.

As for Dr. Morton Bishop of Ely, who was arrested the same day, the King designed not to do him the same favour. But the University of Oxford, of which that Prelate was member, having presented a Petition in his behalf, he did not think proper wholly to reject it, at a time when he wanted to gain the affection of his new Subjects. However, as he mortally hated that Bishop, he could not resolve to release him entirely. He only took him out of his confinement in the Tower, and committed him to the Duke of Buckingham's Custody, who sent him to the Castle of Brecknock in Wales. He was a Man of mean Parentage (7), but having studied at Oxford, where he had taken his Doctor's Degree, was so eminent for his learning and parts, that he was taken from thence, and made Privy-Counsellor by Henry VI. The Revolution which had placed Edward IV on the Throne, made no alteration in his Fortune. Edward, it is likely, pleased with his complaisance, continued him in the same Post, and promoted him to the Bishoprick of Ely. From thenceforward he was wholly attached to that Prince, which drew on him Richard's hatred, who put him under confinement the same day the Lord Hastings was beheaded, for fear his affection to the late King's Family, should lead him to oppose his designs.

The King
crowned.

The sixth of July, the Coronation of the King and Queen was performed with great Solemnity (8). All the Peers of the Realm were present for fear of being suspected by the new Kings, whose jealous temper was well known. Margaret Countess of Richmond, Wife of the Lord Stanley, and Mother of the Earl of Richmond, detained in Bretagne, held up the Queen's Train.

Richard enjoyed but two years and two months the Crown he had so eagerly desired. He spent his whole Reign in devising means to support himself in the Throne, which having mounted by Bloodshed and other crimes, he endeavoured to keep possession by the same Methods, but all his measures proved ineffectual, divine Providence being pleased to blast projects, founded wholly upon Injustice, Violence, and the subversion of the Laws. The present circumstances seemed however to be very favorable for him. The Lancastrian Family was quite extinct in England. Henry Earl of Richmond, the only branch of that House, was in the hands of the Duke of Bretagne, who had promised Edward IV to hinder him from going out of his dominions. Margaret his Mother shewed no inclination to prosecute her Rights. Besides, she was subject to a Husband whom Richard had attached to his interest, by one of the most considerable Posts at Court. As to the Princes and Princesses of Portugal and Castile, descended from Philippa and Catharine of Lancaster, Daughters of John of Gant, they were too remote to disturb the new King. In fine, there was not a Lord in the Kingdom that seemed to have credit enough to excite insurrections, the Civil War having swept away great numbers, and entirely destroyed many ancient families. As for those that were still left, Richard hoped to win them by favours, as he had already gained the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Stanley, and some others. As for the Yorkists attached to the family of Edward IV, namely, the Woodvilles, Greys, and others of the new Nobility, he had already dispatched some, in the last reign, and the rest were fled. The Queen-Widow was still with her five Daughters in Sanctuary, from whence she durst not stir, and where she seemed unable to hurt him. The Marquis of Dorset her Son had likewise taken Sanctuary, and Sir Richard Woodville had absconded. In a word, Edward V and the Duke of York his Brother were in the Tower, where, since the 27th of June, Richard had taken care to place as Governor Sir Robert Brackenbury his Creature. Thus, nothing seemed capable to shake the new Monarch's Throne.

Mean while, to be provided against whatever might Richard's happen, he formed the project to secure Castile and Portugal, the Archduke Maximilian, who governed the Low Countries in the name of Philip his Son, France and Bretagne, from whence he feared his enemies might procure some assistance. In fine, to break all the measures which the friends of Edward the IVth's family might take against him, he resolved to murder his nephews young King Edward V, and the Duke of York his Brother. These were Richard's first projects to preserve his Crown, which created him no less uneasiness after possession, than whilst he was labouring to obtain it.

To execute all these resolutions, the 12th of July, he appointed for his Ambassador to Castile, Bernard de la Force, with orders to renew the ancient Alliance with Queen Isabella and Ferdinand King of Arragon her Husband. The next day he gave the like commission to Thomas Hutton, to treat of the prolongation of the Truce with Francis II, Duke of Bretagne. Probably, Hutton had secret instructions to endeavour to procure the Earl of His Claim.

Richmond, or at least to renew the Treaty upon that subject between Edward IV., and the Duke. Three days after, he appointed commissioners to treat with France concerning some breaches of the Truce, in order to have occasion to confirm it.

These measures being taken, nothing remained but to execute the principal article, the murder of his two Nephews. For that purpose, he resolved to remove from London, that their death happening in his absence, he might be the less suspected. With this view, he departed from London to visit several Counties, under colour of reforming certain abuses introduced to the great detriment of the people. His progress into the North was particularly necessary, to curb the insolence of the Troops he had sent for from thence, and who, after their return, had committed great outrages. But before he proceeded to York, he made some stay at Gloucester, not to be too far from London, whilst his orders concerning his Nephews were executing.

The Duke of Buckingham, his intimate friend and confident, attended him to Gloucester. He had loaded that Lord with estates and honours, both whilst he was Protector, and after he was King. But the Duke still expected another favour, of which he had received a positive promise. And that was, the moiety of the Lands of the House of Hertford, to which he thought he had a very just right. The foundation of his claim will plainly appear in the following Genealogy.

To consider only this Genealogy, it is evident, the Duke of Buckingham had a right to claim one half of the Earl of Hertford's Lands, as descended from one of his Daughters. But there were other reasons which rendered his title disputable. When Richard II put to death his Uncle the Duke of Gloucester at Calais, he caused his Estate to be confiscated by the Parliament, and gave what that Prince held in Right of Ann his Wife, to the Earl of Derby, who had married the eldest of the Sisters, and withal created him Duke of Hertford. Thence, the Earl of Derby took possession of the whole Inheritance of the Earl of Hertford's Father-in-law, and afterwards mounting the Throne by the name of Henry IV., all his Lands were annexed to the Crown, which was thereby possessed of the whole Estate of the Hertford Family, till Richard II, the third's accession to the Throne. However, when Richard II, being Protector, intended to engage the Duke of Buckingham to serve him in his design to usurp the Crown, he promised to restore him the moiety of the Inheritance confiscated upon the Duke of Gloucester's great Grandfather. But after he was King he altered his mind, whether he thought he had amply rewarded him otherwise, or was afraid of rendering him too powerful, and so giving him occasion to aspire to the Throne, as descending from Edward III. Be this as it will, the Duke during this Journey putting him in mind of his promise, received such an answer, as left him no room to expect that Justice or Favour (1). The Duke, who was very high-spirited, was so offended at the King's answer, that he desired leave to go and look after his own private affairs (2). Richard II not imagining, this refusal had made so deep an Impression upon the Duke, or perhaps, not fearing the effects of his resentment, gave him the leave he desired, and parting from him at Gloucester, he pursued his Journey to York.

During the King's stay at Gloucester, he sent an express order to Brackenbury, Governor of the Tower of London, to murder Edward V., and the Duke of York's Brother. Brackenbury more conscientious than his master, returned a very submissive answer, but withal, told him, he should never be able to execute his Commands. Richard vexed to be deceived in his opinion of that Officer, sent him by James Tyrrel a written order, to deliver to the bearer the Keys and Government of the Tower for one single night. Brackenbury obeyed, and Tyrrel brought in his Agents (3) to execute the King's orders. That very night, whilst all were asleep, he went into the two Princes's room, and smothering them in their bed, caused them to be buried under a little Stair-case. This is what Tyrrel himself afterwards confessed, who was executed in the reign of Henry VII. In 1674, whilst some Alterations were making in that part of the Tower, Bones were found, which were thought to be those of Edward V., and the Duke of York, and upon that supposition, Charles II, who then reigned, ordered them to be put into a marble Urn, and removed to Westminster, among the Tombs of the Kings (4). As the two Princes were never more heard of since the day Tyrrel went into the Tower, and as their Servants were dimitted, the publick doubted not that they were sacrificed to their Uncle's safety.

Richard having received the news of the death of his two Nephews, continued his Journey into the North, and came to York about the end of August. As the pretence of his Journey was to cause Justice to be impartially administered to the people, he could not help executing some of the northern Soldiers, who in returning from London had committed great outrages. Then, he caused himself to be crowned a second time at the Cathedral of York, the beginning of September, and the same day he created Edward his Son, ten years old, Prince of Wales, with the usual Formalities.

A few days after his Coronation, he received the agreeable news, that Ferdinand and Isabella had prevented him, by desiring themselves the Confirmation of the Alliance between England and Castile, by an Ambassador sent on purpose, and who was then come to York. The renewing of that Alliance, which he ratified himself the 31st of August, pleased him extremely. He found that Ferdinand and Isabella acknowledging him for lawful King, were forming no project to restore to the Throne the House of Lancaster, from whence Queen Isabella was descended, being Grand-daughter of Catherine of Lancaster, Daughter of John of Gant. He expressed his satisfaction by conferring the honour of Knighthood (5) upon Geoffrey de Saffell Ambassador of Castile, who brought him the good news, and by his Letters full of esteem, affection, and acknowledgment, to the King and Queen of Spain, to the Cardinal de Mendoza, and to the Earl of Leryn their Ministers.

Lewis XI King of France died August the 29th (6) this year. Charles VIII his only Son being a Minor, succeeded him under the Guardianship of his Sister Anne, Wife of Philip de Bourbon, Lord of Beaujeu, pursuant to the late King's Directions. But Lewis Duke of Orleans, first Prince of the Blood, disputed the Regency with her. This contest raised, in the Court of France, disturbances which prevented the Ministers from attending to the renewal or confirmation of the Truce with England, which Richard earnestly solicited.

Whilst the King was flattered himself with having taken all necessary measures to support himself on the Throne, a Conspiracy was forming against him, which ended in his ruin, after proving the destruction of its Author. I left the Duke of Buckingham dissatisfied, and parting from the King in order to retire. He was a person of a lively and penetrating Genius, exceeding proud, ambitious, revengeful, and not very strict in his Morals. During Edward the fourth's Life, he could never bring himself to stoop to the Queen, though she had a great ascendancy over the King her Husband. He was even considered as head of the party of the Antient Nobility against the New, which wholly consisted of the Queen's relations and creatures. It was chiefly from his aversion to the Queen, that after Edward IV's death, he devoted himself entirely to the Duke of Gloucester, for whom, as has been related, he procured the Protectorship, and at last the Crown itself. In return for so signal a service, Rich-

1187. and had liberally bestowed his favours upon him. Particularly he made him as it were master of Wales, and the adjoining Counties, by the Poets and Governments given him in those parts (1). But all these favours were forgotten, when he refused to grant him a Moiety of the Lands of Hereford. The Duke perceived the King's policy, in giving him Poets, from which he could remove him at pleasure, whereas in restoring the Lands he demanded, it would not have been in his power to refuse them without using force. This proceeding convinced him, that the King would always keep him in dependence, and as he perfectly knew that Prince's Character, easily perceived, that the least occasion would be sufficient to make him forfeit whatever he enjoyed. Besides, he thought it a manifest injustice, in refusing him what he believed to be his lawful right; that moreover he broke his promise, and showed himself extremely ungrateful, in making fo ill a return for the services he had received from him. All this gave him reason to fear, he had intended to ruin him in time.

Full of these sinister thoughts he retired to his Castle of Brecknock, where Dr. Morton Bishop of Ely was Prisoner under his custody. In his frequent conversations with that Prelate, he could not help discovering his resentment against the King. The Bishop, who was a Man of sense, quickly found, the Duke was dissatisfied, which imboldened him to talk to him freely. He observed the Duke took a pleasure in hearing him, and would have perhaps spoken himself more plainly, had he dared to trust him entirely. So, to inspire him with more confidence, he affected to speak of the King in a manner, which by showing what he thought of him, gave him to understand, that he should find in him a Person ready to second him in all his designs. At length, after mutually founding each other for some time, they opened their minds to one another, and lamented together the unhappy state of the Kingdom under such a King. The late death of Edward V and of the Duke his Brother, afforded them fresh matter to exclaim against Richard. They concluded, that since he had not spared his own Nephews, no Lord in the Kingdom could be sure of his life. These conversations ended at length in the Duke's request to the Bishop, to tell him freely, whether he saw no way to prevent the mischiefs they had reason to fear; promising with an Oath to keep the secret inviolably. Morton, who till then was under some apprehensions that the Duke designed to infringe him, being encouraged by this Oath, told him in plain terms, "it was his opinion, there was no other way than to dethrone Richard, and set up another King. He owned, that though he could have wished the Crown had continued in the family of Henry VI, he had not been able to avoid following the stream, when he saw almost all England declare for Edward IV. That afterwards, Henry VI and the Prince his Son being dead, he had faithfully adhered to Edward. That upon Edward's death he had served with the same zeal his young Son, whom he believed his lawful Successor. That afterwards he perceived with grief the Duke of Gloucester aspiring to the Throne, and having the honour to be of the Council, thought it his duty to endeavour to oppose his design. But instead of succeeding, he had only drawn upon himself the hatred and displeasure of that Prince, who had thrown him into Prison, solely for adhering to the family of Edward IV. That this unjust violence had increased his aversion for the Usurper, and the tragical death of the two young Princes had carried it to the utmost height. That being in these circumstances, he had considered with himself what Prince would be most proper to be placed on the Throne in the room of the Tyrant, and had found no other than the Duke of Buckingham, descended from a Son of Edward III. That the whole race of Lancaster being extinct, at least in England, there remained of the House of York only the Tyrant and his Son, with the young Earl of Warwick Son of the Duke of Clarence. As for the last, he could not pretend to the Crown, his Father's attainder having debarred his Heirs of the right of inheriting. That the present King had by his crimes rendered himself unworthy, and to preserve the Son's right after destroying the Father, would be acting imperfectly. That therefore, once more, he saw only the Duke of Buckingham capable of lawfully claiming the Crown."

The Duke listened very attentively to this discourse, but deferred his answer till next day. This delay threw the Bishop into great perplexity, since it left him still uncertain whether the Duke was sincere, or designed only to sift him. By the way, the Bishop it seems, was not very scrupulous, since knowing the Duke of Buckingham's Character, as he must have done, he readily offered his service to set him on the Throne. This is a sign that he acted more from a motive of revenge against Richard, than with a view to the good of the publick. The King and the Duke were too much alike to expect a great advantage by such a change.

Next day the conversation being resumed, the Duke, after a long apology for all his former actions, freely confessed to the Prelate, "he had once an intention to aspire to the Throne, but upon mature deliberation had entirely dropped it. He considered, that in acting for himself, he should stir up against him all the friends of the two Houses of York and Lancaster, equally concerned to oppose his pretensions. That there was a Prince nearer than he, whom the House of Lancaster looked upon as their head, and he it was on whom he had cast his eyes to raise to the Throne. Then he named Henry Earl of Richmond, who was in Bretagne." Adding, "that the project to restore the House of Lancaster to the Throne, would draw one half of the Kingdom to that Prince's interest, and he had devised a happy expedient to gain him the other half. And that was his marriage with Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of Edward IV, which would make all the Yorkists his friends. That moreover, the Nation would receive great advantage from thence, in as much as all the seeds of the Civil Wars would be destroyed, by the union of the two contending Houses. That by this means even those who were indifferent for either party, would be forced, as one may say, to promote the common good of their Country; and then Richard's few friends would not be able to balance to great a power. Whereas if he pretended to set up himself, the whole Kingdom would be united against him, since there was not the least colour to exclude from the Throne, two Houses that had been in possession above fourscore years. In fine, he added, that in his way to Brecknock, he met the Countess of Richmond, and having founded her upon this head, believed he could be sure, the would be easily disposed to promote the advancement of her Son."

The Bishop liked this expedient, as more conformable to justice and equity, and more adapted to the good of the Realm, especially as it came from the only person, who would have had reason to oppose it, had it been proposed by another.

Henry Earl of Richmond, as I elsewhere observed, was of Welsh extraction. But his Mother Margaret was Daughter of John de Beaufort Duke of Somerfet, Grandson of John of Gant Duke of Lancaster. Margaret's Father dying without Issue-Male, Edmund his younger Brother inherited his title. But Edmund and all his posterity being destroyed in the Civil Wars, Margaret and her Son were the only remains of that House. So, it seemed, they should have indisputably inherited all the rights of the House of Lancaster. But however the title was liable to great objections.

Whilst John of Gant Duke of Lancaster lived with Constantia of Castile his second Wife, he kept, as his Concubine, Catharine Reet, Widow of Sir Otho de Swinford, and by her had several Children. Constantia his Wife being dead, he married his Concubine, and had interest enough to cause her Children, born before marriage, to be legitimated by an Act of Parliament, and by Richard II's subsequent Letters-Patent. However, the King and the Parliament, willing to make a distinction between these natural Children and the others born in Wedlock, gave them not the name of Lancaster or Plantagenet, but that of Beaufort, the name of the Castle where they were born. Moreover, though in the Act of Parliament, and in the King's Letters Patent, power was granted them to hold Principalities, Dukedoms, Earldoms, &c. and to transmit them to their Heirs, there was no mention of the Crown (2). During the Reigns of Henry IV, and Henry V, the Princes of this branch durst not assume the name of Lancaster. It was not till about the end of Henry VI's reign, that Edmund Duke of Somerfet being Prime Minister, and very zealous for the King, against the attempts of the Duke of York, began by degrees to assert his descent from John of Gant, and his kindred to the King, as being of the House of Lancaster. It was a question therefore to know, whether the Princes of this Branch could succeed

(1) He was Chief-Justice and Chamberlain of all South-Wales and North-Wales; as also Constable of all the Castles, and Steward of all the King's Lordships lying within Shropshire and Herefordshire. See Dugdale's Baron, Vol. I. p. 169 and Styke's Notes in Compl. H.F. Vol. I. p. 530.

(2) There was mention of the Crown, but it was to exclude them absolutely from it; as is plain from the words of the Act. They were by it introduced.... Ad quoscunque honores dignitates (excepta dignitate regali) preeminencias status gradus & officia publica & privata tam perpetua quam temporaria nique feudalia & nobilia quibuscunque nominibus nuncupentur, etiamvis Ducatus Principatus Comitatus &c. non necesse sit tunc fructu hereditariis. The Act bears date 14th. 9. Jan. 20. Richard II, and was afterwards exemplified by King Henry IV, on Feb. 10, in the 8th year of his Regn. See Saunders, p. 322, 323.

to the Crown in their Turn. And supposing they could, the point was to know when their turn was to be, and whether the Heirs of John of Gant's Daughters born in Wedlock, were not to precede the Posterity of a Son only legitimated, and born before Marriage. If so, there was no less than ten or twelve Princes and Princesses in Portugal, Castile and Germany, who would have excluded the Earl of Richmond. On the other hand, it seems that by Edward IV's Endeavours to have the Earl of Richmond in his hands, he had, as it were, owned him capable of inheriting all the Rights of the House of Lancaster. This was a question which might have been debated in those days, but which, having been decided above two hundred Years since, requires no farther Examination, unless out of meer curiosity those that are versed in these matters are willing to exercise their Wits.

Very likely, if the Duke of Buckingham had thought it in his power to mount the Throne, he would not have failed to object against the Earl of Richmond's Title the forementioned Reasons. But, as he had himself observed, in his discourse with the Bishop of Ely, he could not set up himself without opposing the two Houses of York and Lancaster, that is to say, the whole Kingdom, which was divided between the two Factions. So the pretence to restore the House of Lancaster, and put an end to the Civil Wars by the Union of the two contending Houses, was by far the more natural way to be revenged of Richard. I say to be revenged, for it is hard to believe, a Man of his Character should act on this occasion from a nobler Motive.

Be this as it will, the Duke and the Bishop having consulted together how to accomplish their Designs, came to this Conclusion: That all hope of Success was founded on the Marriage of the Earl of Richmond with the Princess Elizabeth; That therefore, before all things, that Point was to be secured, without which it would be to labour in vain, or at least with great uncertainty. To that end they agreed, that they should without loss of time acquaint the Countess of Richmond with their Project, that the might inform her Son of it, and persuade the Queen-Dowager, Mother of the Princess, to consent to the Marriage.

But as conferring with Margaret would have been very dangerous for the Duke of Buckingham, considering the King's extreme jealousy of the House of Somerset, the Bishop told him, he had an old Friend in the Countess's Service, one [Reginald] Bray, who might safely be trusted with the Secret. The Duke approving this Expedient, Bray was privately sent for to Brecknock, and the Project being imparted to him, the proposing of it to his Mistress was left to his care. More especially, he was charged to tell her, that the Marriage of the Earl her Son was the Basis and Foundation on which the whole Project rested.

As soon as Bray was gone to execute his Commission, the Bishop of Ely desired the Duke's leave to retire to his Bishoprick. He was justly afraid of his Life, in case the Plot came to be discovered. It may be he did not wholly depend upon the Duke's Sincerity. But the Duke gave him two invincible Reasons why he could not comply with his Request. The first was, that he should be guilty of letting his Prisoner escape, which alone would be sufficient to inspire the King with suspicions. The second, that in an Undertaking of this Nature, he could not proceed without his Advice. The Bishop seemed to yield to these reasons, but had by him still stronger, to free himself from the impending Danger, in case the Affair was discovered. And therefore as he was not so narrowly watched by his Keepers, since his frequent Conversations with the Duke, he found means to escape, and retire to Ely; (1) from whence he fled into Flanders. Upon his Arrival, he wrote to the Duke to excuse his escape, and withal, endeavoured to convince him, it was much more in his Power to promote the Execution of their intended Design, than whilst he was Prisoner. He conjured him likewise, to continue in his Resolution, and shewed him how he might carry on a private Correspondence with him.

Mean while, the Countess of Richmond being informed of what was projected in favour of the Earl her Son, sent back her Servant to the Duke of Buckingham with her Compliment of Thanks; and withal let him know, she was endeavouring to obtain the Queen Dowager's Consent to the Marriage, and then would take the most proper Measures to send to the Earl of Richmond.

Elizabeth Woodville Widow of Edward IV. was still in her Sanctuary at Wymington with her five Daughters, lamenting the Death of her two Sons, and blaming herself for having been the occasion, by her easiness to deliver the Duke of York to his Uncle. There had never been any particular Friendship between that Queen and the Countess of Richmond. One was Wife to a King of the House of York, and the other was of the Family of Somerset, sworn Enemies of the Yorkists. Wherefore the Countess could not visit the Queen in her Sanctuary, without causing great suspicion. To avoid this Inconvenience, she made use of one Lewis her Physician, (2) and having communicated the whole Affair to him, ordered him to go to London and so manage as to see the Queen, and inform her of what was in Agitation. Above all, she charged him to tell her, that all hope of Success depended upon the Union of the two Houses of York and Lancaster, by the Marriage of the Princess Elizabeth with the Earl of Richmond.

Lewis being come to London, found no great difficulty, as a Physician, to get admittance to the Queen. He communicated to her what he had in charge, intimating it would be in her own power to be reveng'd of her mortal Enemy, the Murderer of her Children, and dethrone the Usurper, provided she would consent to the Marriage proposed. The Queen gladly listened to the Overture. She charged the Doctor to tell his Mistress, she approved of the project, and would so order it, that all the King her Husband's friends should join with the Earl of Richmond. But she added, she wished the Earl would wear to marry Elizabeth, or in case she happened to die, Cecily her younger Sister.

Matters being thus settled between the Queen Dowager, the Countess of Richmond, and the Duke of Buckingham, they endeavoured to engage in the plot, their most trusty friends, who likewise drew in others (3). The English were as favorably disposed as could be wished, by three principal reasons. First, because of the people's universal hatred of the King, who had made himself extremely odious, as well by what he had done during his Protectorship, as by his late Crime, in putting his Nephews to death, after robbing them of the Crown. He had thereby lost most of the friends of the House of York, who only wanted an opportunity to revenge the Family of Edward IV. In the second place, all the Lancastrians saw with pleasure, a project tending to restore the House of Lancaster to the Throne. Lastly, those that without regarding the Interests of the two Factions, had only the good of the Nation in view, could not but consider as a great happiness, the success of an enterprize, which by uniting the two contending Houses, would put an end to the Civil War, wherewith the Kingdom had been afflicted thirty years. Thus the Lancastrians, Yorkists, and even those that stood neuter, were equally disposed to concur to the downfall of the Usurper.

The Duke of Buckingham being the Author and head of the Enterprize, it was his part to conduct it to a happy issue. For that purpose, he first secured some friends in Wales, where his power was great, who undertook to lift Soldiers privately, so enable him to bring, suddenly and seasonably, an army into the field. Then, he settled a Correspondence with some Gentlemen of Dorsetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, who promised to raise Forces, and receive the Earl of Richmond at his arrival. His design was to join them himself, with his Welshmen, that Richard might be less able to oppose the Earl's landing. At the same time, several Lords and Gentlemen were to rise in other Counties, that the King might be at a loss where to march first. The Marquis of Dorset, who had lately quitted his Sanctuary (4), Sir Richard Woodville his Brother (5), the Bishop of Exeter, Sir Edward Courtney his Brother, and several other persons of Quality engaged in the plot.

These measures being taken, the Countess of Richmond sent two Expresses (6) to the Earl her Son, by different ways, to let him know what was resolved in his favour, and how far the project was advanced. The two Expresses arriving almost together, informed him of all the circumstances of the plot, and prayed him to repair into England without loss of time, upon the Assurance they gave him, that every thing was ready for his reception. They told him likewise that Dorsetshire, Devonshire, or Cornwall (7), were the most convenient places to land, by

The Earl of Richmond was then at Vannes in Bretagne, where he had been several years, really a Prisoner, because of the Duke of Bretagne's engagements with Edward IV; but his Confinement was not strict, the Duke contenting himself with narrowly watching him, in order to hinder his escape, in case he attempted it. In other respects he enjoyed an honourable freedom. He heard with great joy, that he was thought of in England. But when he came to consider his present condition, and how little it was in his power to return into his own Country, so as to procure a welcome reception, he found it would be almost impossible to succeed in his enterprize, without the Duke of Bretagne's consent and assistance. For unless that Prince supplied him with Money, Troops, and Ships, it was not practicable to take just measures to accomplish his designs. Besides, the Duke might have made him close Prisoner, by which means the whole affair would have miscarried. So, perceiving he could not proceed without him, he resolved to tell him the secret, and engage him, if possible, to assist him. He found the Duke more ready to countenance him than he expected. The Duke was not engaged with Richard, as he had been with Edward's Brother. Besides, the unjust and violent actions of the new King had rendered him odious to all the Princes of Europe, and especially to the Duke of Bretagne. Another thing likewise induced him to hearken to the Earl's proposals. He had pretensions to the Earldom of Richmond in England, formerly enjoyed by his Ancestors, and imagined, the Earl would readily promise to restore it, if, by his means, he arrived to the Crown. It is pretended, this was the principal Article of their agreement, for which the Duke very willingly engaged to supply him with Men and Ships. When the Earl was sure of the Duke of Bretagne's assistance, he sent Expresses (1) to the Countess his Mother, and the Duke of Buckingham, to acquaint them that he hoped to be ready by the beginning of October, desiring them to prepare all things by that time. This good news presently put all the Conspirators in motion. Every one repaired to the post assigned him, as well to raise Forces, as excite Insurrections. There was no time to lose, good part of September being now past.

How careful never the Conspirators had to conceal themselves, all these things could not be done, and Richard have no Intelligence that some plot was contriving against him. But none could tell him what it was, or who were the Authors. He was then at Tork, thinking of very different things, so secure was he in his own opinion. But these advices obliged him to leave the North, and approach the Center of the Kingdom. At the same time he ordered his Troops, which were dispersed in several parts, to be ready to march at a moment's warning. Mean while, he prepared very slowly, not imagining the danger to near. As the Intelligence he had received, made him uneasy, he ran over in his mind all the Lords of the Realm, who could be dissatisfied, or had sufficient Credit to excite Insurrections against him. He found none but the Duke of Buckingham. He had angered him by disappointing him with regard to the Lands of Hersford, and knowing him perfectly, could not doubt that he was capable of any thing, to be revenged. Besides, he knew him to be alone in condition by his parts, his riches, and his interest, to form and execute great projects. His own experience would not suffer him to question it. The Bishop of Ely's escape served also to strengthen this suspicion. The Duke of Buckingham must have known how odious that Prelate was to him, and therefore his carelessness in guarding such a prisoner, could not but be deemed a collusion and consequence of some ill design. Upon these suspicions, which were but too well-grounded, Richard resolved to send for him to Court, but the Duke desired to be excused, on pretence of some Indisposition. This refusal confirmed the King in his belief, that what he had suspected was but too true. Nevertheless, to be more fully satisfied, he sent him positive orders to come to him, without alleging any excuse. The Duke perceiving dissimulation was to no purpose, sent him word, he would not expose his person to his mortal enemy, whom he neither loved nor would serve.

This was sufficient to convince the King, that he

Duke of Buckingham was the prime mover of the plot, which for some time had made him uneasy. On the other hand, the Duke perceiving, that after such a declaration there was no more Ceremony to be used, drew together the Forces which himself and friends had privately lifted in Wales, and began to march towards the western Counties (2), where he knew the Earl of Richmond intended to land. There he was to be joined by those who were gone before, to prepare all things against the Earl's arrival.

Richard was not a little surprized to hear, that the Duke was so ready. However, as he had taken some precautions to assemble his Forces in case of necessity, he appointed the rendezvous at Leicester, where he repaired himself, with a resolution to give his enemies Battle, before their number was increased. He would have found it very difficult however to prevent them, if an extraordinary and very unexpected accident had not hindered the Duke from joining his friends, who were all ready to rise in arms in the Counties of Devon and Cornwall. The Duke was advancing by long marches (3) to Gloucester, where he designed to pass the Severn. But at the same time the River was so swollen, that the Country on both sides was overflowed, and great damage done by the waters. Never had so terrible an Inundation been heard of in that Country. It held six whole days, during which the Duke's army could neither pass the River, nor subsist on the other side, where was nothing but desolation (4). In fine, the Welsh Soldiers, tired with being expell'd to hunger, rains, and numberless hardships, returned to their homes, notwithstanding all the Duke's Intreaties to the contrary (5). The desertion was so general, that there remained with the Duke only one single Servant. Reduced to this sad condition, he saw no other remedy than to conceal himself till he should take new measures. Unhappily for him, he chose for his retreat, the House of one Banister, who had been his Servant, and to whom his Father and himself had been very kind.

The King hearing of the dispersion of the Duke of Buckingham's Troops, issued out a Proclamation against him and the Marquis of Dorset, with some other of his Adherents, or whom he supposed to be in league with him. But as the Marquis had not yet appeared in arms, and so could not be stiled a Rebel, he made use of another pretence to involve him in the Sentence. He said, that having taken an Oath at his Coronation, to punish vice and wickedness, he was obliged to punish the Marquis of Dorset, notorious for his debaucheries, who had seduced and ravished several Virgins, been guilty of sundry Adulteries, and publicly kept Shore's Wife. Then he promised a reward of a thousand Pounds Sterling, or a hundred pounds a year to any person that should bring the Duke to Justice; a thousand Marks, or one hundred Marks a year for the Marquis, and so in proportion for the rest that were named in the Proclamation (6). The Villain Banister (7), the Duke not being able to resist so strong a temptation, betrayed his master to the Sheriff of Shropshire (8), who causing the House to be surrounded by a Company of armed Men, seized the Duke of Buckingham, disguised like a Peasant, and conducted him to Shrewsbury. The Duke was desirous to speak with the King, but could never obtain that favour. Some say, he intended to kill him with a dagger which was found upon him after his death. But this is only Conjecture. However it be, he was beheaded at Shrewsbury (9), without any legal process, by the King's bare order. Thus, this Lord, who had helped to take away the Lives of the Lord Hastings, the Earl of Rivers, and the other prisoners at Pontefract, by an arbitrary Sentence, perished himself in the same manner, contrary to all right, by the absolute orders of him whom he had placed on the Throne. On the other hand, we shall see presently, that this very Conspiracy, formed by the Duke of Buckingham, accomplice of all the King's ill actions, which he was but Protector, proved the occasion of that Monarch's ruin. Is it possible, not to perceive the direction of Providence in such sort of Events!

Upon the first news of the dispersion of the Welsh Army, the Duke's friends, who expected him in the West, were ready to take arms the moment they should hear of his passing the Severn, dispersed themselves. Some lurked among their friends, others fled to Sanctuary. But the of renewing the Truce of Commerce between England and the Low-Countries. But it is likely, the Ambassadors had instructions to sound whether there was any project at that Court with respect to England.

Though Richard did not seem to have occasion to fear any thing from France, under a Minority disturbed with intestine divisions, he had taken care however to send Ambassadors to Charles VIII to desire the prolongation, or at least, confirmation of the Truce.

There remained only Bretagne and Scotland that could give him any uneasiness. He did not question that the Duke of Bretagne had already assisted, and was still inclined to assist, the Earl of Richmond. For that reason, he thought nothing should be spared to gain that Prince to his interest.

Francis II Duke of Bretagne, being old and infirm, was entirely governed by Peter Landais his Treasurer, and committed to him the sole management of his Affairs. This Favorite, who was the Son of a Taylor, used his power so insolently, that he drew upon himself the hatred of all the Bretons. This very year 1484, the great Men coming together against him, would have seized him at the Duke's Palace, but missing their aim, saw themselves exposed to the Favorite's vengeance, who caused them to be declared guilty of High-Treason. Mean while, as the whole Country was against him, he believed it proper to support himself by some foreign aid. To that end he sent to his master's Name Ambassadors to Richard, on pretence to make a Truce with him, which was accordingly concluded in June at Pontfré, where the King then was, and which was to last till the 24th of April following.

But this was not the only commission these Ambassadors were charged with. There are two Records in the Collection of the Publick Acts, whereby it appears, that Richard had promised to send the Duke of Bretagne an aid of a thousand Archers. Now this could be only for the aforementioned occasion, since the Duke of Bretagne had then no War upon his hands. As the Duke did nothing of himself, very likely, to obtain this aid, Landais had put the King in hopes, he would deliver up the Earl of Richmond. And indeed the sequel plainly shew'd, he had entered into some such engagement. Thus Richard thought himself to secure from Bretagne, that instead of fearing, the Duke would assist the Earl of Richmond, he flattered himself with the hopes of having his enemy very soon in his power.

As he might also be apprehensive that the King of Scotland, descended from a Princess of the House of Somerset, would countenance the Male-contents, as being concerned to place the Earl of Richmond on the Throne of England, he believed he ought to secure himself too from that quarter. To that end, he negotiated with James III a Truce, concluded in September this year, and which was to last from the 29th of that month to the same day of the year 1487. At the same time, he concluded the marriage of the Nicce An de la Pole, Daughter of his Sister Elizabeth and the Duke of Suffolk, with the Duke of Rothesay, the King of Scotland's eldest Son.

All these precautions appeared so just, that he seemed to be secured from all danger. However, to rob the Earl of Richmond of all hopes of accomplishing his designs, the Prince of Wales his Son dying in April this year (1), he declared his Nephew the Earl of Lincoln his presumptive Heir, intending to have this declaration ratified by the Parliament. The Earl of Lincoln was Son of Elizabeth his Sister (2), and Brother of Anne, who was to marry the Prince of Scotland.

Moreover, not to neglect any thing that might give his enemies an advantage, he sent an Ambassador of obedience to Pope Innocent VIII, lately elected to the papal Throne. He had omitted this compliment to Sixtus IV, Innocent's predecessor, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. But his fear of incensing the Pope, and affording him the pretence to the Male-Contents in the Kingdom, and particularly the Clergy, made him dispatch his Ambassadors to Rome.

Shortly after, he had the satisfaction to see that Charles VIII King of France, desired a Safe-Conduct for Ambassadors he intended to send to him. Thus every thing seemed to be happily disposed in his favour. Mean while, the Earl of Richmond was still full of life, and so long as that Prince was out of his power, he could not think himself thoroughly fixed on the Throne. This was the chief, or rather the sole cause of all his trouble and care.

The Truce with Bretagne being to last but till the 24th of April 1485, Richard took occasion from thence to send Ambassadors to the Duke to cause it to be prolonged. That was the pretence of the Embassy. But the Ambassadors had orders to treat of another more important affair, with Landais prime Minister and Chamberlain of the Duke, who was taken into a kind of Lethargy, which rendered him unfit for publick affairs. And that was to persuade this Minister to deliver up the Earl of Richmond.

Landais had not wanted the forementioned Stratagem. It was therefore necessary, in order to obtain what the King desired, to make a new Treaty which might be so advantageous to the Duke and the favorite, as to cause them to overlook all their scruples upon that subject. As for the Duke, Agencourt affirms, he saw among the Records of Bretagne, Richard the third's Letters Patent, whereby he gave to Duke Francis the Earlom of Richmond with all its dependencies, as enjoyed by his Ancestors, with the sole reservation of its return to the Crown in case the Duke died without Issue. With respect to Landais, as the negotiation was more secret, it is not well known what reward he expected for his intended service. Thus much is certain, Richard made him very advantageous offers. But as he was a Man not to be satisfied with bare promises, there was often occasion to send expresse to the King. These delays, which, as Agencourt positively affirms, were upon the Minister's account, proved the Earl of Richmond's security. Though he was Ad. Pub. then in Bretagne, he was entirely ignorant of what passed at the Duke's Court. But the Bishop of Ely, who though absent, had good spies about Richard, being informed, that the Bishop of Leon, Ambassador of Bretagne, was treating very privately with the King, warned the Earl of Richmond that he was not safe in the Duke of Bretagne's Dominions. This advice coming from so good a hand, put the Earl upon seriously thinking of freeing himself from the impending danger. As he knew Landais to be a person capable of committing the vilest actions, he resolved to retire into France, and for that purpose sent privately to King Charles for a Pass-port (3), which was readily granted him. Mean while, informed as he was of Landais's ill designs, he did not question that he had ordered him to be narrowly watched. So, the difficulty of escaping was not small, especially as he was surrounded with a great number of English, in respect of whom it was very hard to conceal the secret, and very dangerous to reveal it. To remedy this inconvenience, the Duke of Bretagne being at that time recovered of his illness, the Earl took occasion to send the principal Lords of his retinue to congratulate him upon it (4), ordering them to take with them all their servants, under colour of doing him the more honour. His aim was not only to be more alone at Vannes, but chiefly to remove from his keepers all suspicion of his desiring to escape, whilst he had so many Hostages at the Duke's Court. Accordingly, this artifice succeeded to his wish, so that, two days after he departed from Vannes in disguise, attended by five persons only. As soon as he was out of the Town he left the great road, and riding cross the Fields and through by-ways, without stopping any where, safely arrived at Angers Capital of Anjou. This diligence was absolutely necessary; for otherwise he would have been infallibly taken. Those who were charged to watch him, hearing of his escape, pursued him so closely, that they came upon the borders of Bretagne, but one hour after him. In a few days the Duke being informed that the Earl was retired, under an apprehension of ill treatment, seemed very angry with Landais for giving him occasion to fear, not knowing doubtless what his favorite was negotiating with the King of England. Then, he gave all the English in his Dominions leave, to go to the Earl with his compliments and offers of service. The Earl of Richmond received these civilities with signs of the utmost gratitude, and desired the Duke's messenger to tell him, he would have all his favours in everlasting remembrance. Thus the Earl of Richmond escaped, as it were miraculously, out of Richard's snares. This was the second time he had been thus happily delivered. The English belonging to his retinue, thought themselves no less fortunate than he, to be freed, by the Duke's generosity, from his unworthy Minister, who not long after stoned on a Gibbet for all the ill actions his avarice had prompted him to commit.

The Earl of Richmond making but a short stay at Angers, went to Charles VIII, then at Langeais, who received him very civilly. However, as the Court of France was not yet free from troubles, it was no favourable juncture for the Earl to procure the assistance he could no longer

The Earl of Oxford escapes out of prison, and goes to the Earl of Richmond. Hall. Stow. Hollingh.

Whilst his Affairs were in this state of uncertainty, he saw the Earl of Oxford (1) arrive, whom King Edward IV had confined in the Castle of Hammes in Picardy. This Lord, who had been one of the principal friends of the House of LANCASTER, hearing in prison that the Earl of Richmond pretended to the Crown, had wrought so effectually upon the Governor of Hammes (2), that he had persuaded him to release him, and declare for the Earl. He even brought him along with him to salute that Prince, and offer him his service. The advantage of having the Earl of Oxford in his party, was very beneficial to the Earl of Richmond in England. Several other Lords privately sent him word that he might depend upon their assistance, when they should see a proper Season to declare against Richard.

Richard shows the Lord Stanley to have his Son in Holings. Hall. Stow.

Mean while, the King had daily notice that something was contriving against him in favor of the Earl of Richmond; but could not discover the authors of the plot, what spies soever he employed. Besides, he knew no English Lord powerful enough, as he thought, to form or execute an enterprise of that nature. The Lord Stanley was the only Person he could mistrust, because he was Husband to the Countess of Richmond. That alone rendered him suspected, though otherwise he had no Proof against him. So, to secure himself from that side, Stanley desiring permission to retire upon his own estate, he required him to leave his Son (3) at Court as a sort of Hostage. Indeed, his suspicions were but too just, since that very Lord proved afterwards the principal instrument of his ruin.

He discovers the Plot of the Marriage of the Earl of Richmond with Elizabeth. Hall. Stow.

Richard knew he was not beloved in England. On the other hand, he heard there were certain motions among the people, which, though secret, could not but be dangerous. However, he could not prevent the mischief he dreaded, without knowing wherein consisted the plots of his enemies, and the principal authors. Upon this therefore he laid out all his pains. At length, by planting spies in the Country, he came to find, that the projects in favor of the Earl of Richmond were founded upon his promise to marry the Princess Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of Edward IV. This discovery made him perceive, the Yorkists were not far from an union with the Lancastrians, since they consented to this marriage. It was manifest that such an agreement could not but occasion his ruin, since in that case he would have only a few friends of his house to rely on, all the rest declaring for his Brother's family. Finding therefore, that the plot which was contriving against him, rested upon a more solid foundation than he had imagined, he applied himself wholly to break the Earl of Richmond's measures, by preventing this fatal marriage. He found no better way to accomplish his ends, than to marry himself the Princess designed for his Enemy. But the execution of such a project was clogged with several difficulties, which to a Prince less scrupulous than himself, would have appeared insuperable. The first was, he had a Wife already, whose constitution afforded no signs of her leaving this world. But, he despaired not to surmount that obstacle, either by a divorce, or some other less lawful means. The second difficulty was, to draw Elizabeth out of the Sanctuary at Westminster, where she was with the Queen her Mother. Besides, it was no easy task to persuade the Queen Dowager to give her Daughter to the murderer of her Sons. Lastly, the Pope's dispensation to marry his Niece must be obtained. But this obstacle seemed inconceivable in comparison of the others, well knowing, it was not impracticable to adjust that affair with the Court of Rome.

He gets his divorce to give up her Daughter. Hall. Holings. Stow.

To begin the execution of this strange project, he sent several persons to the Queen Dowager, to insinuate to her, that he wished to live in friendship with her, and to shew her marks of his good will: That he confessed, he had dealt too rigorously with her, but to repair in some measure the injury he had done her, he intended to assign her an honorable pension, and give her two Brothers such posts as they should have reason to be satisfied with. Moreover, he would take care of her Daughters, and help them to marriages suitable to their quality. But as the Queen would hardly be induced to credit his promises, after having been so cruelly deceived, the persons he employed hinted to her, that this alteration proceeded from the death of the Prince of Wales. That the King being now childless, and without hopes of having any Issue, his interests were no longer distinct from those of his Brother's family, and therefore he could do nothing more advantageous to himself and his house, than to marry his Nieces into the most considerable families in England. In fine, she was told, the King's design was, that after his death, the Princess Elizabeth should ascend the Throne; what he had done in favour of the Earl of Lincoln his Nephew being easily revokable, since it had not yet passed into an Act of Parliament.

These last insinuations made deep impression in the Queen's mind. Her interest made her imagine, what was said to be very probable. On the other hand, she was heartily tired of her Sanctuary, which was properly a Prison, from whence she could not stir without being liable to greater mischiefs. She had an extreme love for her Brothers, as she had plainly shewn in the Life-time of the King her Husband, and the hopes Richard gave her concerning them, agreeably flattered her. In fine, she considered that the plot in favor of the Earl of Richmond having miscarried by the Duke of Buckingham's death, she could expect for herself and Daughters only a still more rigorous fate, if by her denial she should farther incense the King. These considerations causing her to forget the grievous outrages received from that Prince, she was so excessively blind, as to put her five Daughters into his hands. Moreover, the writ to the Marquis of Dorset Hall, her Brother, to advise him to relinquish the Earl of Richmond, and throw himself into the King's arms. The Marquis as inconsiderate, and no less ambitious than the Queen his Sister, flattering himself with the hopes of honors and preferments, privately withdrew from Paris, in order to pass into England. But the Earl of Richmond caused him to be purged with such diligence, that he was brought back to Paris, and, by strong reasons, persuaded to stay with the Earl.

As soon as Richard had his Nieces in his power, he thought of means to execute another part of his project: And that was, to be rid of his Queen, in order to marry his Niece. Those Historians that speak most favorably of his conduct, say, he made the Queen die with vexation, by shewing an aversion for her which she did not deserve, and by grievously mortifying her every day. Others speak plainer, and affirm, he hastened her death by poison. Some add, he privately acquainted the Archbishop of York with certain secret infirmities of the Queen, which rendered her very disagreeable to him. This was on purpose that the Archbishop might tell her again, which he thought would cause her to languish away, and shorten her days. It is said further, that the Archbishop, after hearing the King's discourse, told some of his friends the Queen had not long to live. And indeed, she died presently after. Her fate would have been more worthy of pity, if her death had not been observed to be a manifest judgment upon her, for marrying the murderer of the Prince of Wales her first Husband, Son of Henry VI. Richard shewed an extraordinary sorrow for his loss, and made a pompous funeral for his deceased Queen. But this feigned grief was not Hall capable of undeceiving the people, who openly accused him of murdering his Queen (4) as he had done his Nephews.

Notwithstanding the extreme sorrow he expressed in publick, the Queen was no sooner in her grave, but he had the assurance to make his addresses to the Princess Elizabeth, and offer her marriage. But she so answered him, as shewed her abhorrence of such an union, and desired him never to mention it more (5). Richard being sensible it was no proper season to use violence, was satisfied for the present with this first step, till time should furnish him with a more favorable opportunity to press the execution of his project. Mean while, as he daily became more odious, many Lords and Gentlemen went over and offered their service to the Earl of Richmond. Others took the same course, to avoid the persecutions of that bloody Prince, if unhappily he came to suspect them. Those that remained in the Kingdom were no better affected, and waited only a favorable opportunity to declare against him.

This proceeding encouraging the Earl of Richmond, he earnestly solicited the Court of France for aid. King Charles's Ministers at length seriously considering his request, believed it could not but be advantageous to France, to cherish the troubles in England. It was solely with this view that they promised the Earl an aid of two thousand Men, with Ships to transport them, and gave him a Sum of money. Philip de Commines says, he never saw such wretched Troops as those designed for this expedition. Which is a clear evidence with what intent the Court of France granted the Earl this inconsiderable Supply. Besides, he was required to leave Hostages in France, that satisfaction should be made for what was expended by the Court. The Earl having reason to mistrust the Marquis of Dorset, embraced this opportunity to leave him in Hostage at Paris, with Sir Thomas (2) Bourchier. Then he repaired to Raan, where the Troops that were lent him were ordered to assemble.

When he came to Raan, he received the disagreeable news of the Queen's death, and of Richard's design to marry the Princess Elizabeth his Niece, and to give Cecily her younger Sister to one of his Favorites. His measures being broken by this marriage, which was represented to him as ready to be accomplished, he consulted upon this occasion with the Lords that attended him. The result of their opinions was, that since he could have no hopes of espousing one of Edward the Fourth's marriageable Daughters, he ought to think of some other. For that purpose, he was advised to gain to his interest Sir Walter Herbert, a Person of great power in Wales, by an offer of marrying his younger Sister, the eldest being already married to the Earl of Northumberland. The resolution being taken, he dispatched an express to Sir Walter Herbert (3) to make the proposal. Happily watched, that he durst not found the roads so narrowly to Herbert. It is extremely venture to pursue his Journey to Herbert. It is extremely probable, if this Affair had succeeded according to the Earl of Richmond's desire, he would have been forsaken by all the friends of Edward the Fourth's family, who were very numerous. For, they had engaged in his party, only out of hopes of his uniting the two Houses of York and Lancaster by his Marriage with the Princess Elizabeth.

Not many days after, he received Letters from England (4), acquainting him, that if he would make haste and land in Wales, he could not have a more favorable opportunity. That all the Nobility of the Country were for him (5). That he would find the people ready to take arms in his favour, and a good sum of money, which had been privately gathered (6) to supply his occasions. That in the rest of the Kingdom every one was displeased with the King, who daily rendered himself more odious. In fine, that the Juncture was the most favorable, as it did not appear that Richard imagined him so ready to depart, since there were no extraordinary preparations in hand.

This good news obliged the Earl to hasten his departure, without staying for Sir Walter Herbert's answer. So coming to Horsfleur, where his Ships waited for him, he embarked his Troops (7), and set sail the last day of July. He arrived the sixth of August at Milford-Haven (8) in South-Wales, and next day came to Haverford (9), where he was joyfully received by the Inhabitants.

From this place he sent an express to the Countess his Mother, to inform her of his Arrival, and Design to march towards London, desiring her withal to assemble all his friends, that they might join him upon his rout with as many Troops as possible. This rout was to be very long, since having no Town upon the Severn at his command, he was necessarily obliged to cross almost all Wales, to get to Shrewsbury to the head of that river, where he was told he should be received. So making but a short stay at Haverford, he began his march to North-Wales, in order to reach Shrewsbury before the King was ready to dispute his passage.

Richard hearing the Earl of Richmond was landed at Milford-Haven with so few Troops, did not imagine he would be able to make any great progress. However he sent orders to Sir Walter Herbert, to raise the Militia of the County, thinking that Herbert might easily stop him till he was himself ready to march. But Herbert having been privately gained by the Earl's friends, suffered him to pass unmolested, without offering to make the least opposition.

Some days after, Sir Rice ap Thomas, a Man of great power in Wales, met the Earl upon his rout, and offered his service, which was gladly accepted (10). He had with him a good body of Welshmen. It is not surprising that all Wales should declare for the Earl, since he was of Welsh extraction, and of one of the antientest families of the Country.

The Earl of Richmond's Army being greatly increased by the junction of Sir Ralph ap Thomas, and several Welsh Gentlemen (11), and the whole Country supplying him in his march with all necessaries, he arrived in a few days at Shrewsbury, where he was received without opposition (12).

The King had very justly suspected the Lord Stanley of being a secret friend to his Son-in-law. Stanley had indeed assured the Earl of Richmond, he would favour him to the utmost of his power. But as he was forced to leave his Son in Hostage with the King, he could not openly espouse his cause without endangering his Son's life. For this reason he pretended to take the King's part, and having levied about five thousand Men, posted himself at Lichfield, as if he intended to oppose the Earl of Richmond's march. On the other hand, Sir William Stanley (13) his Brother drew together likewise a body of two thousand Men, insinuating that it was with the same view.

The King was then at Nottingham, where, at the first news of his enemies landing he had given orders to assemble his forces (14). He at first considered the Earl of Richmond's attempt as a sort of Bravado, which he hoped to make him quickly repent. But when he heard that Sir Walter Herbert had suffered him to pass without opposition, that Sir Rice ap Thomas had joined him, that all Wales had taken his part, and that he was marching to Shrewsbury, he perceived, the Affair was going to become more important. So, without hesitation, he resolved to give him battle before he had made greater progress, and his Army was reinforced. He wisely judged, if on this occasion, he showed the least faint-heartedness, it would certainly cause the whole Kingdom to declare against him. On the contrary, his firmness was capable of keeping in awe such as were inclined to side with his enemy. Mean while he had every day the mortification to hear his Officers and Soldiers deserted to the Earl. He was still in hopes, the Lord Stanley and his Brother would join him with their Troops, though the little correspondence they kept with him, gave him but too much cause to suspect them of treachery. Be this as it will, having received certain advice, that the Earl of Richmond intended to march towards London, he resolved to expect him upon his rout between Leicester and Coventry, in order to put a speedy end to their quarrel by a Battle.

Though the Earl of Richmond's Army was not considerable, he was no less desirous to engage, because he expected that the Lord Stanley and his Brother would not

The Earl being come to Lichfield, heard that the King was at Leicester. So, perceiving he could not possibly proceed to London without fighting, he resolved to march directly to his enemy (1). Whilst he was on the road to Tamworth, he happened to be behind his Company, and attentively musing upon his Affairs, mistook his way, and lost the track of his Army. He roved about till night, not daring to inquire the way to Tamworth for fear of addressing to some one of Richard's party. At last, not being able to find the road, he was forced to pass the night at a Village, without knowing where he was, or daring to inquire. However, next morning he found means to get to Tamworth, where his Army was in great pain for him, not knowing what was become of him. To excuse such a blunder which, had it been known, must have done him great injury, he pretended he had been to confer with some private friends who did not care to appear openly. That very day, he went with few Attendants to Aberffon, where he had a long conference with the Lord Stanley (2). On the morrow hearing that Richard was gone from Leicester to meet him, he advanced to save him some part of the way. The two Armies met at Bosworth, so near one another, that there would be no avoiding a Battle, supposing either of the two Leaders had desired it. But they were both very far from such a thought. The 23d of August was the day famous for the Battle which decided the quarrel of the two contending Houses.

Richard perceiving his enemy to advance, drew up his Army, consisting of between twelve and thirteen thousand Men. He gave the command of the vanguard to the Duke of Norfolk, and led the main body himself, with his Crown on his head, either to be better known, or to put his Troops in mind they were fighting for their King. The Earl of Richmond who had but five thousand Men, drew up his Army likewise in two lines, of which the Earl of Oxford commanded the first, and himself the second (3). A Historian has recited the Speeches of the two Leaders to the Soldiers before the fight. But as it is not very certain that they were really spoken, and as besides they contain nothing very particular, I shall pass them over in silence.

Whilst the two armies were preparing for battle, the Lord Stanley, who till then had continued at Aberffon, posted himself with his Troops over against the space, between the two armies, and his Brother, who was come from Stafford, took his station on the other side, opposite to him. Richard had been hitherto in doubt, whether the Lord Stanley was for or against him, because he had not yet made any public demonstration in favour of the Earl of Richmond. But when he saw him in that post, it was easy to perceive, he was not there to assist him, since he had not given him notice of his design. Mean while, willing to know for certain what he had to fear or hope, he sent him orders to come and join his Army.

Stanley answered, he would come when it was convenient. This answer not satisfying the King, he commanded his Son to be immediately put to death. But his Generals represented to him, that though the Lord Stanley's behaviour was very doubtful, and even gave cause to suspect him, he had not yet however declared for the Earl of Richmond: That it was not improbable, he was meditating some great action in favour of his Sovereign, or perhaps intended to stand neuter during the fight, in order to join the Conqueror. That in both these cases, it was better to defer examining his Conduct till after the event, than to provoke him by putting his Son to death, to give the Earl of Richmond an assistance capable of making Victory incline to his side: That after all, in the King's present Circumstances, the death of the young Lord Strange, could procure him no advantage. These arguments seemed to the King of sufficient strength to cause him to revoke his orders. But he was guilty of an unpardonable error, in remaining doubtful as to the two Brothers, who plainly enough discovered their design. As his army was still superior to the Forces of the Earl of Richmond and the two Brothers together, he should have opposed to these last, two Bodies equal to theirs, with orders to attack them the moment they offered to stir. He would thereby have debarred them of the advantage of taking their time to declare, as they afterwards did. Such an oversight in so able a Prince as Richard, cannot be looked upon but as proceeding from a particular direction of the providence of God, who had determined his destruction.

The two armies approaching one another, the battle Hall began with a shower of Arrows discharged from both sides, after which the Royal Army moved forward to come to close fight. The Lord Stanley, who till then had been only a Spectator, perceiving the Duke of Norfolk widened his line to the left, in order to surround the Earl of Richmond's Troops, gave him not time to execute his design. On a sudden, he posted himself on the right of the Earl's, to receive the front of the King's first line. This motion causing the Duke of Norfolk to halt, in order to re-close his line which was too much extended to the left, the fight ceased for some moments. But presently after, both sides being more upon an equality, by the Lord Stanley's joining the Earl, fought with great ardour.

Mean while, Richard being impatient to know what passed at the first line, spurred his Horse towards the place where they were engaged. At the same time, the Earl of Richmond quitting his second line, where he had taken his Post, was advanced as far as the foremost ranks of the first, to encourage his Troops by his presence, being sensible that the success of the day, would in great measure be determined by the fight of the two first lines. Richard perceiving him, instantly rode to attack him. He slew Sir William Brandon, the Earl's Standard bearer, who had interposed in his way. Sir John Cheney having taken Brandon's place, to oppose the King's furious efforts, was overthrown to the ground. The Earl of Richmond avoided not the Combat. But if we may judge by the manner wherein the Historians relate these particulars, he showed no great eagerness to join his enemy, contented himself with standing in a posture of defence; and willingly suffered his people to come between them, and hinder them from too closely approaching each other.

At the very time that Richard was singling out the Earl of Richmond, to decide at once their important quarrel, it was decided very much to his disadvantage from another quarter. Sir William Stanley, following the example of the Lord Stanley's Brother, and seeing that the left of the Earl of Richmond's first line began to give ground, openly declared against the King, by falling upon his Troops in the flank, who were employed in fighting their enemy's in the front, and vigorously repelling them. This so reasonable an attack at so critical a moment, having caused an extreme disorder in the right of the King's first line, they were seen suddenly to retreat towards the main Body, and the left quickly followed their example. This hasty retreat struck such a terror into the main Body, that they almost all took to flight, without expecting the enemy. The Earl of Northumberland alone, who commanded one of the wings, stood without motion, having first ordered his Troops to throw down their arms, to let the enemies see they had nothing to fear from him. Richard perceiving the day was lost, and not being able to think of flying, or running the hazard of falling into the hands of the Earl of Richmond, rushed into the midst of his enemies, where he soon met with the death he sought. Thus fell the Usurper, in a more glorious manner than his Crimes seemed to deserve. He wore but two years and two months the Crown, he had purchased by so many ill actions.

The Battle lasted about two hours, including the time spent in the pursuit of the run-aways (4). As most part of the King's army fled without fighting, there were not slain on the spot above two thousand Men (5) on his side. The Earl of Richmond lost but a hundred, of whom Sir William Brandon was the only person of note. He was Father to Charles Brandon afterwards Duke of Suffolk. On the King's part, the Duke of Norfolk lost his Life valiantly fighting for him who had made him a Duke (6).

He would have doubtless gained more honour and glory, had he employed his valour for a Prince who had better deserved than Richard, that a Man should hazard his Life for his sake. The Earl of Northumberland was taken into favour by the Conqueror, having perhaps held Intelligence with him before the battle. It seems at least, that it may be inferred, as well from what he did in the beginning of the rout, as from certain verses found that very morning by the Duke of Norfolk, on his Tent-door, intimating, that the King was told (1). The Earl of Surrey, Son of the Duke of Norfolk, was taken prisoner, and sent at first to the Tower of London, but shortly after obtained his pardon and liberty. Some of Richard's Adherents were treated with the same lenity, others had the good fortune to escape. But Gatesby, Minister and Confidant of Richard, who had so basely betrayed the Lord Hastings, being made prisoner, was executed two days after at Leicester, with some others of the same stamp, who had been the Usurper's Instruments.

Richard's Crown being found by a Soldier, was brought to the Lord Stanley, who went immediately and placed it on the Earl of Richmond's head, congratulating him upon his Victory, and saluting him King. From that time Henry kept the regal title, and acted always as Sovereign, as if that bare Ceremony had given him an undoubted right. Richard's body was found among the slain stark naked, covered with blood and dirt, and in that condition thrown cross a Horse, with the head hanging on one side and the legs on the other, and so carried to Leicester (2). The body lay two whole days exposed to publick view, after which, it was interred without any Ceremony, in one of the Churches of that City. Some time after, Henry VII his Enemy and Successor, ordered a more honourable Monument to be erected for him on account of Elizabeth his Queen, who was of the House of York (3).

Richard III was surnamed Crook-back'd, because he was so in reality. Moreover, one of his arms was almost withered, receiving but little or no nourishment. As to the defects of his mind, if we believe most Historians, they were so great and so numerous, that it would be difficult to find in History a Prince of so ill a Character. It is certain, he had a boundless ambition, which often caused him to commit actions unbecoming a Christian Prince. To this Passion alone must be ascribed his treachery and cruelty, since he was treacherous and cruel only with respect to the acquisition or preservation of the Crown. He has not been the sole Prince whom ambition has led into the like excesses. The Historians who write in the reign of Henry VII and Henry VIII, have so aggravated the heinousness of his actions, that one cannot help observing in their writings, a strong desire to please the Monarchs then on the Throne. Nay, very probably they have ascribed to him some actions upon no very good foundation; for instance, his murdering with his own hand Henry VI, and the Prince of Wales. Their desire to say a great deal of ill of this Prince, made them overlook his good qualities, which ought not to have been passed over in silence. Be this as it will, without pretending either to justify him upon what he did of ill, or condemn him generally upon all, as some have done. I shall content my self with blaming what was blame-worthy, and acknowledging withal what deserved condemnation. The Crimes he was guilty of in procuring or keeping the Crown, are, as I said, effects and consequences of his immoderate ambition, by which he suffered himself to be blinded. But their being produced by that Passion, does not in the least lessen their heinousness. As to the rest, he had a great deal of sense, and a very solid Judgment, Qualities that might have been an honour to him, had they been used to better purposes. We may judge of his good sense and penetration, by his precautions to secure himself from the assaults of his enemies. These precautions could not be more just, if divine Providence had not been pleased to render them fruitless, as it sometimes does with respect to seemingly the best concerted designs. On several occasions he shewed an uncommon Valour, and particularly in the battle where he was slain. This cannot be denied him without injustice. He expressed great concern that Justice should be impartially ministered to all his Subjects without distinction, provided the preservation of his Crown was not concerned; for in that respect he made no scruple to trample upon all the rules of Right and Equity. This natural Inclination for Justice, but combated by his ambition, may afford some occasion to presume, he would perhaps have proved a good King, had he been able to fix himself so firmly in the Throne as to have feared no revolution (4). At least, this cannot be said to be improbable. The Emperor Augustus, who was guilty of so many Cruelties to arrive at the Empire, affords a memorable and well-known Instance of such a Change, and it would not be impossible to find other examples. But as Richard was taken out of the World before he had given signs of any amendment, his ill actions absorb'd whatever there might be commendable in him. There is one Historian however who has endeavoured to vindicate this Prince. But as he has set no bounds to this Vindication, and laboured to make him entirely innocent, he has not acquired much credit, especially as he was often obliged, in order to attain his ends, to advance facts not strictly true. He has however a place in the Collection of the English Historians; but no modern Author has thought fit to take him for guide (5).

Richard left but one natural Son, who was yet a Minor when the King his Father died. Some months before, he had made him Governor of Calais, Guines, and of all the Marches of Picardy, belonging to the Crown of England (6). With Richard III, ended the Angevin Kings, surnamed Plantagenets (7); who, since Henry II, the first of this race, had possessed the Crown of England from Father to Son, during the space of three hundred and thirty years. Richard was the last King of this House; but not the last Male, as some have affirmed, since the Earl of Warwick his Nephew, Son of the Duke of Clarence his Brother, was still alive. This young Prince was the sole branch of the Male-issue of Edward III, which had been so numerous; but was almost entirely destroyed by the late Civil War. This War, commenced thirty years before, was at length ended by the Battle of Bosworth, after destroying above one hundred thousand English-men, and a great number of Princes of the two contending Houses. Philip de Commines mounts the number to fourscore; but it is a mistake or exaggeration of that author, as it is easy to see by the Genealogical Table of the posterity of Edward III.

Let us close the History of the Plantagenets with a brief recapitulation of the most memorable accidents that befel the Kings of this race, whilst on the Throne of England. In this summary of the fourteen foregoing reigns, it will be seen, not without astonishment perhaps, that the happiness and glory enjoyed by this race for above three hundred years, were almost nothing in comparison of their misfortunes (8).

This monument stood till the dissolution of the Abbeys under Henry VIII, when it was pulled down and entirely defaced; since which his Grave being over-grown with Weeds and Nettles, is become very obscure and not to be found; only the Stone-Cross, wherein his Corpse lay, was made a drinking-Trough for Horses, at the White-Horse-fair in Leicester. Richard was not above three or four and thirty years old when he was killed. He gave five hundred Marks a year to St. John's College in Cambridge. Sanford, p. 434.

(4) His Enemies seem to own, that excepting his Cruelties to gain and keep the Crown, one might judge him to be a good King. Particularly in his care to check Vice, and promote Sobriety and Virtue; witness his Circular Letters to the Bishops, and in his concern for the good Government and Ease of his Subjects, as may be seen in his proclamation against the Roods in Kent. See Compl. Hist. Vol. I. p. 176. My Lord Verulam says of him, that he was in military Virtue approved, valiant of the Honour of the English Nation, and likewise a good Law-Maker. (5) George Buck, Esq; has endeavoured to represent King Richard III as a Prince of much better Shape (both of Body and Mind) than he had been generally esteemed. His Work, consisting of five Books, is intitled in the Collection of the English Historians.

(6) In his Patent he is called John de Gloucester. See Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 12. p. 267.

(7) He is a Double-Nick; the reason of this Surname Antiquaries are at a loss to find out, and give no better than this: Edm. the first Earl of Arundel of that name, being thung with remorse for some wicked Actions of his, in order to atone for them, went in Pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and at the Holy Sepulchre was foundly scourged with Beaten Twigs, which grew in great plenty there. From whence he came after took the Surname of Plantagenet, or Brachiot.

(8) It were to be wished, that to good a Judicious as Rapin had been more sparing of God's Judgments; since Remarks of bell being a sign of great Weakness. But when they are built on Falsities to last, as is sometimes the Case, they are incredible. Of this we have an Instance even in Rapin himself. See above, p. 611. Note (11). As for the long Life he has given of God's Judgments upon the House of Plantagenet, it comes to nothing extraordinary, nothing but what is very common in this World, and what might easily be matched out at the Houses of several other Families.

HENRY

HENRY II, the first King of this House, was the greatest of all the English Monarchs with respect to extent of Dominion. Besides the Kingdom of England, he possessed in France, Guienne, Poitou, Saintonge, Auvergne, Limousin, Perigord, Angoumois, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Normandy, to which he joined also Bretagne by the marriage of one of his Sons with the Heiress of that Duchy; and lastly, crowned all with the Conquest of Ireland. But with all this grandeur he was ever unhappy. His contest with Becket, the vexatious persecutions from Pope Alexander III, the rebellion of his Queen and Sons, and the unfortunate success of his last War with France, suffered him not to enjoy a moment's repose.

RICHARD I, rendered his name famous in the East, by the conquest of the Isle of Cyprus, by the taking of Acre, and by a great victory over the Saracens. But the fame he acquired in that expedition was a dear purchase to Christendom, and particularly to England, by the prodigious quantity of Men and money, exported from thence, without the Christians of Palestine reaping any great advantages. Richard himself at his return into Europe, underwent the rigours of a grievous and long imprisonment, from which he could not be freed without an exorbitant ransom which quite drained his Kingdom. In short, after a several years struggle with Philip Augustus to very little purpose, he unfortunately perished by an Arrow at the Siege of Chalus, undertaken from his greedy desire of money.

JOHN Lack-land enjoyed not a moment's happiness during his whole reign. Persecuted by the King of France, then by Pope Innocent III, and lastly, by his own subjects, his reign was nothing but a continual train of misfortunes. He lost first all the Provinces possessed by his Ancestors in France. After which, Innocent III, deprived him of his Crown, and restored it to him upon shameful and dishonourable terms. In fine, he had the great mortification to see his Barons in arms against him, and to die at a time when all England was paying Allegiance to a foreign Prince.

HENRY III, a Prince of a very mean Spirit, lived in a continual state of subjection, though seated on a Throne; one while a slave to his favorites and ministers, another while to the imperious will of the Popes. At length, strip of all his authority by his own subjects, he remained some time captive to his greatest enemies. And he was entirely indebted to a victory fortunately gained by the Prince his Son, for his restoration, and the tranquillity he enjoyed the two last years of his life.

EDWARD I, rendered his name famous by the conquest of Scotland. But after shedding torrents of Blood in that unjust quarrel, he had the mortification to lose that acquisition, and to die before he had recovered it. His conquest of Wales was the most real advantage procured for the Kingdom by any King of England.

The reign of EDWARD II, is remarkable only for that Prince's ill-conduct and misfortunes. He is the first instance of a King of England deposed by authority of Parliament. Happy, if the fury of his enemies had stopped there! but, with an unparalleled barbarity, he was made to suffer the most cruel death that could possibly be devised, and which bore no proportion to the indiscretions he was guilty of.

EDWARD III, was one of the most illustrious Kings of England, as well for his personal qualities as for his victories in France, and the famous Treaty of Bretigny, which restored to him with interest the Provinces, John Lack-land had suffered to be lost. But his reign, though glorious, was not free from misfortunes. His minority was sullied by the tragical death of Edward II his Father, and of the Earl of Kent his Uncle. To punish these horrid outrages, he was forced to keep his own Mother in Prison as long as she lived. Towards the end of his days he had the mortification to see himself strip of all he had re-conquered upon France, without hopes of recovery. In a word, he ruined, as I may say, his own reputation, and died at a time when his subjects began to lose their former esteem for him.

Thus far it is easy to see that the race of the Plantagenets had enjoyed no great share of happiness. But their misfortunes, were very inconsiderable in comparison of what that race afterwards underwent. When a Man takes a view of what happened to the posterity of Edward III, he sees nothing but Disasters, tragical or untimely Deaths, Hatred, Animosity, Revenge, Civil Wars, Cruelties unheard of, among Princes sprung from the same Stock. England had never seen so terrible a destruction of her inhabitants, nor had the Scaffold been ever dyed with so much noble and royal Blood as during the hundred years between the death of Edward III, and that of Richard III. Let us briefly run over the several branches of Edward the third's family, in order to see their calamities.

EDWARD the Black Prince, one of the most accomplished Princes that ever was born, died in the sixty-sixth year of his age, having first buried his eldest Son Edward but seven years old.

RICHARD II, his other Son, who mounted the Throne, after his Grandfather, was deposed, imprisoned, and barbarously murdered.

LIONEL Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, died in a foreign Country in the flower of his age. He left but one Daughter, whose marriage into the House of March was the occasion of all the calamities England was afflicted with for thirty years together.

The Posterity of John of Gaunt, Edward's fourth Son, were far from being happy. HENRY IV, Successor of Richard II, passed his whole reign under continual apprehensions of losing a Crown acquired by extraordinary methods, and preserved by the violent death of Richard II, whom he caused to be murdered in Prison.

HENRY V, one of the most illustrious Kings of England, after so great a progress in France as to be declared Regent and Heir of that Kingdom, enjoyed that considerable advantage but two years, or rather, had only a foretaste of what he had so eagerly desired. He died in the flower of his age, leaving a Son nine months old, who afterwards proved very unfit to complement the work, his illustrious Father had so gloriously begun.

The Dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Gloucester, died all three without Issue. Gloucester was long exposed to the fury of his enemies, and at last sacrificed to their vengeance.

HENRY VI, Son of Henry V, lost all that the King his Father had acquired in France. After which, he was strip of his Royalty, imprisoned, restored for a short space, and at last murdered by a Prince sprung from the same stock with himself.

EDWARD his Son, Prince of Wales, died after the same manner, and by the same hand.

In surveying the other branch of the House of Lancaster, namely, that of Beaufort-Somerset, hardly shall we find a Prince but what lost his life in a Battle, or on the Scaffold.

The House of York, of whom Edmund de Langley, fifth Son of Edward III, was head, was still less favoured. Some unfortunate Stars seemed to be continually shedding their malignant influences upon that Family. Excepting Edmund de Langley himself, first Duke of York, all the Princes his descendants died a violent or untimely death.

EDWARD Duke of York, his eldest Son, was slain at the Battle of Azincourt.

RICHARD Earl of Cambridge lost his head on a Scaffold.

RICHARD, third Duke of York, and his Son EDMUND Earl of Rutland, perished in the Battle of Wakefield.

GEORGE Duke of Clarence was afterwards condemned to die in a Butt of Malmsey.

EDWARD IV, after enjoying the Crown of England some years, to which he had a better title than the House of Lancaster, died indeed a natural death, but in the two and fortieth year of his age.

EDWARD V, and RICHARD his Brother, were smothered in their Bed.

EDWARD Prince of Wales, Son of Richard III, was taken out of the World in the eleventh year of his age.

RICHARD III, was killed at the Battle of Bosworth.

In fine, we shall see in the course of the History, EDWARD Earl of Warwick, Son of the unfortunate Duke of Clarence, and the only surviving Male of the House of York, end his days by the hand of the Executioner.

Nothing more remains to complete the account of the disasters that happened to the Posterity of Edward III, but to take notice that THOMAS of Woodstock, Earl of Gloucester, seventh Son of that Monarch, died a violent death in Prison at Calais.

Were not all these misfortunes which fell on Edward I the third's Posterity the effects of the divine vengeance extended to the fourth generation, for the heinous murder committed on the person of Edward II? At least, it is difficult not to see in these events the tragical death of Edward II, revenged upon Richard II: That of Richard upon Henry VI: That of Henry upon Edward V: and That of Edward upon Richard III. rebound with the Cry of, Long live King Henry I which was not disagreeable to him. For, it was a sort of military Election, which might have served him for foundation to pretend to the Crown, though he had no other title. Mean while, he was embarrassed by the uncertainty he was under, whether he should keep to this Election, or found his title upon a more solid foundation. He was however to determine without delay, either to reject the title given him by his Army, till the Parliament should confirm it, or accept it, and assert his Right independently of the consent of the Estates.

He had three titles, or foundations, whereon he could ground his Right. The first was, his descent from the House of Lancaster by Margaret his Mother, Daughter of John Duke of Somerset. The Houfe of Lancaster had been poffeffed of the Crown above fixty years, and this poffeffion had been confirmed by many Aëts of Parliament. But on the other hand, feveral Parliaments had afterwards condemned this poffeffion as a continual Ufurpation, and adjudged the Crown to the Houfe of York, as defcending from Lionel, third Son of Edward III. This queftion, confidered originally, and independently of the Circumftances which moved the Parliaments to come to fuch oppofite determinations, could not have been decided in favour of the Houfe of Lancaster, if the Laws and Cuftoms of the Realm had been followed. But if, fetting afide the ufual practice, it fhould be confidered with refpect to the Aëts of Parliament, it could not but be doubtful, fince the Pro and Con were equally fupported by the fame authority. It might alfo be objected to Henry, that indeed fundry Parliaments had decided the point in favour of the House of Lancaster, but it did not follow that the House of Somerset could receive any advantage from that decision. The Somersets were indeed descended from the House of Lancaster, but by a Bastard-branch, which could pretend to the Crown only by virtue of their legitimation. Now it was a question yet undecided, whether the Act of Legitimation, and Richard the Second's subsequent Letters Patents, gave to that Branch, derived from a Bastard born in Adultery, the right to succeed to the Crown, though mentioned neither in the Act of Parliament, nor in King Richard's Letters. Besides, even upon supposition of this Right, another query still arose, namely, whether the Posterity of this legitimated Bastard, were to have the preference of the descendants of the Daughters born in wedlock, of whom there were several in Castile, Portugal, and Germany. To leave these points to the examination of the Parliament, seemed therefore too dangerous for Henry. But on the other hand, he was not ignorant, that in the decision of the differences between the Houses of Lancaster and York, the Parliaments had not so much regarded the arguments of either Party, as the circumstances of time and things. Now he could never have a more favorable juncture than the present, since he had just delivered England from a Tyrant universally hated. Henry IV, his Predecessor, had not done more for the English, when for reward, the Crown was adjudged to him, in prejudice of the House of March.

Henry's second title was, his intended Marriage with Elizabeth eldest Daughter of Edward IV, which he had sworn. But here, no less difficulties occurred. If he relied upon this Title, he was to resolve either to reign only in right of his Wife, or to confound together the Titles of both Houses. In the former case, he would have relinquished his own, to leave to the House of York a Title which had all along been contested, and have owned that House's Right, for the sole foundation of his mounting the Throne. Besides, he considered, that in case Elizabeth happened to die without Issue, all her Rights would of course devolve to her next Sister, and he thereby be excluded from the Throne upon the death of his Queen (1): That supposing he could get the Parliament to adjudge him the Crown during Life, he should only have a personal right, which would not descend to his Children by a second Wife.

In the latter case, upon supposition of the confusion of the Titles of both Houses, by means of the projected Marriage, pursuant to the Intention of those who had invited him into England, this confusion, indeed, might be advantageous to the Children born of this Marriage. But if implicitly there should be none, and his death fall out before Elizabeth's, he would leave the possession of the Crown to the House of York, which his aversion for that House would not suffer him to behold, even at a distance, without extreme concern. But if, on the contrary, Elizabeth should die before him, he foresaw it would prove the occasion of renewing the troubles of the Kingdom, since, as he reigned in her own right, her Sister, or nearest Relations, might pretend to succeed her.

Henry's third Title was, That of the Sword or Conquest, which his late Victory seemed to give him. But he considered this Victory was entirely owing to the assistance of the People of England, and therefore gave him at most but a right of Conquest over the vanquished Party. Besides, as he could support himself only by the same assistance, he had reason to fear, that in relying upon this pretended Title, he should lose his best friends, since such a proceeding might be construed as a settled design to rule with arbitrary power. He knew William the Conqueror had wisely avoided that rock, by rejecting the title of the Sword, till he saw himself firmly established in the Throne.

These were difficulties considerable enough to merit Henry's mature deliberation before he resolved. But on the other hand, there was no medium to take. He was necessarily either to accept the Title given him by the army, and thereby engage to prosecute his Rights independently of the Parliament's approbation, or by rejecting it, show, he mistrusted his own right, and be exposed to a troublesome examination. After weighing the reasons on both sides, as far as the time would permit, he resolved at last to rest upon the Title of the House of Lancaster. So, taking for granted, that the army in saluting him King, had only given him his due, he determined to assert the Lancasterian claim, without any mixture of that of York, and without submitting it even to the examination of the Parliament (2). To that end, he resolved to be crowned before he summoned the Parliament, and to defer his Marriage till he had obtained an Act to adjudge him the Crown as his own by Inheritance. He determined therefore to assume the title of King, and to issue out orders as such, supposing that the Crown was fallen to him of full Right, though Margaret his Mother was still alive, and ought to precede him. Notwithstanding all the reasons which rendered his Title dubious, he believed there were likewise reasons sufficient to give him room to support it, especially at a time when his Victory was capable of deciding all the questions in his favour. This resolution was the fountain of all the troubles of his reign.

Mean while, though he affected to be convinced of the goodness of his Title, he distrusted it in his own Mind, knowing, if it came to be contested, the reasons whereon he should ground it, were of no great weight, unless supported by force of arms. In this state he continued almost during his whole Life. Always unconcerned in appearance, and yet terrifying himself with the least thing, and dreading that every little accident would be of dangerous consequence. The House of York was a perpetual terror to him. He knew that they who had called him into England were not enemies to that House, but only to the person of Richard III. So the Rights of the two Houses remaining still doubtful, as having been decided only by the Sword, he was very fensible that his could be maintained but by the same way, or by wise precautions, to prevent all future decisions of that kind.

Upon these considerations it was, that the next day after the Battle (3) he sent a detachment of Horse under the command of Sir Robert Willoughby to the Castle of Sheriff-Hutton (4), to take from thence the Earl of Warwick, and conduct him to the Tower of London. This young Prince was Son and Heir to George Duke of Clarence, who was stifled in a Butt of Malmsey. After the death of the Duke his Father, Edward IV his Uncle caused him to be carefully educated, and created him Earl of Warwick; a title enjoyed by his Mother's Father (5). He was unwilling to make him Duke of Clarence, lest that title should preserve the memory of an unhappy Brother, whom he had sacrificed to his jealousy. When Richard was on the Throne, he ordered this young Prince his Nephew to be confined in the Castle above-named, knowing how likely he was one day to disturb him in the possession of the Crown. After the Usurper's death, the Earl of Warwick seemed to have room to expect some favour from his successor; but it proved just the contrary. So far was Henry from releasing, that he made him close Prisoner in the Tower, a rigour proceeding only from his jealousy and inward conviction that his title was not so undoubted as he affected to believe. But this was not all. It will hereafter be seen, that he put this unhappy Prince to death by the hand of the executioner, there in still more tyrant than the tyrant himself, from whom he boasted to have delivered the Kingdom.

The Princess Elizabeth, whom Henry was to marry, was kept in the same Castle by the late King's order, who did not think fit to leave her at liberty to choose a Husband, intending to marry her himself. Henry resolving to repair to London with all possible diligence, thought it not proper to leave the Princess at so great a distance, lest she should be told that she had no need to mix her rights with those of others. Wherefore she was desired to come and remain with the Queen her Mother at London. His design was to make it believed, he intended to espouse her very soon, though he was determined to defer his marriage till after the Session of the Parliament.

A few days after, Henry set forward, by easy journeys, to London, taking care to avoid all appearance of using the right of conquest. He was received in all places with loud acclamations, the people considering him as their deliverer, and as going by his marriage, to put an end to all the Calamities occasioned by the Civil Wars. He made his entry into London with great state (6). However, the People had not the satisfaction to see him as he passed through the City, because he was carried all the way in a close Chariot till he came to St. Paul's. His Historian ascribes this conduct to a motive of grandeur and security, as if having been proscribed in the reign of Richard III, he disdained to fawn upon the people, lest they should think he expected all from them. But I do not know whether this is better grounded than what the same Historian adds, that Henry caused Richard's Standards taken at Bosworth (1), to be brought into St. Paul's Church, that the people of London might not forget that he had just gained a Battle, and was entering the City as a Conqueror. When a Prince has acquired a reputation for politics, some thing mysterious, subtle to the notion formed of him is discovered in his most indifferent actions.

Next day Henry assembled a Council (2) of all the persons of distinction in the Court and City, before whom he solemnly renewed his Oath to marry the Princess Elizabeth. This declaration was absolutely necessary at the present juncture, because of a rumour that he was contracted to Ann, eldest Daughter of the Duke of Breigne, and had not acted with sincerity when he promised to marry the eldest Daughter of Edward IV. Besides, though his design was not to derive his right from this marriage, it was however proper the people should think so, till he had obtained his desire of the Parliament, for fear measures should be taken beforehand to obstruct it. Indeed, he was resolved to perform his promise, but was bent not to confirmate his marriage before his Coronation, lest his Queen should be crowned with him, and her title supported by that junction. Nay, he had reason to fear, that in case his Nuptials were celebrated before the Parliament met, some Clause in favour of the House of York might be inserted in the Act to settle the Succession.

About the middle of September, the City of London was afflicted with a difeate then unknown, which threw the Patients into a prodigious sweat, and carried them off in four and twenty hours. Those that did not within that space were almost fure of recovering. Happily, it lasted but till the end of October; s however it swept away multitudes of people before proper remedies were found (3). The method of cure was to keep the Patient neither too hot nor too cold, with temperate Cordials, which, without too much increasing the heat, helped Nature to expel the humours that caused these extraordinary sweatings.

About this time the new King made the Earl of Oxford (4) Constable of the Tower, who had always been attached to the House of Lancaster, and after his escape out of the Castle of Hammes, joined him at Paris, and had since done him signal services, particularly at the Battle of Bosworth.

Some time after, the King issued out a Proclamation, notifying that he had concluded a truce for one year with the King of France, from the last day of September. It was no small advantage to show the people that Charles VIII acknowledged him for King, even before he was declared so by the Parliament.

The Coronation-day approaching, it was necessary to settle the places and claims of those who were to officiate at this Ceremony. For that purpose, it was requisite to create a Lord High-Steward. But as this Office for some time had been enjoyed only by Princes of the Blood, and there were none then in the Kingdom; the King, not to raise jealousies among the great Men, caused it to be executed by Commissioners (5).

Menn while he would no longer delay to flow his gratitude to three Lords who had faithfully and effectually served him in his greatest distresses. These were Jasper Earl of Pembroke, his Father's Brother, Thomas Lord Stanley his Father-in-law, and Sir Edward Courtney. The first had been a Father to him in his youth, the second delivered him from the snares of Edward IV., when he was concealed in Wales. After that, he was his constant companion in Bretagne, and had helped him to overcome all the difficulties which occurred in his undertakings. In return for his services Henry gave him the title of Duke of Bedford, vacant ever since the death of the famous Duke of Bedford, Brother of Henry V. The Lord Stanley, who had been very servicable to the King at the Battle of Bosworth, was created Earl of Derby. Sir Edward Courtney, who had ventured to engage in his party, and favour in the Western Counties, the Duke of Buckingham's plot, was honored with the title of Earl of Devonshire (6). Henry thought not proper to dispense his favours to others, being willing, according to the custom of his predecessors, to reserve his creations till the sitting of the Parliament.

The Coronation had been fixed to the 30th of October, and the Parliament was not to meet till the 7th of November. Hence it is evident, that Henry did not mean to bring his Title into question, or leave to the Parliament its care any more than to confirm his Coronation, without suffering the foundations to be examined. The examples of Edward IV. and Richard III. had taught him, that the best way to gain the Parliament's approbation, was to take possession. Indeed, there is a great difference between debating, whether a Prince who claims a Crown has a right to pretend to it, or whether he is to be dethroned when in actual possession. The former of these things may be done by reasons, arguments, and studied speeches: The latter requires an Army ready to give weight to the reasons. So Henry may be said to set the Crown himself on his head, since he alone disposed of his right, without the authority of the Parliament, who would have had much to say, if they had examined or been at liberty to examine, by what title Henry ascended the Throne. The Ceremony of the Coronation was performed by Cardinal Barchin Archbishop of Canterbury, who supposing Henry's right to be indisputable, thought it not proper to inquire into the validity of his title (7). The same day Henry instituted a guard of fifty Archers (8) to attend him and his Successors for ever, covering with a pretence of Grandeur and Majesty, a precaution which he believed apparently necessary in the present juncture.

The Parliament met eight days after the Coronation. Henry's ends in calling a Parliament were chiefly four. The first was to be declared King de Jure, as he was already King de Facto, and to secure the Crown to his posterity, by an Act in form. The second, to reverse the attainders of all his party (g). The third, to attaint those who had expelled a great assembly against him, and melted the zeal for the late King. The fourth and last, was to lay claim to the Throne, to prevent his title from being questioned, he intended however to govern the Kingdom like his Predecessors, by way of Parliaments, and not assume a despotic power. This step was absolutely necessary for a Prince whose title was so dubious, and who ascended the Throne without being called to it in the usual way.

It was requisite, for the people's satisfaction and the King's security, that the Parliament should fetter the Crown upon him by an express Act; or otherwise obedience to him might not be thought indispensable. Though he had been powerful enough to censure his authority to be owned without such an Act, his Heirs were not certain to be always so favorable a situation. Mean while it was not easy to open this Act. Henry would not hold the Crown either by the People's election, or by the Parliament, or by the Princess he was to marry. He did not even intend that Elizabeth should share in the Royalty, otherwise than any other foreign Queen. Nevertheless, in this beginning of his Reign, it was proper, the People should not know too much, but have some cause to believe, the King relied upon all these titles. The reason was, the English were extremely jealous of the authority of their Parliaments, and generally much better affected to the House of York than to that of Lancaster. Wherefore the King finding the Parliament disposed to do whatever he could desire, intimated or dictated himself the words of the Act, namely, That the Inheritance of the Crown should rest, remain, and abide in the King, and the Heirs of his Body, perpetually so to endure, and in none other. Which ambiguous words left it undecided, whether he had a prior Right, which was doubtful, or was only King in fact, which could not be denied. As for the limitation of the Entail, he was contented it should go no further than to himself and to the Heirs of his body, leaving the rest to be decided by the Law, in case his Line came to fail. Thus, by not mentioning the House of York, the Act left it undetermined whether that House was entirely excluded, or might inherit after the Heirs of the new King. In this obscure and ambiguous manner did the Parliament draw out the Act, which was afterwards confirmed by the

asked by the Judges,
Bacon.

The Act of settlement and succession being passed, it was moved for another to reverse the Attainders of the King's friends, whilst only Earl of Richmond. But several of these attained persons were actually members of the House of Commons, elected by the favour they had found with the People since the Revolution. There were likewise some in the House of Lords. It was therefore represented to be incongruous, that these persons should give their Votes in an Affair which particularly concerned them, and be Judges in their own cause. The King was troubled that the Acts passed in the late Reign should be deemed valid, and his friends want to be purged of the Crime of espousing his quarrel. He concealed however his Concern, and only intimated, that he wished the Judges to be consulted upon the Affair. The Judges being met (1), gave it as their opinion, that the Members attained by course of Law, should absent themselves till their Attainders were reversed.

Judges.
Ibid.

But whilst they were debating upon this question, another was started with respect to the King himself, who was of the number of the attainted, having been declared Traitor and Rebel by an Act of Parliament. This question was much more embarrassing than the other. The King could not be disjoined from the Parliament without a dissolution, neither was it probable that he would submit to a Parliamentary examination. In this puzzling case, the Judges unanimously relieved, That the Crown takes away all defects and stops in blood : And that from the time the King assumed the Crown, the Parliament was cleared, and all Attainders and Corruption of blood discharged. This decision, more conformable to Politics than to the Laws, established a principle that might be attended with terrible consequences.

Art against Richard III and his Adherents.
Hollingsh.
Bacon.

This Affaire being ended, the Parliament passed an Act of Attainder against the late King, by the Name of the Duke of Glocester, and against his principal Adherents. Of this number were the Duke of Norfolk the Earl of Surrey, the Lords Low, Ferrers, Zouch, Sir Richard Ratcliff, Sir William Catesby &c, all Ministers or Favorites of Richard III. of whom some were killed at Bosworth field, others executed since the Battle. If the Plots which were afterwards formed against Henry himself had taken effect, he would doubtless have been served in the same manner, with all his Adherents. So dangerous is it to carry severity too far in cases of this Nature. Accordingly, we shall see how eager was Henry to prevent the same misfortune from being repeated. He was so pained to perceive the abuse of such a precedent. The design of the present Act was to satisfy the King's vengeance, and procure him the forfeited Estates of the attainted. These confiscations brought him in immense sums, which rendered the demand of a Subsidy unnecessary in this first Parliament, especially as the Nation was in Peace, or Truce with all the neighbouring Princes.

*A General
Pardon.
Hall.

Bacon.*

After the King was revenged of his Enemies, and had filled his Coffers, he published the Royal Proclamation, offering pardon to all that had been concerned in any Plot against him before he came to the Crown, or borne arms for the late King, provided they submitted themselves by such a day. His first design was to procure this General pardon to be passed in Parliament, but recollecting it was an Act of Grace, he chose rather that it should wholly flow from himself. Many who were apprehensive of being professed, readily came and took the Oath of Allegiance, in order to enjoy the benefit of the pardon. But others chose to remain in Sanctuary, till the character of the new King was more known. The Lord Lovell, one of Richard the Third's Favorites, took this last course.

Creation of Peace,
Ibid.

Before the Parliament broke up, Henry was pleased to reward some of the companions of his exile, by creating them Peers of the Realm. The Lord Chandos of Bretagne was made Earl of Bath; Sir Giles D' Aubeney received the title of Baron of D' Aubeney, and Sir Robert Willoughby that of Lord Brooke. At the same time the King restored Edward Stafford to the dignity of Duke of Buckingham, forfeited by his Father's attainder, and to all the possessions belonging to his family, confiscated in the late reign. This was a piece of justice, he could hardly refuse to the Son of a Lord, who had lost his life in his service, and been the first author of his advancement to the Throne.

The Parliament being dissolved about the end of November, Henry sent into France, Oliver King, Archdeacon of Oxford, with money to repay King Charles what he had lent him, and his charges in fitting out the Fleet which brought him to England. Whereupon the Marquiss of Dorset and Sir John Burchier, left as pledges at Paris, had leave to return home. At the same time, Henry gave his Envoy power to prolong the Truce with France, if he found King Charles's Council inclined.

Probably his want of ready-money to pay the King of France, put him upon sending to the City of London to borrow five thousand marks. His demand met at first with great difficulties, because he was not yet well known. However, he obtained at last two thousand pounds (£), which he thankfully received, and punctually repayed afterwards. He often borrowed money in this manner in the course of his reign, and always paid at the day. His view was to establish his credit in that powerful City, that he might use it upon any pressing occasion.

About the end of the year, he called to his Privy-Council John Morton Bishop of Ely, lately returned from Flanders, and Richard Fox (4). He lay under great obligations to Morton, particularly for his intelligence of what was plotting against him in Bretagne, and had a great value for Fox, knowing him to be a person capable of doing him great service, and of a temper very like his own. In time Morton was made Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, Prime Minister, and at last Cardinal. As for Fox, the King made him first Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal, then Bishop of Exeter : After that he translated him to Bath and Wells, from thence to Durham, and lastly to Winchester, the richest Bishoprick in England. These two Prelate, with Urswick the King's Chaplain, were almost always employed in the most important Commissions, Embassies, or Negotiations. Henry loved to employ Ecclesiastics, because he had always Church-Preferments ready for their reward. But he took care to promote them by degrees from smaller to more considerable Sees. Herein he found his own profit ; for by translating Bishops from one See to another, he made the more vacancies, and consequently the First-Fruits which accrued to the King, were greatly multiplied. Never did Prince more ardently seek occasions to heap up riches. Avarice was his predominant passion, influenced even his meaner actions, and caused him to take many false steps, as will be manifest hereafter.

The events of this reign have such a connexion with those of some other States, that it is absolutely necessary to shew in few words the situation of the affairs of divers Princes. Otherwise the motives of Henry the seventh's conduct would be but imperfectly known, who made in his time a very great figure in Europe, though not so much by his arms as policy. I shall begin with Bretagne.

As I have often observed, that Peter Landais, favorite of the Duke of Bretagne entirely governed that Prince, who was old and infirm, and very much impaired in his understanding: That several Lords of Bretagne had made a league against that Minister, and intended to seize him, but having mislaid their aim were exposed to the vengeance of the favorite, who had caused them all to be condemned to die. In the beginning of this year 1485, Landais, in the name of the Duke his master, levied an Army to execute the sentence, and the Lords on their part took arms in their defence. Whilst Bretagne was thus divided, and the two parties ready to come to a Battle, the condemned Lords caused it to be reprefented to those who served Landais, that in the present affair the interest not of their common master the Duke, but of only his unworthy favorite, was concerned: That it was unjust to shed the Blood of their Countrymen in the quarrel of a Man, who had notoriously abused his master's confidence: That therefore, to appease at once the troubles of Bretagne, there was a much more natural and ready way than that of arms; namely, to rid themselves of the Minister, after which, not a Man would refuse to render

Metecet.

Lewis XI King of France dying in the year 1483, left the government of the person of Charles VIII his Son and Successor, to his Daughter Ann, Wife of Peter de Bourbon Lord of Beaujeu. Charles was fourteen years old, and consequently of Age according to the ordinance of Charles V. But as he had been ill educated (1), the King his Father thought him incapable of governing. The moment Lewis XI was in his grave, Lewis Duke of Orleans, first Prince of the Blood, refused to acknowledge Ann of Beaujeu for the King's Governess; affirming, a Woman had no right to meddle with the affairs of the Kingdom. The States being assembled at Tours in January 1484, ended the dispute by their authority. They confirmed the late King's Will, and ordered, the Duke of Orleans should be President of the Council in the King's absence.

Whilst the States of France were assembled, the Lords of Bretagne made their first attempt upon Landais before-mentioned, which proved unsuccessful. The sentence which was given against them, creating a dread of the favorite's revenge, they applied to Ann Lady of Beaujeu to obtain the King her Brother's protection. On the other hand, Landais seeing his enemies had recourse to the Lady Ann, thought he could not do better than rely upon the assistance of the Duke of Orleans. To that end, he intreated him to come to the Court of Bretagne, putting him in hopes, the Duke would give him in marriage Ann his eldest Daughter and presumptive Heir. The Duke of Orleans had espoused against his Will Joanna Daughter of Lewis XI; but had made against this forced marriage a secret protestation, which he meant to use in order to annul it at a more favorable juncture. So, pleased with the hopes Landais had inspired him with, he came to Bretagne, where he was extremely caressed. But he could make no long stay, being obliged to assist at the King's Coronation, which was performed in June this year. Probably, whilst he was in Bretagne, he concerted with the Duke and his favorite measures to disturb the Government of Ann of Beaujeu, who was become absolute mistress of the King her Brother's person and affairs.

Shortly after, the Duke of Orleans forming a league against the Court, and retiring to Bailgency, demanded that the States of France might be assembled. He intended to annul the regulation already made, with respect to the Government of the King's person. But Ann of Beaujeu caused the King to march against him with such expedition, that he was forced to accept of such terms as were granted him, because his friends were not yet ready to assist him. By this agreement, the Earl of Dunois and Longueville, who was considered as his chief adviser, was banished to Asti in Piedmont, a Town belonging to the Duke of Orleans, with a command not to stir from thence without the King's express licence.

The Duke of Orleans being thus compelled to dismiss his Troops, caused the greatest part to lift in the Duke of Bretagne's Army against the condemned Lords. On the other hand, Ann of Beaujeu sent likewise to the Barons part of the King's Troops. Landais's death, which happened soon after, was not capable to make the Duke of Orleans desist from his projects. He stood in need of the Duke of Bretagne to support him against the Court, and even hoped one day to marry his Daughter. On the other side, the Duke of Bretagne having been greatly persecuted by Lewis XI. and knowing, Ann of Beaujeu was of the same character, and followed the same maxims, believed he could not do better than rest upon the assistance of the Duke of Orleans. So, after some private negotiations, these two Princes formed a league together, into which came John de Chalon Prince of Orange Nephew to the Duke of Bretagne, the Duke of Bourbon, the Earl of Dunois, the Duke of Lorraine, and several other Princes and Lords. Some time after, the Earl of Dunois returned into France without leave, and withdrew to his Seat at Partenay in Poitou. The King was yet ignorant of the Duke of Orleans's designs. But the Earl of Dunois's return convincing him, some Plot was contriving in favour of that Prince who was gone to Blais, he sent him a positive order to repair to Court. The Duke obeyed upon a second summons; but next day being informed some ill was intended him, feigned to go a hunting, and retired into Bretagne, where he was quickly followed by the Prince of Orange and the Earl of Dunois. This was in the beginning of the year 1486. We must now see what passed in the Low-Countries.

Since the death of Maria of Burgundy, Maximilian of Austria her Husband had been involved in troubles, on account of the guardianship of Philip her Son, become Sovereign of the Low-Countries by the death of the Duchess his Mother. Brabant, Holland, and Zeeland, had willingly received him for Guardian; but Flanders and Hainault refused to obey him as such.

Affairs of the Low-
Countries.

The obstinacy of the Flemings obliged Maximilian to make peace with Lewis XI upon these terms: That the Dauphin Charles, Son of Lewis, should marry Margaret Daughter of Maximilian, as soon as they were of such an age: That Margaret should have for Dower Artois, Franche Comté, Mâcon, Auxerre, and be educated at the Court of France. Pursuant to this Treaty, Lewis kept these Provinces which he had already seized, and took Margaret home, till the marriage could be consummated.

In 1483 Maximilian successfully made War upon the Liegeois. This same year Hainault owned him for Guardian of his Son Philip.

In 1484 the Flemings still persisting in their refusal to acknowledge Maximilian for Guardian, appointed Governors for Philip, of whom Adolphus de Cleves Lord of Ravenstein, was the chief. Their obstinacy occasioned between them and Maximilian a War, in which Charles VIII concerned himself by assisting the Flemings.

This War ended in January 1485, in a Treaty, importing, that the Flemings should acknowledge Maximilian for Guardian of his Son, upon the express condition that he should not remove him from Flanders till of Age. The Treaty being signed, Maximilian made his Entry into Ghent, where a few days after, was a Sedition, but which was happily appeased. During the rest of the year, the Low-Countries enjoyed a Tranquillity which afforded Maximilian time to take a Journey into Germany, to be elected King of the Romans. Let us now speak of the Spanish Affairs.

Henry IV. surnamed the Impotent, King of Castile, died in 1474, leaving only a Daughter called Joanna, who was universally believed to be supposititious. For which reason, Isabella Sister to Henry, and Ferdinand Prince of Aragon her Husband, took possession of the Throne of Castile. They had a fierce War to maintain against Alphonso King of Portugal, who being affianced to Joanna, supposed Daughter of Henry IV., pretended to the Crown of that Kingdom. This War ended in 1479, to the advantage of Ferdinand and Isabella, who compelled Alphonso to desist from his pretensions. By the Treaty, upon this occasion, it was agreed, that Alphonso, the King of Portugal's Grandson, should marry Isabella Daughter of Ferdinand, when the Parties were of Age to consummate the Marriage.

John King of Aragon died this year, leaving to his Son Ferdinand the Kingdom of Aragon, with a War to maintain against France, the occasion whereof was this. King John had mortgaged to Lewis XI. Roussillon, and Cerdagne, for three hundred thousand Crowns. Afterwards, the Inhabitants of Perpignan revolted from the French, whose Dominion did not please them. Upon this news John came to Perpignan, to try to persuade them to remain in subjection to the French, till he could redeem Roussillon, by payment of the mortgage. But whilst he was labouring to appease them, Lewis XI cau-

In 1485, Charles VIII sent an Ambassador to Ferdinand, who related to receive him, without a positive power to restore Roussillon and Cerdagne.

About the later end of this year was born Catherine Daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, who was afterwards Queen of England, and will have a great share in this History. Ferdinand and Isabella had several other Children, namely, Isabella affianced to the Prince of Portugal, John born 1477, and Joanna born in 1479.

After the
St. and Buchanan.

I still close this digression with the affairs of Scotland. James III continued to govern his Kingdom with oppression and violence, regardless of the affection of his Subjects. I have before observed, the Duke of Albany his Brother surrendered Dunbar to the English, and after the death of Edward IV retired into France, where he ended his days at a Tournament. From that time the English kept possession of that place, though Richard III promised to restore it. This promise being unperformed when Henry VII ascended the Throne of England, James resolved to recover Dunbar by force of arms. For that purpose, about the end of this year, or perhaps the beginning of the next, he besieged and took the Town. The Sea and the important Affairs which Henry had in the beginning of his reign, permitted him not to prepare for its relief.

Such was the posture of the Affairs of the States with whom Henry VII had any concerns during the course of his reign. It is time now to return to our History.

How great an aversion forever the King might have in his mind to the House of York, he had too solemnly promised to marry the Princess Elizabeth, not to perform his word. Besides, this Marriage was necessary to amuse the English, who still flattered themselves, that the King's Intention was to confound his Rights with those of the House of York, notwithstanding his precautions to hinder her being mentioned in the Act of Settlement. The Nuptials were solemnized, the 18th of January, with much greater demonstrations of Joy on the people's part, than on the King's. There was much less satisfaction expressed on the days either of the King's Entry or Coronation: Which was a clear evidence of the people's affection for the House of York, and particularly for the Family of Edward IV. But this was not to be thought very strange. The House of Lancaster, of which there remained no branch, but what was defended from the Daughters, had been forgot during the reigns of the Kings of the House of York. Though Henry rested upon his descent from the House of Lancaster, he was known to be Grandson of a Welsh Gentleman, and his Mother to be sprung only from a Bastard of that House, whom the credit of his Father, and the circumstances of the times had caused to be legitimated. As for the Princes and Princesses descended from the lawful Daughters of John of Gaunt, as they happened to be in Portugal, Castile, and Arragon, and were unknown in England, it was not surprising there was no great Inclination for them. Henry did not like to see the people's Joy for his Marriage. He perceived, Elizabeth had a greater share in it than himself, and consequently he was thought really King only in right of his Queen. This consideration inspired him with such a coldness for her, that he never ceased giving her marks of it so long as she lived. He deferred her Coronation two whole years, and doubtless, would have done so for ever, if he had not thought it prejudicial to him to persist in refusing her that honour. Nay perhaps, he would have dealt with her, as Edward the Confessor had formerly done by his Queen, Daughter of Earl Godwin, had not the desire of Children caused him to overcome his aversion. He had conceived to mortal a hatred to the whole House of York, that he lost no opportunity to humble the Yorkists, behaving always to them not as a just King, but like the head of a Party. In the course of his History will be seen divers proofs of his disinclination to that House.

The day before the King's Marriage was solemnized at London, his Envoy at Paris had concluded with the Court of France a three years Truce, which was to expire January the 17th 1488-9. Charles VIII, who began to form projects against Bretagne, willingly consented to this Truce, to tie up the hands of the King of England, and hinder him from assisting that Dukedom. On the other side, Henry who was ignorant of his designs, believed it could not but turn to his advantage to live in a good understanding with that Monarch, because he thereby rendered himself more formidable to his domestick Enemies, who could no longer expect any diversion from that quarter.

Shortly after, the King made Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby, High-Constable, and William Stanley his Brother Lord Chamberlain. These, of all the Kingdom, were the two Persons the King was most indebted to, since they enabled him to gain the Victory of Bosworth, which procured him the Crown. The Lord D' Aubeney was made Governor of Calais for seven years.

Henry and Elizabeth being sprung from the same stock, namely, Edward III, had wanted a dispensation to marry, because they were Cousins in the fourth degree. It was the Bishop of Imola, Legate à Latere in England and Scotland, that had granted the Dispensation, by virtue of his Commission, which empowered him to grant that favour to any twelve Persons he should please. The King thought at first this Dispensation was sufficient, and without farther reflection, consummated his Marriage. Afterwards he considered, occasion might be taken from hence to question the validity of his Marriage, and to maintain, that a Power granted for twelve Persons in general, could not be extended to Sovereigns. To prevent therefore any such objection, he desired Innocent VIII, who then sat in the Papal Chair, to grant him a Dispensation immediately from himself, and peculiarly adapted to his case. Whereupon the Pope ordered a Bull to be drawn accordingly. But as this Bull was dated March the 13th, about two months after the Marriage, and mentioned not the consummation, or the Legate's dispensation, Henry desired to have another with these two Articles inserted, which was granted him the 7th following. This shows how careful he was, to prevent whatever would afford his Enemies a pretence to disturb him. But the precaution he took at the same time makes this appear still plainer.

With the first Dispensation he received a Bull, confirming the Act of Succession made by the Parliament. The Pope declared, "He had heard, that though the Crown of England was fallen to Henry, not only by Conquest, and an unquestionable Hereditary Right, but moreover by the unanimous Consent of the Nobles and People, and by an Act of Parliament (1), and though undoubtedly and rightfully it belonged to him and the Heirs of his Body, yet, to put an end to the troubles which had long distracted the Kingdom, he was desirous to marry Elizabeth of York, eldest Daughter and Heir of King Edward IV of glorious memory: That therefore having considered, with his Brothers the Cardinals, his Intention in the Spirit of Charity, he had granted the Dispensation necessary for the Marriage, and pronounced the Children, that should be born of it, lawful, and capable of succeeding to their Father and Mother: That he had granted this favour, not at the request of Henry or Elizabeth, or any other in their Name, but of his own Motion, certain Knowledge, and pure Generosity, as it was more largely expressed in the Letters of Dispensation, to which he gave the same force as if they were inserted word for word in these presents: That therefore he decreed, declared, and pronounced lawful, the Succession of the Children issuing from this Marriage, and confirmed the Act of Parliament concerning King Henry's Title, and the Succession of his Children, supplying by his Apostolical Authority, all defects of Right or Fact, that might therein occur."

"That of his own Motion, and by his Authority, he admonished and required all the People of England, and all the Subjects of King Henry, of what rank soever, to obey that Prince, and expressly forbid them to raise disturbances about the Succession, or upon any other account whatsoever, or to infringe in any manner the Dispensation, Declaration, and Act of Parliament."

"That he pronounced ipso facto excommunicate all Persons that should raise any such disturbances, or infringe the foresaid Letters and Acts, to be a Slave on y by the Holy See, or such as should be impeached by her, unless at the point of death."

"That if Elizabeth should happen to die before Henry without Issue, he decreed, agreeably to the foresaid Act

 this Bull.

Nothing shows more how much Henry was himself convinced of the weakness of his Title, than his procuring the Pope's Confirmation. This precaution was not only needless, but even unlawful, since it was directly against the Statutes of Præmunire, of which the English were so jealous. Accordingly, he had taken care to have it said in the Bull, that the Pope granted the Dispensation of his own motion, and without any previous request; a Clause evidently false. It is certain, the Bull of Dispensation ran in express Terms, that the Pope granted it upon what was represented to him by Henry and Elizabeth. Besides what the Pope affirmed, that the Crown of England was fallen to Henry by Hereditary Right, that heap and confusion of other Titles, namely, the Consent of the Nobles and People, the Act of Parliament, the King's Marriage with Elizabeth; all this, I say, corresponded so exactly with Henry's uncertainty concerning his Title, that doubtless, it proceeded not from the Pope's own Knowledge, but rather from the King himself, who had as it were dictated how the Bull should be worded. In fine, the Pope would never have thought of confirming the Act of Settlement, if he had not been requested. But it was not convenient the King should appear to have desired such a Bull, since nothing could be more disagreeable to the English. For taking such a step, even before the Statute of Præmunire was enacted, King John entirely lost the affection and confidence of his Barons, with the Crown which he meant to secure by that expedient. Henry III was like to undergo the same fate, for taking some precautions of this nature. Accordingly it will hereafter be seen, that this Bull was not capable of hindering the King's being frequently molested. The English were not, as formerly, such Bigots, as to imagine, the Pope's Authority could give Henry a Title which he really had not.

The King's
 uncertainty
 with regard to the House of York.

Though the King had happily attained his ends, with respect to the Act of Settlement and Succession, he knew however, what the Parliament had done was not agreeable to the Sentiments of the People. He had been called into England to deliver the Nation from the Tyranny of Richard III. and not to dispossess entirely the House of York.
 This is so true, that in case the Yorkists had not joined with him, in order to preserve the Crown in that House, by means of his marriage with Elizabeth, the Lancastrians would never have been able to raise him to the Throne.
 The Queen, Widow of Edward IV., the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Stanley, were not friends of the House of Lancaster, though private enemies to the person of Richard.
 To these however Henry was chiefly indebted for his greatness. If the People had been consulted, and at liberty to chuse a Sovereign, Richard III. indeed would have been dispossessed, but Elizabeth placed on the Throne,
 Henry therefore was considered only as the Instrument of their deliverance from the Dominion of a Tyrant. But as it was reasonable to reward him, the giving him a share of the royal dignity, by means of his marriage with the Princess Elizabeth was thought a great recompence. And if it was readily agreed, that his right from the House of Lancaster should be united with Elizabeth's, it was rather to avoid fresh troubles by that expedient, than out of a belief of the lawfulness of his title. He had himself gladly accepted the proposal, and upon that foundation it was that he formed his enterprize; or otherwise he would have doubtless met with less assistance and much greater opposition.
 But he had no sooner gained the Battle of Bosworth, but he formed the design of reigning in his own right only, and excluding entirely the House of York; wherein he deceived the expectation of the English, and abused their confidence. This is what he had always in his thoughts, though he concealed his uneasiness with all possible care.

The King's
 design.
 H. Hall.

As the House of York had most Adherents in the northern Counties, Henry resolved to take a progress into those parts. He hoped that his presence, with some Acts of Grace and Favour he might have occasion to dispense, would be capable of producing a good effect. With this view, he departed towards the middle of the Spring, and kept his Easter at Lincoln. During his stay in that City, he heard, the Lord Lovel, one of Richard the Third's Favorites, Humphrey and Thomas Stafford Brothers, who had refused to accept of the general pardon, were gone out of Sanctuary (1), but to what place was unknown. As he was ignorant what their design could be, he continued his Journey to York. Shortly after, he received more certain intelligence concerning the Fugitives. He was told, the Lord Lovel was advancing towards York at the head of three or four thousand Men, and that the Staffords were in arms in Worcestershire before the City of Worcester.

 This news gave him no small uneasiness. He saw himself in that part of the Kingdom where he knew he was not beloved, and where it was not easy to raise forces.
 Besides, he had reason to fear the Lord Lovel had correspondents in York, and among the Nobility of the County:
 Consequently there was no time to lose. He must speedily resolve either to quit York, or take some course to oppose the Rebels. In this strait, he chose to vent unconcerned, perceiving that flight could not but produce a very ill effect. So, without showing any fear, he arrived with of his Followers as were most proper to bear arms, and commissioned some trusty friends to raise Men in and about York with all possible diligence. He was so fortunate, and so faithfully served as to assemble in a short time three thousand Men, of whom he gave the Command to his Uncle the Duke of Bedford. But these Troops were so ill armed and in such disorder that they were not much to be relied on. Besides, they were raised in a County where the Inhabitants were not well affected to the King. For this reason, Henry expressly charged the Duke of Bedford to avoid fighting if possible, till reinforced, but however to show no fear, and proclaim, in his Name, pardon to all that would lay down their arms. This precaution succeeded to his wish. The Duke of Bedford approaching the Male-contents, ordered the Proclamation to be published in terms denoting great superiority and confidence. It had however little effect on the Rebels. But the Lord Lovel their Commander, fearing, they would accept of the pardon, forbore them first. He retired all alone, and hid himself in Lancashire at his friend Sir Thomas Broughton's, and shortly after passed into Flanders to the Duchess Dowager of Burgundy. His Army being without a Leader, submitted to the King's Mercy. The Staffords, who were besieging Worcester, hearing what passed in the North, raised the Siege, and abandoning their Troops, took Sanctuary in the Church of Coleham, a little Village [near Abington.] But that Church enjoying no peculiar privilege, it was judged in the King's Bench to be no sufficient Sanctuary for Traitors. So the two Brothers being taken thence by force, Humphrey the eldest was sent to London to be executed at Tyburn; but Thomas, as being seduced by his Brother, was pardoned. This Rebellion, the first in this Reign, was like a Blaze which lasted not long. It was quenched with the blood of one single Person.
 We shall see, hereafter, others which cost the King more to extinguish the Flames.

On the 3d of July the Scotch Ambassadors, who had been some time at London, concluded a Truce with Henry, which was to end that day three years.

Cardinal Beaufort Archbishop of Canterbury died about this time. The King, desirous to procure the Archi-shoprick for Dr. Morton Bishop of Ely, gave him the custody during the vacancy, thereby declaring his intention, that no other Bishop might make an interest for the nomination. Accordingly Morton was elected some time after, but received not the Pope's Bulls till December.

July the 22d, John le Bouteiller, Lord de Maupertuis, Ambassador of Francis II, Duke of Bretagne, concluded at London with the King a Truce, or rather a prolonga-tion of the Truce, which still subsisted between England and Bretagne, till the death of one of the two Princes.
 But the Trade between the two Nations, which was fettled by several Articles of this Treaty, was to last till the Death of the Survivor.

September the 20th the Queen was delivered (2) of a Prince, though he had been but eight Months with child.
 The King would have the new-born Prince called Arthur, in memory of the famous British Monarch, of whose race he desired to be thought. The Family of the Tudors being British or Welsh, it was not unlike y that he signed by naming his Son Arthur, to intimate his being descended from that illustrious Monarch. It is certain however, this report was not spread, nor Genealogies forged to confirm it, till after the time we are speaking

1486. of. Those who governed the State during Henry the Sixth's Minority, were very far from this opinion, since, after the death of Catherine of France, that Prince's Mother, they ordered Queen Tudor Grandfather of Henry VII to be sent to the Tower for presuming to marry the Queen. Nay some affirm, he was beheaded.

Murder of the People.

The King's Proceedings to deprive the House of York of their rights, had very much dissatisfied the People, who expected quite another thing. They who had called in Henry had been in hopes, that the titles of the two Houses being confounded by his Marriage with Elizabeth, there would be no more distinction between Yorkists and Lancastrians, but all might equally expect the Places in the King's disposal. These hopes were further confirmed by the Birth of Prince Arthur, in whose person were united the litigious rights of the two Houses. But it was seen with extreme concern, that the King still considered the House of York as Rivals and Enemies, and that his Jealousy reached to the Queen herself, whose interest should have been as dear to him as his own. For, not content to show by his continual coldness, and by several mortifications he made her endure, the little kindness he had for her, he had given her a very sensible mark of it, in deferring her Coronation, as if he had been unworthy to sit on the Throne with him. Nay, after she had brought him a Son, her Coronation was no more talked of than when they were first married. This conduct plainly showed, the House of York was still odious to him, and that he feared to take any step which might give the People occasion to believe she had some right to the Crown. It was impossible but this affection should cause great concern in the Yorkists, who were much more numerous than the Lancastrians.

It is rumoured: that the King designed to put Warwick to death.

This discontent being almost universal, some malicious persons spread a report, that the King intended to put to death the Earl of Warwick, Prisoner in the Tower, and the sole Male of the House of York. Their Design was, no doubt, to compare Henry with Richard III., who had taken away the lives of his two Nephews to secure the Crown, and intimate to the People, that in changing King, they had only received one Tyrant for another. Moreover, it was openly rumoured, that one of Edward the Fourth's Sons was still alive, having, as it were miraculously, escaped his Uncle's cruelty. All this plainly tended to found the People's inclinations. The King himself, whether he was the Author of this rumour, as his Historian affirms, or only fomented it by his carriage (1), was not sorry the People ran after a Phantom, because it hindered them from too firmly adhering to the Persons of the House of York, which really existed. Mean while, as the eagerness wherewith the People swallowed this false report, was a clear evidence how ready they would be, if a favorable opportunity offered, to lift against the King, so it gave occasion to the Project I am going to speak of.

Project of a Prince of Wales.

A certain Oxford Priest, one Richard Simon, perceiving the People's joy at the false report of one of Edward the Fourth's Sons being alive, took it into his head to put upon the World for Richard, Duke of York, Brother of Edward V., a young Man, named Lambert Simmel, a Baker's Son, whom he trained up in his house, and believed proper to play such a part. He was about the Duke of York's age (2), of good natural parts, and in all his behaviour had something grand, and above his birth. Simon had scarce begun instructing his Pupil, when another rumour was spread, that the Earl of Warwick had made his escape out of the Tower. This news, though false, caused among the People so general a joy, that the Priest thought fit to alter his Project, and make Simon pass for the Earl of Warwick. Simmel's age agreed better with the Earl's, and the circumstance of his escape was suitable to the Plot. His Pupil was to be well instructed for this purpose, since he was not to personate a young Man taken out of his Cradle in his infancy, and concealed in some private place, but a Prince well known, and brought up in the Court of Edward IV. The Earl was about twelve years old when imprisoned by Richard III. Simmel therefore was to learn to talk pertinently of Edward's Court, and to know particularly the Lords and Ladies that frequented it, as well as the King and Queen. This gives occasion to presume, that the Priest was himself instructed by persons well-informed, and the Plot suggested to him. For, though he had the assurance to form such a design, it is not likely he could instruct his Pupil in many particulars, which he was necessarily to know. At least, it is certain, the King imagined, the Queen his Mother-in-law, and other friends of the House of York, were the real Authors of this contrivance, and only made use of the Priest as an instrument to execute their Designs. The Queen-Dowager was extremely intriguing. It was she that had set on foot the Project in favour of the King when in Bretagne, and thereby shown her credit with the Yorkists. Besides, she could not but be very much displeased with the King's coldness to her Daughter, and his refusing to have her crowned. This alone was sufficient to cause the King to suspect her. But it may be, there was more than bare suspicions.

Be this as it will, Simon, or those that employed him, not thinking proper to produce Simmel first in England, where he might be examined too closely, and by Persons too knowing, judged it convenient that he should act his first scene in Ireland, where Simon the Priest accompanied him. In all appearance, some measures had been taken for his reception in that Country. Since Henry's accession to the Throne, he had very much neglected the affairs of that Island, reckoning that being master in England, the Irish were not to be feared. Indeed, he made the Duke of Bedford Governor of Ireland, in the room of the Earl of Lincoln, Nephew of Richard III., but had continued the same Deputy, the same Chancellor, and all the rest of the officers placed there by Richard. So, the Duke of Bedford being still in England, Thomas Fitz-Gerald Earl of Kildare commanded in Ireland as Deputy, and his Brother was Chancellor (3).

It is more than probable that the Earl of Kildare was in the Plot, and had even begun to take measures to cause Lambert Simmel, the pretended Earl of Warwick, to be acknowledged in Ireland. Ever since June last, Henry had received notice that something was contriving against his service in that Country, though he knew not the particulars. Upon this information, he sent for the Deputy to Court, but the Earl found means to cause the Council of Ireland to write to him, that the Deputy's preference was absolutely necessary in the Island. Simmel being arrived at Dublin, addressed himself to the Earl of Kildare as Earl of Warwick, and informed him how he escaped out of the Tower. If the Earl of Kildare had not been in the Plot, or at least, wished the thing to be as Simmel related it, he would doubtless have seized the Pretender. It was his duty, as he commanded in Ireland in the King's name. But instead of taking that course, he left him at liberty, and so ordered it, with his Brother the Chancellor's help, that the arrival of the pretended Earl of Warwick was divulged, without their appearing to be concerned. They would first see how the People would be affected with the news. The Impression it made was so great and so sudden, as the Authors of the Plot could desire. When it was known in Dublin that the Earl of Warwick was arrived, the People expressed so great joy, that the Deputy and Chancellor believed there was no danger in acknowledging the Pretender. So, after a conference with their friends and confidants, they solemnly waited upon him at his lodging, and conducted him with great pomp to the Castle, where he was treated like a Prince (4). Simmel received the respect that was paid him with a countenance, and carriage that by no means favoured of the meanness of his Birth. In a few days he was proclaimed in Dublin King of England, and Lord of Ireland, by the name of Edward VI. The Irish regarded not the attainer of the Duke of Clarence his pretended Father, having newly learnt by the example of Henry himself, that the advancement to the Throne takes away all defects.

The news of so unexpected an event made the King very uneasy, because it struck upon that string, which he ever most feared; namely, his Title, of the goodness whereof he was not himself thoroughly satisfied. Indeed, the victory of Boisworth had given him an opportunity to decide the question himself in his favour. But he was very sensible, that if the Titles of the two Houses came once more to be put in the balance, he should want a second victory to confirm his, and the House of York would have reasons more than sufficient, if their affairs grew prosperous. In the next place, Ireland, where the pretended Earl of Warwick was retired, was a Country wholly devoted to the House of York, and consequently it was not easy to attack the Rebels there. For that purpose, it would be necessary to lead thither a numerous Army, which could not be done without immense charge. In fine, it was to be feared, the flames which began to appear in Ireland, would reach England, and that there was a secret correspondence between the Irish and English. In this strait, he called a Council of his most inter-

Henry came to the Council. He ordered his Mother-in-law to be confined in the Nunnery of Bermondsey [in Southwark]. Moreover he seized all her Estate, which was very considerable. But as he did not care to discover to the publick the reason of this rigorous usage, because he could not perhaps give sufficient proof of her crime, he caused it to be reported, that she was thus punished for delivering the Princesses her Daughters into the hands of Richard III. This pretence rendered his action still more enormous with the people. They could not help thinking it very strange, that the Queen Dowager should be so severely punished for a fault, which might rather be deemed a weakness than a premeditated malice. In the next place, it could not be conceived, why the King had so long neglected to inquire into this pretended crime. In the third place, since he had married her Daughter, he seemed to have owned that she was innocent, or at least had forgiven her. Lastly, all knowing her to have been one of the principal instruments of his advancement to the Throne, they could not but abhor his ingratitude. This severe usage was thought to be a plain indication of a settled design, to use all pretences to complete the ruin of the House of York and its adherents. But it was not only compassion for the Queen's sufferings, which gave rise to these reflections; her example struck terror into all the Kingdom, there being very few families but what were guilty, either of having assisted Richard III, or of not having opposed him. When it was considered therefore, that the King's Mother-in-law was reduced to this sad condition, for not having been willing or able to resist the Tyranny of the late King, every one was afraid of being called to account for the like crimes, which were supposed to be buried in oblivion. Notwithstanding all this, the Queen Dowager was confined to the day of her death, which happened not till some years after (2).

It was thought at first that the Queen Dowager's misfortune proceeded from the cause published by the King. But it was quickly perceived to be an effect of the decrees of the secret Council called by the King upon Simnel's affair. Shortly after, pursuant to another decree of the same Council, the King ordered the true Earl of Warwick to be shown in publick, who was led through the principal streets of London, and then conducted in solemn procession to St. Paul's, where multitudes were assembled to see him. There, all had time allowed them to view him attentively. Nay, he was made to talk with those that knew him best, and particularly with such as were known to be well affected to the House of York; after which, he was again conveyed to the Tower. But the Irish maintained, that the Earl of Warwick, shown at London, was an impostor, and their's at Dublin the true Earl. They even took occasion from hence to exclaim against the King, for profaning the ceremony of a procession to such a cheat. The King fearing the mischief would gain ground, thought to stop it, by proclaiming a general pardon to all that should quit the Rebels, and by promising a reward to those that should discover the secret of the plot. At the same time he sent orders to guard the Ports, that the Malecontents of England might not pass over and join their friends in Ireland. But all this was not capable to break the measures of his enemies.

It was not only in Ireland that troubles were preparing for him. The readiness wherewith some English Lords and Gentlemen embraced this opportunity to endeavour his ruin, plainly showed, the conspiracy had been laid some time before in England. Indeed, it is not likely, a single Priest should have formed such a project, without imparting it to persons more able than himself to accomplish it. Be this as it will, John Earl of Lincoln, declared by Richard III his Uncle, presumptive Heir of the Crown, was the first that openly appeared to maintain the interest of the pretended Earl of Warwick. He was Son of John de la Pale Earl of Suffolk, and Elizabeth Sister of Edward IV, and Richard III. This Earl however seemed to act contrary to his own interest in taking part with the Earl of Warwick, who was nearer the Throne than himself. But as, probably, he was not ignorant, the person in Ireland was a cheat, he did not quertion that he should easily destroy him, when he had made him his instrument to de throne Henry. So, upon the first news of Simnel's being received and proclaimed King at Dublin, he embarked for Flanders, to concert with the Duchess Dowager of Burgundy, the means to accomplish this undertaking.

Since the death of Charles Duke of Burgundy, Margaret of York his Widow, Sister of Edward IV, and Richard III, lived in Flanders where her Dowry was assigned her. As she had no Children by the Duke her Husband, she carefully attended the education of the Archduke Philip, Son of Maximilian of Austria, and Maria of Burgundy her Daughter-in-law. She had with extreme concern, seen the revolution which restored the House of Lancaster to the Throne, in prejudice of the House of York. She would however have been patient, if Henry VII in uniting the two Houses by his marriage with Elizabeth, had held the balance even, and dispensed his favours impartially to the friends of both parties. But she altered her mind, when she saw Henry delayed marrying her Niece till the Crown was adjudged to himself, without any mixture of the Title of the House of York. She could not see without trouble, that, even after his marriage, he refused to let Elizabeth be crowned, an honour no Queen of England had been debarred of since the conquest; and the birth of a Son had not induced him to do her that justice. So, perceiving his hatred of the whole House of York was implacable, she did not think herself obliged to have much regard for him. On the contrary, she believed, she might without scruple, labour his ruin. Indeed, it is uncertain whether this Princess was concerned in the Priests and Simnel's plot, before Ireland declared for him. It is however very likely, she had helped to manage, together with the Queen Dowager, the Earl of Lincoln, and some other friends of the House of York. For, the Earl of Lincoln's voyage into Flanders, upon the first news of Simnel's arrival in Ireland, gives occasion to presume, he held private intelligence with the Duchess of Burgundy, and from her expected the success of the enterprise. The Lord Lovel, who was in Flanders before him, was likewise in the Plot as well as Sir Thomas Braughton, who said in England to send them notice of what was transacting there.

Whether the Duchess of Burgundy contrived this Plot herself, or was only informed of it by the Earl of Lincoln, she readily embraced this opportunity, which she believed sufficiently favorable to inspire her with hopes of defeating Henry's establishment. Having advised with the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Lovel, and some other Fugitives, she promised to furnish them with two thousand veteran German Soldiers, under the command of Martin Swart an Officer of note, with whom they should pass into Ireland, to strengthen the new King's party. She did not at all doubt but these succours coming from a foreign Country would encourage the Yorkists to take Arms in England. In this situation were the King's affairs about the end of the year 1486. But before we proceed to the occurrences of the next year, we must briefly see what had passed in the neighbouring Countries, especially in France and Bretagne during the course of this year.

I left the Duke of Orleans in Bretagne with the Prince of Orange and the Earl of Dunai. These Princes were no sooner in that Country, but many of their friends came and joined them, and even brought them some Troops. The Duke of Bretagne was old and infirm both in body and mind. Since the death of Lanctot he did not know who to trust with the administration of his affairs, considering his Barons but as so many enemies, though he had granted them a pardon. The Duke of Orleans finding him thus embarrassed, gained such an ascendancy over him, that he governed Bretagne as if he had been the Sovereign. The advantages he enjoyed in that Country, where almost every thing was in his disposal, drew thither many Frenchmen, who came to offer him their service. Mean while, the Duke of Bretagne assembled the States, and caused his eldest Daughter Anne to be declared Heiress of the Duchy; and in case she died without issue, it was decreed, her younger Sister Isabel should succeed her.

The Lords of Bretagne newly reconciled to their Sovereign, perceiving, the Duke of Orleans ruled absolutely in the Duke's Name, and that the French flocked to him in Crowds, began to entertain Suspensions of their Prince. They were afraid, he had sent for all these Strangers to help him to be revenged of them for their outrage upon Disposition of the Duke of Burgundy's Dowry, which was assigned to the King's Widow.

She completed the founding of Queen's College in Cambridge, begun by 1486, his Favorite. In this belief, they assembled at Chateaubriant to consult what was to be done to prevent the danger with which they thought themselves threatened. They were headed by the Lord of Rieux Marfhal de Bretagne. Charles VIII., who was apprehensive, the Duke of Orleans intended to make use of the Duke of Bretagne's Forces to raise fresh troubles in France, thought it his Interest to cherish the British Lords discontent. He hoped thereby to hinder the Duke of Bretagne from assisting the Duke of Orleans. To that end, he sent to the Barons assembled at Chateaubriant, Andrew d'Epinoz commonly called the Cardinal of Bordeaux, with an offer of his Protection. The offer was gladly received by many of them, some of whom perhaps were already gained by the Court of France. Others, foreseeing the Inconveniences that might follow, were for rejecting it. They alleged the several attempts of Charles's Predecessors to become masters of Bretagne, and how dangerous it was to admit the French into the Country. In fine, to prevent this mischief, it was agreed, that a Treaty should be made with the King of France, to determine the number of Men he was to find them, and to set bounds to his pretensions. Pursuant to this resolution, they signed with the Cardinal a Treaty, importing, that the King should send them an aid not exceeding four hundred Lances, and four thousand Foot; that he should not take or besiege any place, neither make any demands upon the Duchy before Duke Francis's death. Charles ratified the Treaty, but as he afterwards showed, not with design to observe it.

The Cardinal of Bordeaux being returned to the King, told him, that during his stay at Chateaubriant, he had learnt, that the Prince of Orange was secretly treating of a Marriage between Maximilian of Austria, and Ann, eldest Daughter and Heiress of the Duke of Bretagne. This discovery obliged King Charles to form the project of seizing Bretagne, if perhaps it was not quite formed already. The posture of the affairs of Europe was extremely favorable. Ferdinand and Isabella King and Queen of Aragon and Castile, little regarded the preservation of Bretagne. Besides, they were then employed in their wars with the Moor of Granada. But though Charles might have feared, that Ferdinand would enter into some League for the Duke of Bretagne's defense, he had an infallible way to prevent him: And that was, to restore him Rouffillon, which was of much less consequence than Bretagne to the Crown of France. Henry VII., who had a manifest Interest to oppose this enterprise, was embarrassed with affairs that, probably, would hinder him from meddling with those of others. It was precisely at the time, when the pretended Earl of Warwick began to appear in Ireland. As for the Low-Countries, Charles had not much to fear from thence. Philip, the Sovereign, was still a Minor. Maximilian his Father and Guardian, who governed these Provinces in his name, was but little regarded. Though he had made Peace with the Flemings, there was however a mutual distrust, which would not suffer him to send his Forces out of the Country. Besides, the war with France was renewed this year, on account of Trouwenne, surprized in full Peace by the Governor of Douay. In short, though Maximilian was the Emperor's Son, and chosen King of the Romans in February this year, he was ever in extreme want of Money, his new Dignity having made no addition to his power (1).

In the beginning of the year 1487, Henry concluded with Maximilian a Treaty wholly relating to Trade, and which was only provisional, till certain Articles could be settled, upon which the English and Flemings with difficulty agreed. The Trade between England and the Low-Countries was so necessary for the Subjects of both Princes, that it could not be interrupted without both being sufferers. But for that very reason each strove to reap some advantage from the situation of affairs, which rendered the Treaties very difficult.

The Bishop of Exeter being translated to Winchester, the King promoted to the vacant See, Richard Fox, who was already Keeper of the Privy Seal. Of all the Courtiers, he was the person in whom the King placed the most Confidence, next to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Mean while, Henry was not easy, since the Earl of Lincoln's retiring into Flanders. He knew the Dukes of Burgundy to be haughty and enterprising (2), and powerful enough to assist such as would attempt to disturb him.

The Earl of Lincoln's retreat into Flanders, presently after Simnel's arrival in Ireland, left him no room to question, there was a design formed between the Earl and the Dukes of Burgundy, to support the pretended Earl of Warwick. So, fearing the storm would divide and fall upon him both from Flanders and Ireland, he resolved to have two armies, under the command of the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford, to be ready at the same time to oppose the descent of the Flemings and Irish, if they should think of attacking England. Mean while, as he was not afraid of an Invasion before Summer, he resolved to improve the leisure the Winter Season afforded him, in taking a progress into the eastern Counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. There was most danger from those parts, by reason of the neighbourhood of the Low-Countries. When he was come to St. Edmundsbury, he heard, the Marquis of Dorset was hastening to clear himself of some Imputations laid to his Charge, and to offer his service. But the King believing, that after what he had lately done to the Queen Dowager, the Marquis her Brother could have no great affection for him, refused to receive him, and sent the Earl of Oxford to meet him, with orders to carry him to the Tower. He let him know however, that after the troubles were appeased he should willingly hear him, and if he caused him to be arrested, it was purely to provide for his own safety, by preventing his hearkening to those that might give him ill advice (3). Then, he came to Norwich (4), from whence he went in Pilgrimage to our Lady of Walsingham (5), after which he returned to London (6).

It was not till the beginning of May, that the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Lovel, and Martin Stuart, sailed for Ireland, with the two thousand German raised by the Dukes of Burgundy, at her own expence. Presently after their arrival at Dublin, they proceeded to the Coronation of the pretended King, which was performed with great Solemnity, in the presence of the Earl of Kil-dare, the Chancellor, and the rest of the great Officers. He was crowned with a Crown taken from the head of the Virgin's Statue in St. Mary's Church. There were but two or three Bishops that refused to acknowledge the new King (7). The History of Ireland says, that the pretended Sovereign summoned a kind of Parliament, where the Clergy granted the Pope a Subsidy, for fear the Court of Rome should take occasion from these proceedings to trouble them.

The Coronation being over, a great Council was held to consult what was next to be done. Their success in Ireland, where not a Sword was drawn for Henry, made them expect great matters in England. The Leaders fancied, they were in a much better Condition to overthrow Henry, than Henry himself was when he passed into England, to overthrow Richard III. They scarce doubted of Success, being sure, as they imagined, the English for the most part would rise in their favour. However, some were for making Ireland the Seat of the war. They alleged, as the chief reason, that Henry would never venture to come over in person, or in case he quitted England, his absence would occasion in the Kingdom Inturrections which would greatly promote the Affairs of the new King. Had this advice been taken, Henry would have been very much embarrassed. In that case, he must have had two strong armies on foot, one to subdue Ireland, the other to keep all quiet in England. It is easy to see, that at such a juncture it would not have been prudent to leave England without Troops, both by reason of the Correspondents, the Rebels might have there, and the neighbourhood of the Dukes of Burgundy, who would have taken advantage of such a neglect. Accordingly, Henry, as I observed, had already resolved to have two armies. But others on the contrary represented, that Ireland was not able to pay the German Troops, much less maintain a long war. That besides, the standing upon the defensive in Ireland was not the way to dethrone Henry, but the attacking him in England, where it was likely, they should meet with many friends. This advice was strengthened by another reason, which was not alleged, but however was the real motive thereof, namely, that the German and Irish were in hopes of making their fortunes in England, whereas in Ireland, they had scarce wherewithal to subsist. So, it was resolved to pass immediately into England, in the same Vessels that had transported the German. Mean while, Henry hearing of the Earl of Lincoln's arrival in Ireland with the foreign

So, giving orders, that all his Forces should assemble near Cowenry, he repaired in person to that City, which lies in the Center of the Kingdom, till he had certain advice of the designs of his enemies.

Some time after, he heard that Simmel was landed in Lancashire (1), in Company with the Earls of Lincoln and Kildare, the Lord Loxley and the German General. Sir Thomas Braghton joining the Rebels with a small body of English, they all marched together towards York, without committing any Act of Hostility in their rout, in order to draw the People to their side. But they found themselves deceived in their expectation. Not a Man, except what Braghton had brought, took arms in their favour, the English not liking at all to receive a King at the hands of the Irish and Germans. The Earl of Lincoln, who commanded the Army, had resolved to avoid fighting, in expectation of being joined by great numbers of Male-contents. But seeing the People's coldness, he thought he should come to a Battle as soon as possible, left his Army, which was but eight thousand strong, should diminish instead of increasing. So, changing his rout on a sudden, he marched towards Newark, in hopes to become master of that place before the King should arrive.

Mean while, Henry was advanced as far as Nottingham, where he held a Council of War. He had yet drawn together but six thousand Men, and for that reason several advised him to decline fighting till the rest of the Troops which were expected, had joined him. But he was of another opinion. As he could not believe that the Earl of Lincoln had formed such an enterprise, without assurances of being assisted, he judged it requisite to give him Battle without delay. Two days after he saw his Army reinforced with five or six thousand men (2), whereupon all the reasons against the resolution, he had taken, entirely vanished. As soon as he had reviewed these new Troops, he detached several parties of Light-Horse to discover the Earl of Lincoln's designs, and being informed, he was advancing towards Newark, resolved to prevent him. To that end he marched with such expedition, that he encamped between the Enemies Army and Newark. The Earl of Lincoln advanced that day to a little Village called Stoke, where he encamped on the side of a Hill. Next Morning being June the 6th (3), Henry offered him Battle, leaving only in the Plain a space to serve for the field. But he was debarred of one great advantage, in that the ground being narrow, would not allow him to extend the Front of his Army, which was more numerous than that of the Enemy. For which reason he was forced to draw up his Army into three lines, having taken care to place in the first all his best Troops to the number of six thousand Men. Probably the Earl of Lincoln had designedly chosen that ground, in hopes, that if he could defeat the King's first line, they would fall foul on the rest of the Army and put them in disorder, as it happened to Richard III in the Battle of Bosworth. In effect, it was the King's first line only that fought. They stood for three Hours the efforts of the Germans, who being used to War, and well disciplined, fought with great order, and inspired the Irish with Courage. At length the Earls of Lincoln and Kildare (4), and Martin Stuart being slain on the place, and most of the Germans killed or wounded, the Irish took to flight, not being able alone to resist the English. It is said, there were at least four thousand killed on the side of the Rebels, and half of the King's first line. Which shows with what obstinacy it was fought on both sides (5).

Among the Prisoners were found the new King of Ireland, become Lambert Simmel as before, and the Priest his Companion and Instructor. Henry, either out of Generosity or Policy, was pleased to give Simmel his life, and to honour, with the office of Turn-spit in his Kitchen, the Person that had boldly aspired to the Throne, and even worn a Crown. Some time after he was preferred to be one of the King's Falconers [in which office he died.] As for the Priest, he was immediately committed close Prisoner, and heard of no more. Some imagined he was privately put to death, others that the King was pleased to spare his life, in order to learn the most secret circumstances of the conspiracy, and it may be, to confront him with the guilty, if there was occasion. However it does not appear in History, that Henry made any discovery by that means. At least, there was nothing divulged. If the Queen Dowager was in the Plot, he could not be more rigorously punished than she was already, unless she was brought to the Scaffold. As for the Dukes of Burgundy, she had no occasion to fear any Proceedings against her. It is said the King was extremely sorry for the death of the Earl of Lincoln, which robbed him of the satisfaction of knowing all the particulars of the Plot. As for the Lord Loxley, some say he was drowned in attempting to swim the Trent, others affirm, he was slain in the Battle. Some again report, that he spent the residue of his life in a Hall-Cave. Be this as it will, he appeared no more from that time.

Presently after the Battle, the King marched to Lincoln, where he made some stay, and then went to York. In his way, were tried many persons accused of holding intelligence with the late Rebels. It is true, most of them were punished only by Fines, the King's sole aim being to fill his Coffers. And therefore he chose rather that these Trials should be ended by Commissioners of his own appointing, or by a Court Martial, than by the usual course of Justice, which was not so favorable to his design. For, in accusations of this Nature, the Laws of England admit of no medium between death and absolute discharge, and the King would have neither. But Commissioners and Court Martials are not so strictly confined to the Letter of the Law (6), but judge in a more arbitrary manner. Therefore the frequent incroachment, of what is called in England the Martial Law, upon the privileges of the People, has been the cause of reducing it within just bounds, so that it cannot take place but by an Act of Parliament made for that purpose (7). As for administering justice by Commissioners, it is true the King has still that prerogative, but then he seldom uses it, and in certain cases only by Commissions of Oyer and Termner (8) as they are called. It is certain, Henry upon this occasion discovered his covetous and selfish Temper. He pretended to favour the guilty in sparing their lives: But this Clemency was more than balanced by his severity, in stripping them of their possessions. The crime they were charged with was not of having assisted the Rebels, but of having raised and dispersed a report some days before the Battle, that the Royal Army was cut in pieces. The King supposing that such a report was spread only to discourage his friends, and hinder them from bringing him Troops, made strict Inquiry after those that were suspected of this new sort of crime. As his sole aim was to make an advantage of the Fines and Confiscations, the persons commissioned for Judges were more ready and less scrupulous to favour his design, than if the lives of the parties accused had been at stake. It may be easily guessed the King made choice of the fittest persons for his purpose. His Historian says, that Henry's progress to Lincoln and York, was more like an itinerary Circuit of Justice, than a King's progress to visit his Counties.

When the King had drawn what he wanted from the guilty or suspected persons, he sent for a papal commission, to empower the Archbishop of Canterbury to absolve those that had incurred the Penalty of Excommunication decreed by the Bull before-mentioned. The Pope in this Commission took for granted, that they who had attempted to disturb Henry in the possession of the Crown, were struck with bitter remorse, and therefore he was willing, from a motive of charity, to ease their conscience. But it was evident, that this was only for a further Support of the King's title.

At the same time Innocent VIII sent a Bull to restrain a little the privileges of Sanctuary. It ran, That if Thieves, Murderers, Robbers, registered as Sanctuary-Men, should fall out and commit fresh offences, and enter again, in such case they might be taken out of their Sanctuaries by the King's Officers. That as for Debtors who had taken Sanctuary to defraud their Creditors, their persons only should be protected, but their goods out of Sanctuary should be liable to seizure. As for Traitors, the King was allowed to appoint them Keepers in their Sanctuaries to prevent their escape. Certainly it was a great abuse to make Churches serve to protect Villains. It had been long complained of in England, and probably the King had applied for a reformation, but could obtain Troops of Men at Arms, which he had in the French Army, and fend them into the Duke of Bretagne's Service. Poor refuge upon so pressing an occasion!

Mean while, the French being joined in one body, advanced into the Country, and laid Siege to Ploermel. The Duke of Bretagne immediately marched to the relief of that place, but had the mortification to see himself forsaken by his army, of which there remained not with him above four thousand Men. Surprized at this unexpected accident, he retired to Vannes. But the French, now masters of Ploermel, pursued him so briskly, that he was obliged to embark in great disorder, and shut himself up in Nantz. The French improving this Conterfation, took Vannes and Dinant, and then besieged Nantz. Some time before, the Duke had sent the Earl of Dunais to England to desire assistance. But though the Earl had embarked four several times, contrary winds had still hindered him from pursuing his Voyage. Mean while, the Marfhal de Rieux head of the Male-contents, perceiving, King Charles to ill observed the Treaty, complained of it in strong terms. But instead of receiving any satisfaction, he was told, that great offence was taken at his boldness.

Whilst Charles was employed in the Siege of Nantz, he heard, the King of England had obtained a signal Victory over his enemies, and the affair of the pretended Earl of Warwick was entirely ended. 'Till then he had believed him to be embarrassed at home, that he had not vouchsafed to say any thing to him concerning the war with Bretagne. But when he knew him freed from his troubles, he sent Ambassadors to try to divert him from any design he might have to interpose in that affair.

The Ambassadors found the King at Leicester, where they had their Audience. They told him, that the King their master considering him as his best friend, had sent them to impart to him the Success of his arms in Flanders, and withal to congratulate him upon his Victory over his rebellious Subjects: That they were moreover charged to tell him, that the King their master was forced to enter into a just war with the Duke of Bretagne, who had received the Duke of Orleans, declared enemy of France, not to protect him, but solely with a view to aid him to raise Commotions in the Kingdom, by lending him the assistance of his arms: That the King of France could not omit taking proper measures to prevent his pernicious designs, and therefore his war with the Duke of Bretagne was properly defensive only, though he had caused an army to enter his Dominions: That he that gave the first blow, was not to be deemed the Aggressor, but he that gave the Provocation: That the Duke of Bretagne could not deny that he had harboured in his Dominions, nay, in his very Court, French Rebels, and formed plots with them very prejudicial to France, without being able to complain of any injury: That therefore the King their master hoped from his Wisdom and Justice, that before he concerned himself in the war, he would weigh the ill Consequences of a Protection given to rebellious Subjects, contrary to the Law of Nations, and the most solemn Treaties, particularly by a Homage: That if he was something obliged to the Duke of Bretagne, on the other hand, he had not, doubtless, forgot the aid he had received from the King of France, when the Duke of Bretagne had not only abandoned him, but was even going to deliver him to his enemy: That this aid was given contrary to the Interest of France, since it would be better for her, that a Tyrant, odious to all his Subjects, should reign in England, than such a Prince as himself: That therefore, the King their master hoped, he would not undertake the defence of the Duke of Bretagne in so ill-grounded a quarrel, but on the contrary, assist his real friend, or at least, stand neutral.

The Ambassadors avoiding, as a rock, to speak of their master's design to conquer Bretagne, the King thought not proper to mention it in his answer, though it was not difficult to perceive it through all their disguises. He contented himself with telling them, that of all persons, he was most obliged to the King of France, and the Duke of Bretagne. For which reason he was extremely desirous to give them both real marks of his Gratitude. That therefore he would, on the present occasion, discharge the duty of a true friend, by endeavouring amicably to end their differences, and very speedily send them Ambassadors to offer his mediation.

Henry was not to be blind, but he saw the King of France's intent. But unhappily for Bretagne, he was possessed with a notion, that Charles would never be able to execute his designs. His belief was founded upon the Forces of Bretagne, which had hitherto successively resisted France, upon the natural Levity of the French, who are easily discouraged by difficulties; upon the doubts the Duke of Orleans could raise in the Kingdom, by means of his friends, and upon the diversion, the King of the Romans could make in Flanders. Pursuant to this principle, which appeared afterwards to be very wrong, he refused to become only Mediator, without sending any effective Supplies to the Duke of Bretagne. He did not doubt that King Charles would consent to an accommodation, for fear of drawing upon him the arms of England. Indeed, it was evidently the Interest of the English to prevent the ruin of Bretagne, and therefore Charles must have thought, they would use their utmost endeavours to oppose his design. Accordingly, Henry building upon this foundation, that Bretagne could not be subdued, if England seriously espoused her quarrel, and that Charles would not believe him so impolitic as to suffer that Duchy to become a Province of France, imagined he would readily accept of his mediation, and desist from his enterprise. He hoped to reap from thence two considerable advantages. First, the reputation of making Peace between the two Princes, to whom he was equally obliged. The second was much more important to him. As he was naturally very covetous, and as the desire of heaping up riches was the chief end of all his projects, he perceived this affair would furnish an occasion to demand money of the Parliament, under colour of assisting Bretagne, and that he might keep this money without employing it (1).

Pursuant to this scheme, he sent Ambassadors (2) to King Charles to offer his mediation, and in case it was accepted, the Ambassadors had orders to make the same offer to the Duke of Bretagne. Charles was then employed in the Siege of Nantz, and as he hoped to be soon master of the place, saw nothing more after that, capable of hindering him from entirely conquering Bretagne. So, all his endeavours tended only to manage, that the King of England should not assist the Duke of Bretagne before the taking of Nantz. When the Ambassadors offered him the mediation of the King their master, he answered with great dissimulation, he willingly consented, that the King of England should act not only as mediator between him and the Duke of Bretagne, but also as judge, and absolute arbiter of the peace. He was in hopes, either the Duke of Bretagne would reject this proposal, or if he accepted it, he should possibly gain time till the taking of Nantz; after which, he considered himself as master of Bretagne.

The Ambassadors imagining they had surmounted the greatest difficulty, repaired to the Duke of Bretagne, who was shut up in Nantz, and made him the same offer from their master. The Duke of Orleans told them in the name of that Prince, that at a time when his Country was invaded, and ready to be swallowed up by the French, he expected rather an effective supply from the King of England, than a mediation, which must be fruitless, since nothing was more easy than to prolong the Negotiation till Bretagne was lost: That he intreated the King to remember the favours he had received in Bretagne, and consider of what consequence it was to England to hinder that Dukedom from becoming a Province of France. The Ambassadors returning with this answer to King Charles, he took occasion to tell them, that for his part, he was very desirous of Peace, as plainly appeared by his proposal, but was sorry to find that the Duke of Bretagne, beset by the Duke of Orleans, would never consent, without being forced by the continuation of the War. This he artfully insinuated into the Ambassadors, who at their return into England, told the King, it was proper to leave the Duke of Bretagne in his present ill circumstances, that he might be induced of himself to desire the rejected Mediation.

Mean while the Siege of Nantz was vigorously carried on (3). Charles, probably, would have at last taken the place, had not the Earl of Dunais been detained in lower Bretagne by contrary Winds. Whilst he was in Nantz, he told those parts, the Inhabitants of the Country hearing their Duke was besieged in Nantz, assembled to the number of sixty thousand Men, with a resolution to relieve him. The Earl of Dunais perceiving them in this disposition, put himself at their head, and approached Nantz, the French not daring to attack the undisciplined multitude. On the contrary, they contracted their quarters for their better defence, and so left the Earl of Dunois free to throw succours into the Town. Which done, he suddenly retired, not deferring to fight the French Army with such Troops. This so feasonable a relief, obliged the French to retire, in despair of taking the place. The raising of the Siege confirmed Henry in his belief, that the conquest of Bretagne was too difficult for France. So, persisting still in his resolution to stand neuter, he had not even the thought of sending succours to the Duke of Bretagne. He pretended however to have his interest at heart; but it was only to procure a Subsidy from the Parliament, which he had summoned for the 9th of November. Mean while, he sent again the same Ambassadors to King Charles and the Duke of Bretagne, under colour of being perfectly informed of the state of this affair, in order to lay it before the Parliament, though he knew beforehand what answer they were to bring back.

Woodville carries a small aid to the Duke of Bretagne.

Hall.
Bacon.
Hollingsh.

About this time Edward Lord Woodville, the Queen's Uncle, desired the King's licence to go and serve the Duke of Bretagne with a Troop of Volunteers. Henry denied his request, not thinking proper to aid one of the parties when he was offering them his mediation. Nevertheless Woodville sailed from the Isle of Wight [of which he was Governour,] with four hundred Men into Bretagne. This aid, though inconsiderable, made a great noise at the Court of France. Charles publicly complained of it; but as Henry denied that the Lord Woodville had carried these Troops to the Duke with his consent, was contented with that satisfaction. He was very careful, at such a juncture, not to quarrel with Henry for so small a matter.

The Lords of Bretagne are reconciled to the Duke, June 20.

Before the English Ambassadors arrived in Bretagne, there had been in that Country a revolution prejudicial to the King of France's affairs. The Lords of Bretagne who had treated with him, plainly perceiving his intention was to conquer the Duchy, made their peace with the Duke, and obtained a full pardon. The Marshal de Rieux, their head, was the last to comply. He would first be thoroughly convinced of the French King's designs, which yet he only suspected. For that purpose, after privately treating with the Duke of Orleans, he sent a messenger to the King to tell him, that the Duke of Orleans offered to quit Bretagne with all his followers; and therefore, since the French Troops had entered Bretagne only to expel that Prince, he most humbly besought him to recall them, pursuant to his Treaty with the Barons. Ann of Beaujeu, who was haughty and proud, imagining there was no need of any farther ceremony, told the messenger, the King had gone too far to recede, and would see the issue of the affair. This answer obliged the Marshal to follow the example of the rest of the Barons, and be reconciled to the Duke, who gave him the command of his Army.

The French take Dol.

Though Charles had raised the Siege of Nantz, he continued his conquests elsewhere. Soon after his Troops took the Town of Dol by storm; whereupon the Duke not thinking himself safe in Nantz, thought fit to retire to Renner. He saw himself extremely pressed, and yet did not hear that preparations were any where making for his relief. In this extremity, he was persuaded by the Prince of Orange, to promise Ann his eldest Daughter to the King of the Romans, though he had already promised her to the Lord d'Albret. The Prince of Orange made him believe that Maximilian, finding himself concerned to defend Bretagne, would not fail to come to his assistance with a powerful Army. But at this very time, the revolt of the Gantois disabled that Prince to do any thing for Bretagne.

Henry's Ambassadors discover the King of France's designs.

Hall.

Whilst these things passed, Henry's Ambassadors had Bretagne had frequent opportunities to be convinced that Charles was only amusing the King their master, and intended to conquer that Duchy. Henry knew this still better than they; but was willing, their report should serve for foundation to demand a Subsidy for the defence of Bretagne, though he still believed the affair might be adjusted, without drawing the Sword. His sole aim was to make the Parliament apprehensive of the loss of Bretagne, that they might more readily supply him with money, which he intended to put entirely into his Coffers.

The Parliament met the 9th of November, just after the return of the Ambassadors. Care had been taken to divulge the report they had brought to the King, to prepare the Commons to make a powerful effort in the defence of Bretagne. The Archbishop of Canterbury (1) as Lord Chancellor, opened the Session with a Speech to both Houses to this effect:

The Chancellor's Speech.
Bacon.

"That the King thanked his Parliament for the Acts passed in his favour at their last meeting: That he was so well satisfied of their affection, that he had made it a rule to himself to communicate to so good subjects all affairs, as well foreign as domestic, that might happen, and that one now occurred, concerning which he desired to have their advice. "That the King of France (as no doubt they had heard) was making fierce War upon the Duke of Bretagne: That he alleged for reason the protection given by the Duke of Bretagne to the Duke of Orleans; but others guessed a very different motive: That both parties had applied to the King, one to pray him to stand neuter, the other to desire a powerful aid: That the King having offered his mediation, found the French King ready to treat, but without discontinuing the War: That the Duke on the contrary, though he was very desirous of peace, and most wanted it, was averse to a Negotiation, not upon confidence of his own strength, but upon distrust of the French Court's sincerity: That after sundry Embassies tending to an amicable determination of this affair, the King had desisted from his mediation, because he could neither remove the Duke of Bretagne's distrust, nor persuade the King of France to cease Hostilities during the Treaty: That this being the state of the case, he desired their advice, whether he should send succours to the Duke of Bretagne, and enter into a defensive league with him against France."

After thus stating the question, he alleged several arguments pro and con, his aim being, under colour of leaving the Parliament free to determine what they should judge proper, to make them sensible of the necessity of aiding Bretagne. This necessity was in effect so evident, that there was need but of a very moderate knowledge of the interests of the State, to see of what consequence it was to England to prevent the conquest of Bretagne. However it is worth noting, that the King knowing how much it concerned the English to defend Bretagne, alleged these reasons by the mouth of his Chancellor, only to obtain a subsidy, without intending however to employ it in support of the oppressed Prince. This will plainly appear in his whole future conduct. The Parliament, according to the King's expectation, failed not to advise him to undertake the defence of the Duke of Bretagne, and granted him for that purpose as large a Subsidy as had ever been given to any former King (2) on account of a foreign War (3).

As soon as the Parliament broke up, Henry refused the way of Negotiation with Charles, still fancying that the terror of his Arms would lead that Prince to an agreement. The only means however to save Bretagne was to send thither a strong aid, and declare War with France, according to the Parliament's intention. But Henry had laid another plan, founded wholly upon his extreme desire that the affair might be decided, without his being forced to expend the money lately received. He was content therefore with sending Ambassadors to King Charles, to notify to him the Parliament's resolu-

desires.

The Court of France easily perceived by these proceedings, that the King of England had no great desire vigorously to push this affair, since, when he should have been preparing for War, he contented himself with sending Ambassadors. So, Charles told the Ambassadors, that he was always ready to accept of the King of England for arbiter of the differences between him and the Duke of Bretagne; but did not intend to suffer himself to be amused with a Treaty, which would only serve to give the Duke time and opportunity to refore his affairs. That he should be always willing to treat, provided it was not meant to require a Truce destructive of his interests.

The Winter procured the Duke of Bretagne a cessation of Arms, which all the instances of the King of England had not been able to obtain, as it obliged the King of France to put his Troops into quarters, and return to Paris. Moreover in March 1488, the Marshal de Rieux retook Vannes and Dinant, and garrisoned Ancenis and Chateaubriant. On the other hand, the Lord d'Albret's two Troops of Men at Arms deserted the French service, and joined the Duke's Army. But this little turn of fortune was of no long continuance. In April the King took the field again, and having retaken Ancenis and Chateaubriant, razed them to the ground. After that, he marched to Fougères and besieged at once that place and St. Aubin du Cormier.

Mean time, the Lord d'Albret having accepted the proposal made him in the beginning of the War, came into Bretagne to serve the Duke with a thousand Horse. Upon his arrival, he pressed the Duke to perform his promise concerning the marriage. The Duke, who had privately promised his Daughter to Maximilian, being greatly embarrassed, put the young Princess upon declaring, she would never espouse the Lord d'Albret, though she was not then above eleven years old. This opposition gave the Duke a pretence to elude d'Albret's pursuits, till the Princess's obsequy could be conveyed.

Mean while, the unfortunate Duke finding himself little able to resist the French, and receiving assistance neither from Maximilian nor the King of England, sent the Earl of Dunois to Charles to sue for peace. Charles did not think fit to return a positive answer. He was willing first to see the success of his two Sieges. On the other hand, he was in Treaty with Henry for a Truce which he expected shortly to conclude; and that was to determine him, either to refuse peace to the Duke, or enter into Treaty with him. So, keeping the Earl of Dunois still at Court, under divers pretences, he put him off from day to day, till he had received certain advice from England. Shortly after, he heard that Henry had signed at Windfor a Truce, to commence the 14th of July this year, and to end the 17th of January 1490. Thus having nothing to fear from England, he wholly applied himself to continue his conquests.

conduct.

Most certainly Henry in leaving the Duke of Bretagne to the mercy of his Enemy, acted directly contrary to the Parliament's intention, which had granted him a Subsidy for the assistance of that Prince. This Truce, made without any necessity, when the Duke of Bretagne was most pressed, plainly shows, he suffered himself to be blinded by the Court of France, or rather by the desire of keeping the money granted by the Parliament for the aid of Bretagne. The Duke's occasion for a powerful assistance could not be more pressing. Charles was in the heart of his Country, at the head of a strong Army, taking his Towns one after another, and he not able to make any resistance. At the same time Henry was concluding with France a Truce which tied up his hands, and afforded King Charles time and facility, to conquer Bretagne. Wherefore his Historian, prepossessed no doubt in his favour, and not imagining, he had thus causelessly forsaken the poor Duke in his distress, mentions not this Truce made with France at so unseasonable a time. Moreover, he makes the Succours sent by Henry into Bretagne, to arrive there the beginning of August; this year, whereas it is very certain they came not till March seven months after. These affected delays, which surprised all the world, proceeded wholly from the King's wrong notion of this War, and his desire to end it, without being obliged to use the money given by Parliament.

Mean time, the Duke of Bretagne, the Duke of Orléans, the Prince of Orange, the Marshal de Rieux, were in the utmost confusion. The King of the Romans, the King of England, the Duke of Lorraine, had seemed to espouse their quarrel; but it did not appear that any of them were preparing to assist them. In this extremity, a Council was held to consider what course was to be taken. Most were for marching to the relief of Fougères, and joining Battle rather than suffer that place to be lost. The Marshal de Rieux opposed in vain this dangerous advice, by representing that the loss of a Battle would infallibly be attended with the ruin of Bretagne. That it would be much wiser to delay the time till the neighbouring Princes should see their own interest, since it could not but be extremely prejudicial to them to suffer Bretagne to be swallowed up by France. To this it was replied, that probably Bretagne would be lost before any Succours arrived, and therefore the only way to save it was a victory. The Duke of Bretagne's understanding was so impaired, that he was little able to judge soundly of an Affair of such consequence. So suffering himself to be governed by the Counsels of the Duke of Orléans and the Prince of Orange his Nephews, he resolved to march to the relief of Fougères. But upon his approach, he found the Town had already capitulated. Then he determined to relieve St. Aubin du Cormier, but the Governor for want of Provisions and Ammunition, had surrendered a few days before.

Whilst the Duke of Bretagne was marching to St. Aubin, all the Forces of France joined in one body, under the command of Lewis de Trimouille, for fear the Duke had intended to retake that place. In a few days, the two Armies were so near one another, that it was not possible to part without giving Battle. Whilst they were preparing on both sides, a rumour being spread among the Bretons, that the Duke of Orléans and the Prince of Orange were going to betray them, they were upon the point of disbanding. But the two Princes removed their fears, by going amongst them to charge on foot. The Battle was fought the 25th of July, with fatal success to the Duke of Bretagne, who was defeated with the loss of his best Troops. The Duke of Orléans and the Prince of Orange being taken Prisoners, the King commanded Mazuel the first to be confined in the Tower of Bourges, but let the other at liberty. The four hundred English brought over by the Lord Woodville, were almost all slain with their Leader (1). As the English were then distinguished by a Red-Cross, twelve hundred (2) Bretons were joined to them with the same Badge, to make the French believe, that fresh Succours were arrived from England. It may be, this gave occasion to some to affirm, that King Henry had already sent a fresh body of Troops to the Duke of Bretagne. The Lord Perulam who has writ the History of this Reign, does not say this, but assures us, that eight thousand English arrived within a few days, and offered the French Battle, who did not think proper to accept it. Polydore Virgil and several others say the same thing. But herein they are mistaken. Henry had not yet made any Treaty with the Duke of Bretagne, and it was not till after the Duke's death, and in March the next year, that he sent, as will be seen, six thousand Men to the Duchess his Daughter.

In a few days after the Battle of St. Aubin, Lewis de Rennes la Trimouille ordered the City of Rennes Capital of Bretagne to be summoned, but the Inhabitants continued firm in their Allegiance to their Sovereign.

Whilst these things passed in Bretagne, Henry was leaving in England the money granted by Parliament. That was a principal Affair which he hastened extremely, upon pretence of the Duke of Bretagne's pressing occasion for a speedy assistance. All the Counties, except Yorkshire, and the Bishoprick of Durham, readily paid the Tax imposed by the Parliament. But in these parts, where the friends of the House of York were very numerous, it was not collected with the same ease. Some factious persons stirring up the People, the Commissioners for gathering the Subsidy met with so much opposition, that they were obliged to make application to the Earl of Northumberland (3), who immediately gave the Court notice [and desired the King's direction.] The King answered, he would not have one penny abated of the money granted by Parliament, both by reason of the urgent occasion, and because other Counties might be incouraged to desire the like mitigation. Upon this answer, the Earl of Northumberland assembled the principal Justices and Free-Holders of the County, and in very imperious Terms declared to them the King's intention. The rough manner in which he spoke to them, without showing any regard for persons who were but too much incensed, gave them reason to think, he himself advised the King to such an an-

Presently after being inflamed by one John a Chamber an incendiary, they set Sir John Egremont at their head, and publicly declared they were marching to London to give the King battle.

Henry being informed of this insurrection, sent into the North a body of Troops under the command of the Earl of Surrey (1), whom he had released out of the Tower, and received into favour, preparing to follow him in person with more considerable Forces. But whilst he was on his way, he heard that Surrey had beaten and dispersed the Rebels, and John a Chamber was taken Prisoner. As for Egremont, he had the good fortune to escape and retire into Flanders to the Duches of Burgundy, whose Palace was a Sanctuary to all the King's Enemies. Tho' this Affair was ended, Henry however pursued his Journey to York, where he ordered John a Chamber to be hanged on a Gibbet raised in the midst of a square Gallows, on which twelve of his Accomplices were hanged round about him. After that, he returned to London, leaving the Earl of Surrey President of the North, and Sir Richard Tunstall his principal Commissioner, to levy the Subsidy, of which he would not remit a denier.

Mean time, the news of the Battle of St. Aubin being brought to the King, he seemed resolved to send a powerful aid to the Duke of Bretagne. But it was still in hopes that the terror of his Arms would oblige King Charles to consent to a Peace. This Artifice was not however capable of deceiving the Court of France, which plainly saw through all his designs.

The loss of a Battle had reduced the Duke of Bretagne to a State worthy of pity. He could no longer support himself with his own forces alone, and saw no preparations for his defence, either in Flanders or England. Henry had put him in hopes of assistance, but was not in haste to send him any. As for Maximilian, instead of being able to assist his future Father-in-law, he was himself detained Prisoner in a Sedition against him at Bruges, where several of his Officers were killed. His Captivity lasted from the beginning of January to the 15th of May, and his release then was owing to the Emperor Frederick his Father, who had marched into the Low-Countries at the head of an Army to his relief. So instead of thinking to assist Bretagne, he was himself seeking on all sides for foreign Succours against the Flemings. To that end, forgetting his engagements with the Duke of Bretagne, he sent this very year to the King and Queen of Spain, to demand in marriage Isabella their eldest Daughter, and at the same time June their second Daughter for his Son Philip. The first of these demands could not be granted, Isabella being already promised to the Prince of Portugal. But the other was effected in time. At last in September, Philip de Cleves Lord of Ravensstein, heading the Gentils and supplanting the City of Brussels, Maximilian retired into Germany, leaving in the Low-Countries Albert Duke of Saxony to command in his place, in the name of the Archduke his Son.

There was therefore no appearance of aid for the Duke of Bretagne, either from England or the Low-Countries, or in short, from any other place. In this distress, the unfortunate Duke humbly fled to the King of France for Peace, who very readily complied with his request, not from a motive of Generosity, but to put it entirely out of his power to defend himself, by causing him to lose the assistance of the King of England, whose Interest it was to support him. Though Henry had agreed to a Truce with France, which was not to expire till January 1490, Charles was afraid however he would change his mind, and assist the Duke his Ally with all his Forces next Campaign. In order therefore, to divert him from this thought, he very willingly concluded a Peace with the Duke of Bretagne, intending to keep it no farther than was consistent with his Interests. For in his whole Conduct with regard to Bretagne, he did not seem more scrupulous than his Father King Lewis XI, was in all his Negotiations.

The discussion of Charles's pretensions upon Bretagne, delayed for some time the conclusion of the Peace which was negotiating at Verger, a Seat belonging to the Marshal de Rieux, where the King then was. Charles pretending, that after the decease of the Duke of Bretagne, the Guardianship of his Daughters belonged to him as Sovereign Lord of the Duchy, this pretension was disputed by the Bretons, who affirmed, the Dukes of Bretagne had never done Liege-Homage to the Kings of France, and consequently they had no right to claim the Guardianship in question. It was no favorable juncture to decide, to the advantage of the Bretons, this so long, and as yet undetermined dispute. But this pretension of Charles was a trifle, in comparison of another of much greater consequence. He maintained, that the Duchy itself belonged to him, by virtue of a certain Grant to King Lewis XI, from the Lady de la Bresse, Heiress of the House of Blais, who had formerly disputed Bretagne with the Ancestors of Francis II. This was renewing an old quarrel which had been ended by several Treaties, and particularly by that of Guerdane, whereby the House of Blais relinquished all claim. However, Charles insisted not obstinately upon these two Articles, contenting himself with having intimated his pretensions, in order to prosecute them in time and place. So, the Treaty was concluded about the end of August, importing, that Charles should remain within the places he had conquered, and withdraw his Forces out of the rest of Bretagne. But he did not intend to observe this last Article. The Duke ratified the Treaty at Corron, where he then was, and therefore it is called by the Bretons, the Treaty of Corron, and by the French, the Treaty of Verger, or Verger.

A few days after, namely, on the 9th of September, died Francis II, Duke of Bretagne, in a very advanced age, and with his understanding so impaired, that for some years past, he had been incapable of governing the State. Ann, his eldest Daughter, about twelve years old, succeeded him. The Duke her Father had appointed her for Guardian, the Marshal de Rieux, who was to be assisted by the Earl of Cominge. But Philip de Montauban Chancellor of Bretagne found means to carry away the young Duches to Guerdane, where under colour of giving her advice, he made her speak as he pleased. This occasioned between the Marshal and the Chancellor a quarrel, which proved extremely prejudicial to the Duches, and to all the Bretons in general.

Henry hearing of the Duke of Bretagne's decease, openly declared that he considered the Interest of the young Orphan Duches as his own, and seemed to prepare in earnest to assist her. But as he knew likewise that, a few days before the Duke's death, a provisional Treaty had been concluded till all the King of France's pretensions were settled, he did not question that the affair would be ended by way of Negotiation. The Business was only to hinder King Charles from taking advantage of the present Confimation of the Bretons. This he imagined could be effected, by loudly proclaiming his concern for the Duches's affairs. He still believed, Charles feared him, and rather than break with him, would resign much of his pretensions. So, his aim was to become arbiter of this difference, and avoid a war which would have forced him to empty his Coffers.

For this purpose it was that he sent Ambassadors to the King of the Romans, to the Archduke his Son, and to the Kings of Spain and Portugal, to make the King of several France believe, he was labouring to form a League against him. He sent also an Embassy to Charles himself (2), to press him to end entirely the affair of Bretagne by a Treaty. At the same time, he sent Edgewood and Ansfworth to offer his assistance to the Duches, and empowered them to promise in his name, to find her such a number of Troops, upon sufficient Security for the re-payment of the Charges. We shall see, under the next year, to what all these Embassies tended. But before we proceed, it will be necessary briefly to mention the revolution in Scotland.

The affair of Bretagne employed the Kings of France and England, that James III could obtain no assistance from either, against the Lords who had the Prince his Son at their head. The Male-content was however been very glad to decide the quarrel by a battle. But the King still kept in the Castle of Edinburgh, where it was not possible to force him. Though Charles and Henry had promised him aid, they were not very desirous to espouse his quarrel. Mean while, he was still in hopes, and therefore kept close, expecting the performance of their promise.

Whilst his affairs were in this situation, he was advised to quit the Castle of Edinburgh for Sterling as the more convenient place, and there expect the foreign succours. James taking this advice, began his march with his few Troops, and presently the Lords were close after him. He was however far enough before them to be secure, if the Governour of Sterling, bribed by his enemies, had not refused him admittance. So, not knowing where to go, he resolved to return to Edinburgh; but meeting the Army of the Male-content, was forced to fight though much inferior in number of Troops. He was killed in the Battle which was fought in the month of June. After his death James IV his eldest Son, about fifteen years old, was proclaimed in his room, by the Lords who had placed him at their head. But all the Scots were not satisfied with this change. There were many that refused to own the young Prince, whom they taxed with being the murderer of his Father, and gave him great disturbance for some time. In July the new King sent Ambassadors to Henry to notify his accession to the Crown (1).

On the 10th of February 1489, the Ambassadors, sent into Bretagne, concluded a Treaty with the Dukes, of which the principal article was, that the King engaged to send into Bretagne an aid of six thousand Men. To consider this alone, one would be apt to imagine, Henry acted only from a principle of generosity, or at least for the interest of his Kingdom. But he had no such thought. His sole aim was first to hinder Bretagne from being over-run by a sudden invasion of the French, in order to give room for a Treaty. In the next place, to draw a pecuniary advantage from the succours, sent the Dukes, the expenses whereof he was willing to advance, in order to be afterwards re-paid with usury. As this Treaty manifestly shows his interested views in this affair, it will not be improper to infer the substance of each article : Which added to what will be said hereafter, will serve in great measure to give a just idea of this Prince's character.
